A STUDY IN THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE JEWISH PEOPLE
AND JESUS CHRIST

A Thesis submitted to the Faculty of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

JAKOB JOCZ

1945.
CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I

Introductory remarks:
  a) Jesus and the Jewish people.
  b) Paul and the Hebrew Church.
  c) The national element.
  d) The Jewish-Christian controversy and Jesus Christ.
  e) The juxtaposition of Church and Synagogue.
  f) The problem of subjectivity.

CHAPTER II

Jesus Christ and the Synagogue
  a) Judaism and Christianity.
  b) Jesus and the two main parties:
     1. The Sadducees.
     2. The Pharisees:
        a) The Synoptic account of the Pharisees
        b) Jesus and the bad Pharisees
     3. The Law.
     4. The teaching of Jesus
     5. The claims of Jesus
     6. The continuation of the struggle:
        a) Persecution
        b) Liturgical alterations
        c) The Birkat ha-Minim
        d) Calumination of the person of Jesus
        e) The lingering past.

CHAPTER III

The Church and the Jews.
  1. The ascendency of the Church
  2. The victory of the Church and its effect upon Jewish life:
     a) Spiritual disinheritance
     b) Legal discrimination
     c) Forced baptisms and other means of coercion
  3. Jewish reaction.

CHAPTER IV

Contemporary Judaism and Jesus Christ
  1. Emancipation and its effects upon Jewish life
     a) The Haskalah
     b) Apostasy
     c) Reform
     d) The Science of Judaism
     e) Assimilation and nationalism
     f) Conclusion
  2. Contemporary Judaism and Jesus Christ
     a) Orthodox Judaism: Rejection.
     b) Liberal Judaism: Appreciation.
  3. The Jewish-Leben-Jesu-Forschung:
     a) Jesus and Christianity
     b) Jesus and Paul
     c) Jesus the Jew
     d) The nature of Jesus' activity
     e) The significance of Jesus
CHAPTER V

Primitive Hebrew Christianity.
1. Jesus' popularity
2. Jesus' unpopularity.
3. The Resurrection-Faith and its effects
4. Church and Synagogue: the reason for the breach
5. The Schism
6. The growth of Hebrew-Christianity
7. Judaic Christianity and Judaistic Christianity
8. The Minim:
   a) The etymology of "Min".
   b) The identification of the "Minim"
   c) The Minim and Judaism
9. The decline of the Hebrew-Christian Church:
   a) Christians of Jewish descent
   b) The Nazarenes
   c) The Ebionites
10. The end of Hebrew-Christianity

CHAPTER VI

Contemporary Hebrew-Christianity
1. The missionary approach:
   a) The Old Testament
   b) Mysticism
   c) Criticism
   d) Conversion
2. Missions to Jews.
3. Converts
4. Hebrew-Christians
5. The Hebrew-Christian position:
   a) The Hebrew-Christian and the Jewish people
   b) The Hebrew-Christian in the Gentile Church
   c) The Hebrew-Christian Alliance
   d) Hebrew-Christian influence

CHAPTER VII

JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY

A. Theological issues: 1. The unity of God
   2. The Jewish conception of Man. 3. Free-will
   4. The Jewish conception of sin. 5. Mediation
   6. The Messiah 7. The Torah
   8. Revelation

B. Israel and the nations:
   1. Jewish universalism 2. Jewish particularism
   3. Israel's election

4. Israel and the Church:
   1) The Christian view concerning Israel
   2) The Jewish view concerning the Church
   3) The Jewish and the Christian Mission
   4) The everlasting division.
Some years ago Dr. Chaim Zhitlowsky, the father of Jewish socialism and the foremost exponent of the Yiddish culture movement, published an article in his journal, Das Neue Leben, in which he called upon the Jewish people to "revise the Dreyfus case, by which our innocent brother of Nazareth is daily condemned and crucified". Behind these words of a great Jew lies the strange and complicated history of the Jewish attitude to Jesus to Nazareth.

Gösta Lindeskog makes reference to the picture drawn by Joseph Norden in an article "Jesus von Nazareth in der Beurteilung der Juden einst und jetzt", which may well serve as a symbol of all the prejudice and antipathy the Jew has kept in his heart for many centuries towards Israel's greatest son. An old, weary Jew, on the high-road approaching the town, on the eve of the Sabbath, full of anticipation of family bliss, suddenly notices a Crucifix. His features change, his face becomes tense with pain and anger, and his lips murmur: "在同一ノ," - may his name and his memory be blotted out. The name of Jesus and the symbol of his suffering evoke bitter memories in the Jewish mind. Jesus of Nazareth is still held responsible by many Jews for much that they have suffered for centuries at the hands of Christians. Norden explains: "Darum hat sich aller Hass der Gepeinigten gegen die Peiniger auf das Haupt des Mannes ergossen, den die Kirche als ihren Erlöser verehrt". But the fact that Jesus became the complete stranger to the Jewish people is not merely explained by the behaviour of the Christian Church. To put the entire blame upon Christianity is to ignore important historical evidence.

It must not be forgotten that the decision concerning Jesus of Nazareth was taken at a time when Gentile Christianity was scarcely of any consequence to the Synagogue. The parting of the roads between the Messianic movement and Judaism began upon Jewish soil as a result of a religious controversy between Jews and Jews. This does not diminish the guilt of Christendom. The Church was, and still is, an important factor in the Jewish attitude to Jesus Christ, but not the only one. There are still other, internal factors, which determined the relationship between Jesus and the Jews.

It is the purpose of this thesis to investigate the deeper reasons which have led first to the separation and later to the complete estrangement between the Jews and Jesus Christ.

How did it happen that Jesus the Jew, passionately concerned with the welfare of his people, was for centuries looked upon as a bitter enemy, whose name was not to be mentioned, and whose teaching to be despised? There is still a further question of equal, if not of greater interest: how did an essentially Jewish movement detach itself completely from its original background to flourish as a non-Jewish religion?

There are two standard answers to the last question, emanating from two different schools of thought:

1) Traditional Christianity held for centuries that the Jews as a people rejected and the Gentiles accepted Jesus Christ. The crowd, which on Good-Friday shouted "crucify, crucify him", expressed the will of the entire Jewish nation, with the exception of a small minority. Thus, the Jewish people having rejected their true Messiah, Israel's spiritual heritage passed on to the Gentile world.

2) A more modern answer is connected with the person of Paul the Apostle. Between Jesus of Nazareth and the Gentile Church stands the man of Tarsus. The Gospel which Jesus preached and the Gospel which Paul preached were two different Gospels. While Jesus was and remained a Jew, Paul, under the influence of Hellenistic ideas, deviated from the path of pure monotheism. Thus it happened that while Jesus himself was pointing to God, Paul, the Hellenistic Jew, was pointing to the glorified Christ. In reality, therefore, historical Christianity has only slight connections with Jewish Palestine, its sources are to be sought in the philosophico-metaphysical ideas of the heathen world.

Both answers, however, are inadequate for the following reasons:

a) Jesus and the Jewish people.

Jesus of Nazareth was born into a Jewish family. He was brought up in the faith and traditions of the Jewish people. His teachers were Jews, his primer was the Hebrew Bible. He shared in the life of the common people and dressed in the customary dress of the pious Jews. His disciples were Jewish men and it was primarily to his own people that he knew himself called to preach. The first Church in Jerusalem was a Jewish Church. They were Jewish men and women who first proclaimed Jesus the Messiah. Early Christian records bear evidence to the fact that at least for a time, Jesus was a popular and much favoured preacher. Wherever he went, throngs followed the Master and hung upon his lips. His struggle against the Pharisees seems to have met with approval amongst the common people. The behaviour of the crowd before Pilate was by no means vox populi in any sense. The Gospels make it clear that the crowd demanding the death of Jesus, was the priests' crowd.
There is a passage peculiar to Luke which may well portray the sentiment of many Jews. We read that Jesus, on his way to Golgotha was followed by "a great multitude of the people and of women who bewailed and lamented him". There is no need to assume that the crowd consisted of enemies only and of the usual rabble led by curiosity and boredom. Many will have been guided by deep-felt devotion to the great Master of Nazareth. From Acts, it would appear that after the Crucifixion, Palestine was experiencing something of a Messianic mass-movement. Judging by the reaction of the Synagogue some fifty or sixty years later, this movement was only subdued after a long and bitter struggle. How then can we maintain, in face of these facts, that the Jews as a people have rejected Jesus Christ? Are we to regard the crowd before Pilate as more representative than the thousands of believers who joined the Church?

There is still a further point to be considered. The Christian Church began as a movement of individuals and remained such for some centuries. It was only at the price of an unfortunate compromise that Christianity assumed a national form. To say that the Jews have rejected Jesus is to give to the Messianic movement a connotation which was contrary to its character. The idea of the remnant and the consciousness of election form the psychological background of the early Church. It was the individualistic character of the Messianic movement which contributed to the alienation of the followers of Jesus from the leaders of Judaism. While the Synagogue thought, and still thinks, to a large extent, in collective terms, Christianity is essentially dependent upon the personal decision of the individual. To deny this is to deny its very nature. Outward conformity belies the meaning of the Christian message.
"Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven" (Mt. 7:21). Recent events have abundantly revealed the baselessness of the affirmation that the Jews have rejected and the Gentiles accepted Jesus Christ. This is a view which demands correction. It is thus the second aim of this thesis to establish the fact of an always present Jewish element within the Christian Church. All through the centuries there was a steady flow of Jewish converts to Christianity. We will have occasion to show that, in the second century, there was an indigenous Jewish Church closely related to orthodox Christianity. This fact is of signal importance to the Church historian, for it links the Gentile Church with Palestine and the Hebrew Christian tradition. Scholars have hitherto worked on the assumption of a complete breach between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. Their attention was focussed upon Ebionism as the Jewish form of Christianity, overlooking the fact that there was in existence another branch holding similar views to those of the Gentile Church.

In our own days, there has been a rebirth of the Hebrew Christian tradition which remains almost unnoticed by modern writers. But the growing number of Jewish Christians belies the assertion that Christianity is a Gentile prerogative. It will be extremely difficult to prove that the Jews have rejected and the Gentiles accepted Jesus Christ. The truth is that some Jews and some Gentiles have accepted Him as their Master and Lord while many Jews and many Gentiles have remained either indifferent or hostile to the claims which he makes upon men.

b) Paul and the Hebrew Church.

The school which makes Paul responsible for the distinctly Christian theology of the Church offers only an apparent solution of the genesis of Christianity. It is now increasingly recognised that Paul's missionary activity would have been impossible without the authority and support of at least a section of the Church in Jerusalem. It must never be forgotten that at the time of Paul's conversion there was already in existence a Church enduring persecution. Paul entered the Church as a learner and a disciple. Ananias, who visited Paul in Damascus was a Jew, and so were probably the other disciples with whom he stayed after his conversion (Acts 9,10ff). Significantly enough, the belief that Jesus was the Son of God, a fact which dominated Paul's entire theology, he began to preach already in Damascus. The notion that Paul's views are derived from Antioch and not Jerusalem makes a division between these two Christian centres at such an early date historically unwarranted. There is, however, another factor which deserves all possible attention.

The fact of the Crucifixion of Jesus and the early persecution of the Christian Church is not an accidental but a constituent element in the Messianic movement. The reasons which led to the death of Jesus are still a puzzle to the careful observer. Objectively speaking there is nothing in the teaching of Jesus to explain the enmity on the part of the Jewish leaders. It is for this reason that scholars have tried to give Jesus' activity a political significance. Admittedly, only on political grounds is the condemnation of Jesus explicable. But against such a view stands the Christian primitive tradition bearing evidence to the aloofness of Jesus Christ from political issues. Some scholars have therefore called in question the veracity of the early tradition, explaining it by a pro-Roman tendency. But the whole character of the Christian movement makes such an explanation doubtful. In our view, the controversy between Jesus and his opponents was essentially of a religious nature and centred round his personal claims. The offence which he constituted to Judaism lay in the unique authority which he assumed. If this be the case, then the death of Jesus, the persecution of the disciples and the preaching of Paul, become logically connected. There is an intimate relationship between the Crucified Messiah of the Hebrew Church and the Glorified Christ of Pauline theology. If Jesus, after his crucifixion, was still regarded by his followers to be the true Messiah, then he could have been only preached as the ascended and glorified Christ. Faith in the Resurrection of the Messiah was no Pauline invention, it was a firmly held belief in the Jewish Church. Thus only is the Pauline Christ linked up with the historic Jesus, and this via the Church in Jerusalem. Paul's merit was to have given some coherence to a faith which was not only latent but actually present amongst the Jewish believers. The interposition of Paul between Jesus (viz. the Jewish disciples) and the Gentile Church does therefore not yield a satisfactory answer.

The third aim of this thesis is to show how an essentially Jewish movement became entirely detached from its original background and assumed a non-Jewish character.

c) The national element.

It appears to us that an important element in the relationship between Jesus and the Jews has been strangely overlooked. Most scholars are agreed that the struggle between Jesus and his opponents was of a religious nature. This is certainly true of the Synagogue and the early Church. The controversy between Judaism and Hebrew Christianity was naturally a religious controversy. After a protracted and bitter struggle it ended in the triumph of the Synagogue. But the success of the Synagogue is closely connected with the political situation of Jewry. The reason why this fact has been overlooked springs from the unfortunate assumption that the Christian movement was from the beginning mainly associated with the Gentile world and that Judaism remained relatively unaffected by it. It is our aim to show that such was not the case. The Messianic movement scored considerable success amongst the Jewish people, notably in the period between the Destruction of Jerusalem and the Bar Kochba rising and affected Judaism considerably. It was only after the Bar Kochba incident, when national survival became the sole consideration, that the initial success of Christianity abated.

The struggle between the Church and the Synagogue fell at a critical period in Jewish history. It is therefore natural that a religious controversy should at such a time become a national issue. The decision was hastened by the calamities which befell the nation. To maintain old established customs, to cling to the past, to turn away from everything which might endanger national survival, became imperative for the continuance of Jewish life. For this purpose, new barriers were erected, which were to segregate Israel from the world.

The destruction of the Temple assigned a new task to the Synagogue. It now became the centre of all spiritual and cultural life. This brought about not only the decline of Sadducean influence, but also of every other form of religious opposition. While before the Destruction one could be a good Jew without being a Pharisee, now Pharisaism and Judaism became synonyms. To this must be added the fact that the rapid growth of the Gentile Church constituted a new danger to the Jewish nation. There is an undeniable denationalising tendency associated with the Christian message. The breaking down of the barrier between Jew and Gentile spelt nothing but danger to a scattered people. From henceforth resistance to the Church became a national duty. Christianity ceased to be a sect within Judaism and became a dangerous rival threatening to disrupt Jewish life.

The importance of the national moment in Jewish-Christian relationship can be gauged from the attitude to the Christian convert even in modern times.

d) The Jewish-Christian controversy and Jesus Christ.

Both Church and Synagogue have always looked upon Jesus as the Founder of Christianity. Traditional Judaism opposed Christianity because it opposed Jesus, and vice versa, it opposed Jesus because it opposed Christianity. The religious associations connected with his name kept Jesus in age-long obscurity from his own people. Owing to certain trends in the modern study of primitive Christianity, however, it became possible to dissociate the Master of Nazareth from the subsequent Church. This prepared the way for a re-examination of the Jewish attitude to Jesus Christ. Since the appearance of the first Jewish monograph by Joseph Salvador (1796-1873), Jésus-Christ et sa doctrine (1839), books written by Jewish authors on this subject have greatly multiplied. It is now possible to speak of a distinctly Jewish Leben-Jesu-Forschung. The Jewish effort is directed to reclaiming Jesus the Jew from the Gentile Church and to reinstating him to a place of honour in Jewish history. This process of reclamation has continued for over a century and has been greatly accelerated in recent years.

It must, however, be remembered that Jewish interest in Jesus has little spiritual and no religious significance. The whole emphasis is upon the historical Jesus. Jewish attention is concentrated not so much upon the person, as upon the teaching of Jesus and its relationship to Judaism. Every effort is made to keep separate the Prophet of Nazareth from the Second Person of the Trinity. Thus, the discussion is shifted from the religious to a purely historical plane. The Jewish age-old controversy with the Church which hitherto centred round the significance of Jesus is thus brought to an abrupt end. The Christ of the Church, who owes his existence to Greek philosophy and Jewish apocalyptic speculations, has nothing in common with the great Nazarene. The discussion concerning Christian doctrine and the discussion concerning Jesus of Nazareth are two distinct themes.

But the nature of the Gospel and the claims which are associated with the person of Jesus inevitably force the discussion from the secular to the religious. In as much as the significance of Jesus is not limited to a certain period of time and his spiritual challenge extends to all ages, it is not easy to avoid entering upon a theological controversy, especially as the life and teaching of Jesus are so closely related to religion.

Furthermore, the complete separation between Jesus and the Church makes the fact of Christianity inexplicable. We have already had occasion to notice that Christianity is closely connected with the Church in Jerusalem and the Jewish disciples. Its foundation and its history are anchored in the person of Jesus Christ. Jewish scholars have therefore been unable to discuss Jesus of Nazareth without involving themselves in a theological dispute. This is specially the case with orthodox Jewish writers. Here is is admitted that Jesus and Christianity are closely related by ties of history and tradition and that to accept the one is to accept the other. Gösta Lindeskog has shown that the attempt of Jewish scholars to place Jesus within the boundaries of formative Judaism has proved unsuccessful. Jesus of Nazareth still stands outside the course of reconstructed history. He is still the great puzzle, the enigma, requiring a solution. But even Liberal Judaism has been unable to assign to Jesus a satisfactory position without jeopardizing its fundamental principles. Dr. C. D. Raven's opinion that the position of some Liberal Jews approaches in certain respects the position of some Christians regarding the person of Jesus, must be taken with utmost caution.

For even the most Liberal Christians will have to admit the unique significance of Jesus if they are to maintain their right to historic Christianity. But Liberal Judaism can admit no such uniqueness to any historical person without affecting the whole structure of Jewish thought.

It is the fourth purpose of this thesis to give a survey of the discussion in Jewish quarters concerning Jesus of Nazareth. The subject has been ably discussed by Gösta Lindeskog, and the present writer had to guard himself against the temptation of trespassing upon well-covered ground. This thesis is, in one sense, a continuation of the work done by Lindeskog, in that it brings back the discussion from the purely historical to the religious plane. In the last resort, the question concerning Jesus is a religious question. Jewish reclamation of the "historical" Jesus is of no real consequence to the Church or the Synagogue. The discussion between Judaism and Christianity transcends historical interest and is essentially a discussion of faith.

e) The juxtaposition of Church and Synagogue.

The ultimate purpose of this work is to provide the reasons which make Jesus in the Christian interpretation impossible to Judaism. Such a task demands a clear recognition of the essential differences between Judaism and Christianity. These differences lie in the sphere of philosophical and theological thinking: but in as much as human thought is the expression of an attitude to life, theological or philosophical differences lead back from the realm of abstract thinking to the concrete fact of existence. Thus, the differences between Church and Synagogue are not mere thought-differences, but real differences between men and men. They reveal a difference of attitude to the complex phenomena of life. Jewish-Christian relationship is conditioned by more than the historical, national and religious factors, though these are of vital importance. The fact that Jews are not Christians cannot merely be relegated to the caprice of history. The reason why Christianity won the hearts of millions, while Judaism did not, is not adequately explained by the adaptability of the former, as Klausner suggests, nor by the political preoccupation of the latter at the crucial moment, as Ziegler would have it. Judaism is above all, a characteristic religious attitude, independent of history and tradition. This attitude, though historically bound up with the Synagogue, is not confined to a particular race or creed, but underlies all religious endeavour. Deeply imbedded within the human soul is the inexorable will of man to work out his own salvation and to remain the master of his fate. This will to self-assertion is as much a fundamental fact in the Christian as in the Jew. It is here that the often repeated assertion that Christianity runs against the grain of human nature comes into evidence. The Christian attitude is essentially the attitude of surrender. Christianity begins with man in crisis, Judaism begins with the assertion of human strength. The real difference between Judaism and Christianity is in the difference of attitude, on the part of the individual believer. Seen from this angle, the Church indeed is invisible. The traditional division between Judaism and Christianity has only the outward form in view but not their inner nature. In terms of spiritual life, such a division is inaccurate. A Gentile can be a Jew by his inward attitude, though by reason of tradition he is a member of the Christian Church. On the other hand, a Jew can be a Christian without knowing it, though his religious connections tie him to Judaism. Thus, the traditional boundaries dividing the two faiths become fluid and their juxtaposition in the customary sense impossible. From the subjective point of view, the difference between Judaism and Christianity becomes a difference of emphasis, tendency or direction, rather than of clear-cut dogma. This led some writers to the conviction that the antagonism between Judaism and Christianity rests upon a misunderstanding; that by reason of their historical kinship, the two faiths, though expressing themselves in somewhat different language, mean the same thing; they strive towards the same end and are moved by the same spirit. In our concluding chapter we have therefore placed the most characteristic tendencies in Jewish thought vis à vis to the basic principles in Christian theology in order to bring out the deep difference of the two faiths. The result of such a juxtaposition revealed that the fundamental difference is derived from their respective teaching regarding man, and because they differ on this vital point, they of necessity differ on every other point.

Both Judaism and Christianity are the result of a major controversy which took place during the first and the first half of the second century. This controversy was of a theological nature and centred round the significance of Jesus of Nazareth. Our study has led us to the conviction that the general view which holds that Judaism remained unaffected by the Christian episode is untenable. Judaism had been deeply affected by the rise of Christianity and was pushed in the opposite direction. The opposition between the two creeds is thus an integral part of their separate existence. Only in opposition to each other do they learn the truth about themselves.

f) The problem of subjectivity.

Every writer on a religio-historical subject strives to eliminate the personal element and to present as much as possible an objective, i.e. "scientific" point of view. But the nature of our study has made such an approach impossible. For underlying this work is the assumption that a discussion concerning Jesus of Nazareth inevitably becomes a religious discussion. A religious discussion, however, in any real sense is only possible by taking sides. Buber and Schoeps have rightly stressed that a Jew can only view Christianity and a Christian Judaism from the outside. The recognition of this fact makes a purely academic approach difficult, if not impossible. We have thus tried to see and understand the Jewish point of view. But to carry on the discussion, we have been forced to take sides and we have made our stand upon positive Christianity. This work thus ends on a subjective note. To the Christian, the Jewish refusal to see in Jesus of Nazareth, the promised Messiah, is unbelief: not Jewish unbelief, but human unbelief. For the Jew, in retaining his attitude of negation to the Son of Man, becomes part and parcel of an unbelieving world. The Synagogue's No, is the human No to the Son of God who still knocks at the door of the heart of humanity.
CHAPTER II

JESUS CHRIST AND THE SYNAGOGUE.

It is not possible to investigate the attitude of the Jewish people towards Jesus Christ without taking into full account one of the most potent factors in Jewish life, the Synagogue. The Synagogue has, for centuries, moulded Jewish thought and fashioned the opinions of the individual Jew.

a. Judaism and Christianity.

Modern Jewish scholars have repeatedly maintained that Judaism has no dogmas and that, unlike Christianity, its stress is not upon orthodoxy, for which it has not even a "proper Hebrew equivalent", but rather upon "orthopraxy". This is true with some modifications. Judaism is certainly not a "dogmatic religion". "It possesses no organ having authority to regulate or control faith. We may even maintain that it does not permit of orthodoxy in the strict sense and leaves room for the widest freedom of thought". But it nevertheless has very definite dogmas, which are absolutely essential to Judaism. This is borne out by the fact of the Synagogue's reaction to heresy. The Talmud knows of four main kinds of heresies, one of which is undoubtedly Hebrew-Christianity. The attitude of the Synagogue to Gentile-Christianity varied with the circumstances under which Jews lived in Christian countries. The question sometimes discussed by the Rabbis was whether Christianity was to be classed with Abodah Zarah and the Christians regarded as געלים (Cultores stellarum et planetarum). This question has actually remained undecided and is still so for the orthodox Jew.
Judah ha-Levi (1085-1142) regards Christians and Mohammedans as proselytes who have not accepted the law in its entirety, and who still hold to idolatrous practices. Maimonides, (1135-1204) holds a similar view. It is the traditional view of the Synagogue "that Christianity's function is to be a sort of half-way house between heathenism and Judaism". The orthodox position, at present, seems to be that though "For purposes of social conduct, our contemporary Gentile friends cannot, of course, be compared with the idolators. Nevertheless, it must remain our bounden duty to eschew contact with them in religion and in matters having a religious basis, e.g. marriage". It is characteristic that in the language of the Talmud and the Rabbis, the words idolator and non-Jew are synonyms. Cultus alienus and cultus idolorum are the usual terms applied to the religious practices of the non-Jew. "Sie bezeichnen immer und überall Götze und Götzendienst, d.h. jeden nichtjüdischen Cultus".

Christianity would naturally fall under the category of non-Jewish religions. But both Islam and Christianity were recognized to serve a special purpose as having closer relationships with Judaism. Both were, nevertheless, severely criticized for falling below the standards of the Synagogue. Christianity was chiefly censured for its Trinitarian doctrine and for some idolatrous practices. It must be admitted that some Jewish criticism was justified. Referring to R. Isaac's criticism of the worship of images in the Christian Church, Lukyn Williams remarks: "In this last I confess that R. Isaac is right, right also in pointing out that although Christians may argue that images are made by them only for the honour of the saints, male and female, and not for prayer, yet even though this were said with truth of images made in metal, wood and stone, Christians cannot deny that they worship idols of bread, and pray to them, and say of each of them that it is God". We must therefore understand the scruples the Jews had with regard to Christianity. L. Rabinowitz has shown how circumstances and the ordinary necessities of life have had a modifying influence upon the stricter views as laid down in the Talmud with regard to the non-Jewish world. The leading Jewish theologians of the Middle Ages have thus decided that strict monotheism is only an obligation upon the Jewish people, while the Christians as the "Sons of Noah" were under no such obligation. Shittuf (= שיתוף), i.e. the combining of the name of God with something else, was not idolatry in the case of Christianity. R. Gershom of Mainz (d. 1040), Rashi (1040-1105), Isaac ben Sheshet (d. 1408), Joseph Caro (1488-1575) and many others have held that the Christians are proselytes of the gate cherem and not idolators.

But the Synagogue's attitude to early Hebrew Christianity was not determined by the same factors. To begin with, the notion of idolatry could not have arisen. The Jewish Church in Palestine was far removed from idolatry as the Rabbis were. Yet the Synagogue's attitude to the Messianic movement was not accidental. It saw in Christianity a grave departure from the Rabbinic point of view. Thus, the answer of the Synagogue was the only possible answer it could afford to give, a determined and absolute "No".

Most Jewish scholars and some Gentile scholars connect the hostility of the Synagogue towards the Christian movement with the name of Paul. They maintain that prior to the formulation of Paul's antinomian theology, there was no real antagonism. Both Jesus, as well as Hebrew Christianity, were firmly planted upon Jewish soil, and their Messianic faith gave no real cause for hostility. Antagonism developed later during the process of transformation from Hebrew-Christianity to Gentile-Christianity. But even then, Jewish animosity was provoked by the ever growing anti-Jewish trend within the Church. In support of this view, it is pointed out that there is manifestly less enmity amongst the Tannaim towards Jesus than amongst the Amoraim. 1

But the whole background of the New Testament points to an early hostility between the new Messianic movement and the Synagogue. Upon investigation, the tension leads back to the earliest days and centres round the person of Jesus himself. Prof. W. D. Niven rightly stresses the point "that the Apostles are preaching Jesus, whom the Council had condemned". 20 This fact must not be overlooked in an attempt to understand early Jewish-Christian relationships. To find the reasons which led to an open condemnation of Jesus is the problem which Church historians have repeatedly to face.

On the Jewish side, it is often emphatically denied that there was any legal procedure against Jesus, as all the evidence points against it. Rabbi I. M. Wise makes much of the fact that the Jews at that time were not at liberty to execute capital punishment. 21 Jesus was never brought before the court of the Sanhedrin, "the only body competent, under Jewish law, to try a charge involving the death penalty. Almost every rule of that law was, indeed, trampled on in the case of Jesus of Nazareth". 22 But both Montefiore and Klausner admit the possibility of a trial, though "that there was any meeting of the full Sanhedrin is most doubtful". 23

Jewish scholars are almost unanimous in their plea that the Gospels contain a definite anti-Jewish bias and that their evidence therefore does not reflect true history. The object of the Gospels is "to whitewash Pilate, and to throw the responsibility of the crucifixion upon the Jews". But however the case may be, it cannot easily be denied that Jesus met with strong opposition. Who were Jesus' enemies and why?

b. Jesus and the two main Parties.

The importance of the political background in the struggle between Jesus and his opponents is an element which deserves due notice. Jewish scholars have paid much attention to this aspect, as it appears to provide a clue for the solution of the problem of the reason for the condemnation and death of Jesus. Some hints of the political significance of the struggle between Jesus and his opponents are contained in the Gospels. But Jewish emphasis upon the political implications of Jesus' activity is due to a desire to exonerate the Pharisaic party. The prevailing view amongst Jewish scholars is that there were no basic points of difference between Jesus and the Pharisees; on the contrary, they had much in common. The Pharisees, therefore, could not have been involved in the plot against Jesus. This led to two conclusions, first, that the Gospels misrepresent the case, and secondly, that Jesus' enemies are to be sought outside the Pharisaic party.

1. The Sadducees.

It was therefore held that the most obvious enemies of Jesus were the Sadducees. They were the only people whose interest it was to maintain the political status quo. They must have objected to Jesus, not only on doctrinal grounds, but also for the political implications of his Messianic claims, and for his interference with the established institutions. Their first concern was not to provoke the Roman masters, in case they "come and take away both our place and our nation". This does not mean, of course, that the Sadducees were friends of Rome by choice. But they were realists, they understood the utter impossibility of freeing themselves from Roman supremacy and as their own position was safeguarded, they readily accepted foreign domination. Klausner calls them "practical politicians" who had reasons to oppose "any change which might disturb their peace and their enjoyment of the pleasures of this life". To the Sadducees, Jesus was nothing more than another political rebel who must be dealt with quickly before it was too late. Thus, Jewish scholars are almost unanimous in putting the blame for the condemnation of Jesus upon the shoulders of the priestly party, "who were Israel's despots and the tools of Roman masters". C. G. Montefiore, who usually exercises restrained judgement, inclines to that view, but he cautiously admits the possibility that the Sadducean priesthood may have had the support of some of the leading Rabbis, and who, together with the Sadducees and the Romans, may be held responsible for the death of Jesus.

An unusual view is presented by Rudolf Leszynsky, who is the only Jewish writer to champion the cause of the Sadducees. Leszynsky is able to find important points of agreement between Jesus and the Sadducees. He contends that Christianity, in fact, was at one time much nearer to Sadduceeism, than is usually held possible. Thus, Jesus' attitude to the ritual washing of hands (p.43,207); his attitude to the obligation of paying the Shekel (p.69); his views concerning the Davidic descent of the Messiah (p.297); but above all, his interpretation of the Law of Moses, was essentially Sadducean (p.284). Leszynsky attaches importance to the fact that Jesus never spoke against the sacrifices. This leads him to the conclusion: "Das Gesetz Moses war es also nicht, was Jesus ablehnte, wohl aber die Gesetze der Pharisaer. The fact that the Christian Church has fixed Easter day to fall on a Sunday and has thus decided in the controversy between Sadduceeism and Pharisaism regarding the interpretation of "אָנָּם יִרְאוּ" in favour of the Sadducees is, to Leszynsky, another link in his chain of evidence.

This does not mean that Leszynsky claims for Jesus absolute agreement with Sadduceeism. He does not. We are told that in several important points Jesus differed from the Sadducees. In his faith in the Resurrection, and in his attitude to the Lex talionis, Jesus approached the Pharisaiic view. Otherwise Jesus was on the side of the Sadducees. His whole effort was directed against Pharisaism: "Die Hauptgegner der neuen Lehre waren von Anfang an die Pharisaer. Gegen sie richtete Jesus seine Angriffe". Though the Sadducees had little sympathy with him, the real enemies against whom he fought throughout his life were the Pharisees. Leszynsky suggests that the reasons why these facts were hitherto overlooked, lie in the difficulties of investigating the history of Sadduceeism. "Während wir die Entwicklung des Pharisäertumes Schritt für Schritt verfolgen können, liegt die Geschichte des Sadduzäismus für uns ziemlich im Denkeln."

Leszynsky's efforts have not been received favourably by Jewish scholars. His views are regarded as extravagant and ill-founded. Abrahams dismisses him with an exclamation mark, and Klausner with a few sentences. Admittedly, Leszynsky's evidence is slender and his conclusions lack convincing power. But the importance of his work lies not so much in his assertions as in the fact that it is possible to make out a reasonable case for the Sadducees. This ought to caution those who make unqualified affirmations about the sole importance of Pharisaism and its influence upon Jesus.

Chwolson's views regarding the Sadducean attitude to Jesus may be taken as the accepted opinion of Jewish scholars up to this day.

Chwolson is convinced that the Sadducees are solely responsible for the death of Jesus. From the case of James (Jos., Antiq. XX,9,1), he deduces: "dass die Sadduzäer die Verfolger und die Phariseer noch im Jahre 62 die Verteidiger der verfolgten Christen waren". He points to the fact that at the time of Jesus, the Pharisees were only aspiring to power; they were in the minority in the Sanhedrin and decisively overruled by the Sadducean majority. They had no cause for condemning Jesus, who faithfully observed the commandments, and who never opposed Pharisaism as such, but only certain private opinions of individual Pharisees. Chwolson ends his remarkable essay with the following words: "Nicht das jüdische Volk, auch nicht die Phariseer sind schuld an dem Tod Christi, sondern die habsüchtigen aristokratischen Priester, die feigen Römlinge, welche vor den römischen Behörden zitterten, um ihre reichen Einnahmen besorgt waren und in Christus einen politischen Agitator, einen neuen Judas Galiläus, witterten – diese, und keine Anderen, waren die Henker Jesu Christi".

2. The Pharisees.

We owe a real debt to Jewish scholarship for correcting many long-established views about Pharisaism. Jewish scholars have vigorously protested against the indiscriminate condemnation of the Pharisaic party by Christian writers. Their main line of defence is a) that the Gospels exaggerate Jesus' opposition to the Pharisees, and that far from holding diverse views, they had much in common; and b) that Jesus' attack was directed against the bad Pharisees only, a feature which we also meet in the Talmud.

a) The Synoptic account of the Pharisees.

Dr. James Parkes, who is strongly influenced by the Jewish point of view, is driven to the conclusion that all the anti-Pharisaic passages in the Gospels "come from a Judeo-Christian source, from Christians very conscious of their membership in Israel, of their obedience to Torah, but in violent conflict with the Pharisees over the orthodoxy of their position". But Dr. Parkes offers this only as a "probable explanation". It is, however, clear to him that the Gospels were written "on a background of the steady intensification of the conflict between Gentile Christians and the Jews" and that none of the authors were personally acquainted with Palestinian Pharisees or Rabbinic Judaism. "They were not themselves aware of how much of the teaching of Jesus which they recorded was Pharisaic". Such is also the Jewish view.

H. Loewe, referring to Mt. 23, says: "It seems to me most natural to regard the chapter as intentionally altered by later hands. The objection to it is not the denunciations, but the fact that the denunciations are wholesale". Klausner accepts in part D. Chwolson's suggestion "that much of the opposition shown in the Gospels to Pharisaism and Judaism generally was directed against the Sadducees". But the real explanation for Klausner is contained in A. Büchler's view that the Gospel writers have confused, out of ignorance, the terms Scribes and Pharisees, and used them as if they were synonyms, ignorant of the fact that 'the chiefs of the priests and the Scribes and the elders' of whom we read in the Gospels "were almost entirely Sadducees. Such a mistake could have only arisen at a time when "the Sadducees had lost power and importance" as actually happened in the period when the Gospels were written. A similar view is put forth by Montefiore, who explains that "Matthew often unites the Pharisees and the Sadducees. He probably had only a vague, un-historical idea who the Pharisees and Sadducees were. All he knew, or cared to know, was that they were opponents of his hero. Such a theory implies three assumptions: a late composition of the Gospels in a non-Jewish milieu; complete ignorance concerning Jewish life, especially in the case of Matthew (!); and the immediate disappearance of the Sadducean party after the destruction of Jerusalem. Indeed, Jewish scholars have tended to accept a very late date for the Gospels. Klausner's moderate view is that Mark was composed between 66-68, Matthew "after the Destruction and near the end of the century" and Luke "at the beginning of the second century." Almost all Jewish writers stress anti-Jewish tendencies in the Gospels, and ignorance concerning things Jewish. It is also generally assumed by Jewish, as well as Christian scholars, that Sadduceeism ceased to exert any influence with the destruction of the Temple. But it must be admitted that we know only of Sadducean history on Pharisaic evidence, and that it is still an unexplored field. Jewish scholars have devoted much time to the study of Pharisaism; this is partly due to apologetic motives. Sadduceeism, as Leszynsky has pointed out, is still a mystery to us. S. Schechter, in his introduction to the Documents of Jewish Sectaries, appends the following note to his remark concerning the unsatisfactory state of knowledge regarding the history of Sadduceeism: "It need hardly be pointed out that there are both in the Hagada and in the Halacha of our sect (i.e. the Zadokites) features which strikingly recall the famous hypothesis of Geiger regarding the Sadducees and the Old Halacha. But this hypothesis is still so undeveloped in its details, that it seems better to leave the subject in abeyance. It is a further and larger question whether we have to deal with a sort of counter-tradition or with an interpretation claiming to go back to primitive Judaism. Leszynsky, who seems to owe much to the hints contained in Schechter's study, affirms the connection between the ancient Sadducees and the Karaite movement. He even suggests that Sadducean traditions have survived amongst the Abyssinian Falashas and the Samaritans. However the case may be, the assumption that the Sadducees disappeared immediately after the destruction of the Temple, is nothing more than a generally accepted hypothesis, founded on the usual argumentum ex silentio. As to the exact dates of compilation of the various Gospels in their present form, the question is open to argument and we are entirely left to conjecture. To assume complete ignorance concerning the difference between Pharisaism and Sadduceeism on the part of the Evangelists, is to ignore obvious facts. For it cannot be easily denied that the Gospels presuppose a very thorough knowledge of Jewish traditions and local circumstances. Israel Abrahams claims such knowledge even for John.

Jesus and the bad Pharisees.

The other alternative is to assume that the criticism of the Gospels directed against the Pharisees, much of which undoubtedly goes back to Jesus, has only the bad representatives of that party in view. Most Jewish scholars take this view. Moritz Friedländer is an exception. Klausner explains Jesus' attitude in the sense that his criticism was actually not an attack but a defence of Pharisaism against cant and hypocrisy.\textsuperscript{55} Israel Abrahams warns against the danger of confusing a system with its abuses.\textsuperscript{56} Montefiore readily accepts the possibility that there could have been living examples of a perversion of the Pharisaic religion, but to apply Luke's parable of the Pharisee to all members is a "\textit{ludicrous} caricature of the average Pharisee, a \textit{monstrous} caricature of the Pharisaic ideal".\textsuperscript{57} H. Loewe refuses to accept Prof. Burkitt's suggestion that the discrepancy between the Gospel account and the Rabbinic picture of the Pharisees may have been caused by the transformation which took place in their ranks after the national disaster of A.D. 70. Loewe rather favours the opinion that Jesus' attacks were directed against some sectaries who stood mid-way between Pharisaic and Sadducean tradition, trying to reconcile their divergence, and thus giving the impression of being Pharisees. Loewe is convinced that "\textit{against the} Pharisees, as the term is commonly understood, they could not have been directed".\textsuperscript{58} On the contrary, Jewish scholars have repeatedly affirmed, that Jesus stood firmly upon Pharisaic ground. All the noble and commendable features of his teaching have their origin in the Pharisaic ideal. It is commonplace amongst Jewish writers to present Pharisaism in Lindeskog's words: "als das edelste Erzeugnis des j\ddischen Volkes" - the deepest and most perfect expression of Judaism.\textsuperscript{59}
However, Jewish scholars admit the existence of friction between Jesus and the religious leaders of his time.\textsuperscript{60} For it is not possible to overlook the unanimous witness of the Gospels to such a struggle. But only reluctantly do they admit participation of the Pharisaic party in the contest. The reason for this is in the eagerly made assertion that there is absolute unity of purpose between the Pharisees and Jesus. From the Synoptic account, it would appear that the Pharisees, in so far as they enjoyed greater popularity as the leaders of religious life, play also a more prominent part as the antagonists of Jesus. Herford's presentation of Pharisaism and its attitude to the Christian movement shows a definite bias. A. T. Robertson has conclusively shown the prominence given in the Synoptic Gospels to the tension between Jesus and the Pharisees. Even Parkes admits that "every source deals with points of conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees, the leaders of Rabbinic Judaism." Parkes, however, dissolves the conflict by accepting the theory that Jesus' attack was directed against the bad Pharisees; against those who "failed to live up to the truth they already possessed". This emphasis upon Jesus' agreement with the good Pharisees and his castigation of the bad is by no means a Jewish invention. This has been, and still is, an often repeated view on the part of Christian writers, but it avoids the main problem.

The Synoptic tradition does not merely present Jesus as a moral teacher castigating the sins and shortcomings of religious devotees; he rather stands out as a royal figure making supreme claims. It is difficult to escape the impression that the clash between Jesus and the Pharisees is of a fundamental nature. The issues involved are greater than mere petty failings. The actual cause of the friction cuts right across the very essence of religious life. The clash between Jesus and the Pharisees, is ultimately the clash of two vital principles in constant opposition to each other: the categorical imperative of eternity, and the ever compromising principle of time. There may be more than would appear in the Jewish contention that the demands which Jesus made are irreconcilable with the experience of life.
The theory which attributes the anti-Pharisaic passages to later accretions, completely ignores the basic nature of the conflict.

3. The Law.

Jewish scholars have naturally paid much attention to Jesus' attitude to the Law. Both Montefiore and Klausner have discussed the subject carefully. In Montefiore's view, Jesus, driven by his prophetic temperament "was compelled to take up a certain attitude towards the Mosaic Law itself, and this attitude was novel and even revolutionary". Klausner, too, after considering the various instances in the Gospels bearing on the subject says: "Thus, Jesus would abrogate not only fasting, and decry the value of washing of hands in the 'tradition of the elders', or in current traditional teaching, but would even permit (though he does this warily and only by hints) the foods forbidden in the Law of Moses". It is held that this strange laxity towards the Law ultimately completed the breach between him and the Pharisees. But in spite of this, Klausner claims for Jesus absolute and faithful adherence to Judaism. "Jesus was a Jew and a Jew he remained till his last breath", a Jew, of course, in the religious sense. Lindeskog, has already pointed out the inconsistency. Israel Abrahams avoids the difficulty by assuming that the controversy about the Law revealed only a difference of interpretation and in the case of the most vital point of the dispute, the Sabbath, the controversy was only of a local character. Jesus thus still stands within the Jewish tradition. His attitude to the Law simply represents a different point of view. While to the Pharisees "all labour not pressing and postponable was forbidden", to Jesus, "no act of mercy, whether the need pressed or not, was to be intermittently because of the Sabbath".
Jewish scholars, however, are aware that there is an air about Jesus which is very different from the submissive acceptance of the Law we meet in Pharisaism. Klausner brings this point out very clearly. He even attributes Paul's revolutionary attitude to the Law to the fact that the Founder of Christianity gave the precedent. This is an important admission, which throws new light upon the discussion on the relationship between Jesus and Paul. To quote Klausner himself: "had not Jesus' teaching contained a kernel of opposition to Judaism, Paul could never in the name of Jesus have set aside the ceremonial laws, and broken through the barriers of national Judaism". But this "kernel of opposition" is to Klausner nothing more than an implicit tendency, an overemphasis of characteristic Jewish teaching; it is, in fact, nothing more than "exaggerated Judaism". Travers Herford, who usually represents the Jewish point of view, holds, that Jesus "was really rejected, so far at all events as the Pharisees were concerned, because he undermined the authority of the Torah, and endangered the religion founded upon it". But it is here that we meet with a strange contradiction. Jewish scholars generally deny that Jesus was consciously opposed to the Law. Klausner inconsistently holds that Jesus did not even attack the ceremonial laws, but that he laid little stress on them.

This basic dilemma is not easily solved. Both views, though contradictory, seem to contain a kernel of truth. In view of the evidence we have, it cannot be easily maintained that Jesus impeached the authority of the Law, consciously or unconsciously. Prof. Branscomb's opinion, that Jesus arbitrarily, as it seems, selected a few basic commandments of a positive religious and ethical character "and disregarded the other precepts whenever they came in conflict with these primary commandments in any way is unacceptable, unless his action was supported by an authority exceeding that of the Law. Prof. Branscomb probably implies this, though he brings it down to a specific "understanding of the divine Revelation" on the part of Jesus himself, and to his conscious opposition to the "Pharisaic interpretation of the Torah given by God." Prof. Branscomb's statement to the effect that Jesus "dealt with the written law as freely as he did with the oral", and the stress upon "the basic moral principles of the Torah", is inclined to impute modern liberal ideas to the mind of Jesus. Neither is it possible to subscribe to the view that Jesus' intention was wholesale repudiation of the Pharisaic understanding of the Law, as Branscomb suggests, since the Gospels record instances where the contrary is asserted. Prof. T. W. Manson's views are more convincing. Jesus neither rejected the Law, nor did he lightly disregard any of its commands and prohibitions. If he breaks them, he does so consciously in the interests of something greater than the Law and the Temple. That something is the Kingdom of God. But even Prof. Manson's view is defective. It does not draw the last conclusion; it avoids the problem of which inevitably comes to the front and which was actually the point under discussion between Jesus and the Jewish authorities. Manson presents Jesus "as the Servant par excellence of the Kingdom of God", who is ready to sweep away all obstacles hampering its approach. Jesus, however, was not only the Servant of the Kingdom, he knew himself also to be the King. This aspect of Jesus' Messianic consciousness is an essential element underlying his action.

Montefiore denies that Jesus claimed the right as Messiah to dispense men from the obligation of the Law. He holds with Menzies, however, that when necessity arose to defend a higher principle, Jesus did not hesitate to break the Mosaic precepts. But that the Son of Man is lord also of the Sabbath, applying ὁ νικώτως ἀνθρώπου to his own person, Montefiore rejects as improbable. At the same time, he favours the view that Jesus held himself to be the Messiah, though he "does not appear to claim authority over the commands of the Law in virtue of his Messiahship". By what right then, we would ask, does Jesus set at naught Mosaic commandments, which both he and his opponents believed to have been ordained by God Himself? Montefiore's assertion has no support in the Gospels, which unequivocably create a contrary impression, especially Mark 2, 28. The question round which the whole issue revolves is not whether Jesus' conception of the Messiah was in accordance with Jewish views, apocalyptic or otherwise; but whether Jesus assigned such extraordinary authority to the Messianic office as to set the Messiah above the Law. It cannot easily be denied that the intention of the Gospels is to propagate such an impression. The question whether such an attitude is true to the historical picture of Jesus is open to discussion. In our view, the Gospels record actual fact. Jesus did not hesitate to brush aside certain Rabbinic injunctions. But this could have been relegated to a mere difference in exegetical method, as Abrahams suggests. He actually did more. To use Prof. Branscomb's words, he "dealt with the written law as freely as he did with the oral". But this not in defence of some dogmatic principle, or moral ideal. The authority for such unexemplified behaviour must be sought somewhere else, namely in his Messianic consciousness.

Jesus' attitude to the Law was neither determined by humanistic motives nor moralistic scruples. Not even the cause of the Kingdom of God would justify his action, had it not been for the fact that he identified the Kingdom with his own person. It is as the Servant of God, the King Messiah, that Jesus claimed the authority which he knew to be delegated to him by God. In view of his humble, submissive acceptance of the will of God, Constantin Brummer's theory, that Jesus, claiming the highest authority, approached an atheistic point of view, falls extremely flat.

Jesus never questioned the authority of the Law. He accepted it as divinely appointed. God had given it, and only God could annul it. Its duration was determined by the approach of the Messianic Age. Only the Messiah, as the Messenger of God, stood above the authority of the Law. Such an attitude was neither rebellion, nor presumption, it was dictated by an unique self-consciousness.

The Messianic Age, however, was not to terminate the Law, nor to supersede it. The purpose of its coming was the fulfilling of the same. Matthew 5, 17 - αὐτὸς Ἰησοῦς Χριστός ἐκάθεν ἦν θεαματικός και οὐκ ἔνα γράμμα τὸν νόμον - throws important light upon the Christian attitude towards the Law, and may well reflect Jesus' own position. Admittedly, this much discussed passage is full of difficulties. To start with, it has no parallel in the Synoptic tradition, it is peculiar to Matthew only. It belongs to the passages with a definite "Judaistic tendency". It has been questioned whether the passage can be safely attributed to Jesus himself, and opinions are naturally divided. Once we have accepted the passage as genuine, there is still the exegetical difficulty of determining the meaning of "πληρώσω αὐτῷ".

Streeter regards Matthew 5, 17-20 as reflecting the attitude of the Jewish Christians who grouped themselves round the person of James. Referring to this and other "Judaistic passages" in Matthew, Streeter remarks: "it is difficult not to suspect the influence of the desire of the followers of James to find a justification for their disapprobation of the attitude of Paul by inventing sayings of Christ, or misquoting sayings which, even if authentic, must originally have been spoken in view of entirely different circumstances". On these grounds, Streeter seems to deny authenticity to the whole paragraph. But his argument is not conclusive: 1) the fact that v.17 was not in Q does not therefore qualify it as unauthentic. 2) v.18 has a parallel in Luke 16,17, and is therefore derived from a common source. 3) Matthew's attitude to the Law is not as "Judaistic" as some would make out. This is testified by the presence of 11,13, of which Streeter admits that: "whatever its original meaning, certainly lends itself to the view that the Old Law was in a sense suspended by the Gospel". 4) the whole passage is in complete agreement with Jesus' attitude to the religious past of Israel. We therefore accept v.17 as authentic.

The further question is as to the meaning of πλησοῦν. Montefiore, who discusses the passage at some length, cautiously says: "It seems to say that the standpoint of Jesus is not that he desired to abolish the Law, but to deepen it, and in that sense to fulfil or complete it. The righteousness of the Law, so far as the mere letter goes, is inadequate for the disciples or for the Christian". The intention of the Sermon on the Mount was to give to the Commandments larger scope and greater depth. Montefiore, therefore, speaks of Jesus as "the new legislator". But this may prove a misapplied term. The passage in question gives no warrant for such an appellation.
The question is, what was the original word which Jesus used for πλησοῦν? Strack-Billerbeck say: "Jesus wird statt πλησοῦν ρήτο gesagt haben, dessen Gegensatz das oben für καταλυέσιν vermutete ἔστι...bildete." ρήτο is the most obvious word to suggest, it was, and still is in universal usage, and always associated with the fulfilment of the ἐκκλησία. But if this be the case, then the attitude of Jesus towards the Law is that of humble submission. Such a view may suggest an inconsistency on the part of Jesus, and Montefiore is quick to recognise this. He thinks that it is not possible to arrive at a certain conclusion "as to Jesus' theoretic attitude towards the Law, because he probably had not faced the question himself". In our view, however, there is no actual inconsistency involved. If we accept the passage as it stands, then the clue to the puzzle is contained in the words: ἐως ἐν πάντα γένηται, to which Montefiore remarks: "it is a strange expression as applied to the Law".

There is an inner connection between ἐως ἐν πάντα γένηται and the words in Matthew 11,13: πάντες γὰρ εἰ προφῆτα καὶ ὅνων ἐως ἐπαννυν ἐπροφήτευσαν. If we accept Luke 16,16 as the more original, at any rate, the more lucid text, then the connection becomes even more apparent.

The Law and the Prophets form the background of Jesus' activity. His appearance, which marks the approach of the New Age, does not annul or abrogate the Law, it fulfils it. All that the Law and the prophets were standing for, hinting at, is now being realised, fulfilled and accomplished. Thus, the King Messiah has not come to annul ( ἐκκλησία) the Law, on the contrary. The Law stands ( ρήτο) in all its sanctity, in all its significance, but only: ἐως ἐν πάντα γένηται. In the days of the Messiah, however, the Law will be written within the hearts of God's people. This is the mark of the New Covenant (Jer. 31, 31ff). To Jesus, his Messianic activity was the commencement of the New Era: His coming breaks history in two parts. The Law and the Prophets on one side; the Gospel of the Kingdom on the other side (Luke 16,16). But in a deeper sense, the Law and the Prophets and the Gospel of the Kingdom are one. They stand to each other as promise to fulfilment.

We would, therefore, repudiate the view that Jesus sought to abolish the Law. It is even doubtful whether he opposed the Pharisaic interpretation of it, as is sometimes asserted. Mt. 23 appears to be, not a condemnation of Pharisaic exegesis, but rather of Pharisaic deeds. Oesterley's suggestion that Jesus accepted the Law in principle "but modified and expanded it where necessary", even to the extent of abrogating it altogether in the name of "a higher morality and a more spiritual religion", we categorically repudiate. Such a view is only possible on the assumption that to Jesus, the Law was not divinely instituted. But such an assumption has no foundation. On the contrary, there is every reason to assume that Jesus regarded the Law as God-given. But, to quote Montefiore again: "if you believed that the Law was divine, you believed that it was all divine, and not only a few sentences here and there; you took the Law at its own valuation". Montefiore's complaint that "some commentators do not seem to understand what divineness of the Law means", is well justified.

It appears to us that the whole problem concerning the Law must be placed against a wider issue. We would deny that the central point in the controversy between Jesus and his opponents was concerning the permanency of the Law. This was only a side-issue by way of implication. It became a burning problem at a somewhat later stage between the Church and the Synagogue. But the main point at issue between Jesus and the authorities was on a different plane. It centred round the person of Jesus himself. Before we enter upon this vital question, there is still one point to be considered.

4. The teaching of Jesus.

Jewish scholars have emphatically affirmed the utter Jewishness of Jesus. They have, with great patience, collected abundant material to prove the close connection between Jesus and Judaism. This led to the conclusion that the subject-matter of Jesus' teaching contained nothing new for the Synagogue. Abraham Geiger, in his essay, Das Judentum und seine Geschichte, had already pointed to this fact. To Geiger, Jesus was a Pharisee "mit galiläischer Färbung, ein Mann, der die Hoffnung der Zeit teilte und diese Hoffnung in sich erfüllt glaubte. Einen neuen Gedanken sprach er keineswegs aus, auch brach er nicht die Schranken der Nationalität". Almost all Jewish writers of more recent date hold a similar view. An extreme example is Paul Goodman. Rabbi Goodman tells us that "it can be safely asserted, without any attempt to depreciate his greatness, that there was no utterance, however striking or characteristic, emanating from Jesus (with the sole exception of the idea of non-resistance) which cannot be traced often in identical words to the teachings of the Jewish schools". Even Montefiore, who is characteristically cautious in his judgements, finds it difficult to detect new elements in the teaching of Jesus unknown to the Judaism of his time: "if we ask wherein his hearers found the teaching of Jesus new, inspired, prophetic... it is not quite easy to reply".
is the more important when we remember that of all Jewish writers, Montefiore shows the most earnest desire to appreciate the significance of Jesus. He warns against the Jewish tendency of depreciating his originality, and contends that the teaching of Jesus must be taken as a whole, and thus it will prove to be more than a mere dissected list of injunctions. He admits that in comparing Talmud and Gospels, "the originality is almost always on the side of the Gospels." But for all that, there is no actual difference between Jesus and the Rabbis. Montefiore thus concludes: "My verdict would be that Jesus unites himself with the very best Rabbinic teaching of his own and of later times. It is, perhaps, only in trenchantness and eager insistence that he goes beyond it. There is a fire, a passion, an intensity, a broad and deep positiveness about these verses, (Luke 6:27ff), which is new." It is thus not the subject-matter of his doctrine, but the spirit of Jesus which distinguishes him from the Rabbis: it is heroic, ethical, compelling to action. But it also contains "a remarkable blend" of "the higher selfishness and the highest unselfishness"; it shows signs of a double ethic. The originality of Jesus is thus to be sought in his attitude and bearing rather than in novelty of doctrine. "It was in these more undefinable and subtler ways that the teaching, like the bearing, of Jesus was new, inspired, prophetic, rather than in any novelty of doctrine in any one definite particular." To Montefiore, therefore, the significance of the New Testament lies in that it corrects and supplements "sometimes more fully, sometimes more brilliantly, sometimes with fresh illumination and from a novel point of view", what was already in the possession of Rabbinic Judaism. "But it does not, for the most part, contain what we, from our Liberal Jewish point of view can regard as completely new doctrine which is also true doctrine."

Orthodox Jewish writers are even more emphatic in asserting Jesus' dependence upon Judaism. Loewe, who at first admitted an element of novelty in Jesus' conception of faith, on second thoughts retracted. He holds that the conception of faith we meet in the Gospels is a regression to a more primitive stage in Israel's development. It is a faith based upon miracles and upheld by the desire for direct answer to prayer. The Rabbis were less primitive in their views. In this respect, they stood above Jesus.\

It is, however, admitted that there existed points of difference between Jesus and the Pharisees, though I. M. Wise and Ziegler deny such a possibility. They both protest against the idea that "die edlen Sittenlehren Jesu wären mit Ursache seines Sturzes gewesen". It is Ziegler's conviction that neither Pharisees nor Sadducees could have possibly objected to the teaching of Jesus: "Die Ideale Jesu waren Gemeingut des jüdischen Gedankenlebens von den alten Propheten her...Wer die Bergpredigt bewundert, bewundert das Judentum, bewundert die jüdische Ethik". It is for this reason that Ziegler holds the Herodias solely responsible for the death of Jesus.

Klausner enumerates several points which mark the difference between Jesus and the Pharisees. 1) While to Jesus, the near approach of the Kingdom was the main burden of his message, to the Scribes and Pharisees it was only of secondary importance. 2) While the Scribes and Pharisees laid equal stress upon the ceremonial and moral laws, Jesus singled out the moral laws as of greater importance. 3) Whereas for the Scribes and Pharisees, the exposition of Scripture was of basic importance, "Jesus relied but slightly on Scripture, wrapping up his teaching altogether in parable form". 4) While to the Pharisees, the the teaching was of primary importance, and miracles only secondary, to Jesus "teaching and miracles possessed equal importance". 23

On examination, it soon becomes evident, that none of Klausner's points explain fully the breach between Jesus and the religious authorities. On his own evidence, three points reveal only a difference of emphasis. Point 2 - the most likely to cause friction - is also eliminated by Klausner's assertion that Jesus did not try to abolish the ceremonial laws. For all that, Klausner is aware of an important division between Jesus and the Pharisees. It is here that the weakest point of his contention appears. We are told that "the Pharisees objected to Jesus' behaviour - his disparagement of many ceremonial laws, his contempt of the words of the "sages" and his consorting with publicans and ignorant folk and doubtful women. They (i.e. the Pharisees) considered his miracles sorcery and his Messianic claims effrontery." Yet with all that, Klausner continues, "he was one of themselves: his convinced belief in the Day of Judgment, and the resurrection of the dead, the Messianic age and the kingdom of heaven, was a distinctively Pharisaic belief; he taught nothing which, by the rules of the Pharisees, rendered him criminally guilty". 24

Klausner thus reveals an indecisive position in which Jesus and the Pharisees appear friends and enemies at the same time, they have much in common, but they also greatly differ. Psychologically impossible is his suggestion, that the Pharisees whom he himself calls the enemies of Jesus, withdrew at the critical moment, leaving his trial in the hands of the irritated Sadducees. Such a supposition is necessitated by the determination to exonerate the Pharisees at all costs.

There can be little doubt that Jewish criticism has had a salutary effect upon the natural tendency to reduce the importance of Jesus to the originality of his teaching. In this way, Jewish scholars have helped considerably to rectify an old established notion. It is still held in certain quarters that the significance of Jesus lay in the new values which he taught. Dr. G. Hollmann thus tells us that Jesus brought about "a complete change of value in the decisive, fundamental factors" of Judaism. He explains that before the time of Jesus, Judaism "oscillated dubiously between two extremes. There was no certainty of salvation". Jewish writers have vigorously protested against such affirmation. In view of this situation, it is not possible any more to insist upon the absolute novelty of the teaching of Jesus.

This brings us to the question as to the nature of Jesus' mission. It is sometimes held that his aim was the reformation of Judaism. According to this view, Jesus was essentially a moral reformer. He never intended to replace Judaism or to break away from it. His aim was "reform and not abolition". His quarrel with Pharisaism was not because of its refusal to accept his doctrine, but because the Pharisees "failed to live up to the truth they already possessed". Dr. Parkes finds proof for his assertions in the following facts: Jesus accepted the Torah as Divine revelation; he visited the Synagogues and preached in them; his teaching in so far as it was connected with the past "was Pharisaic in character"; Jesus and the Pharisees shared the same ideals; and finally, that Jesus never rejected Judaism nor the Jews. On these grounds, Dr. Parkes sees reason to maintain that Jesus, like the other prophets, stood in the main stream of Judaism, and that he never intended "either to supersede or to reject the religion of Israel". This, however, opens once again the question as to the reason for the conflict between Jesus and the Synagogue. Dr. Parkes explains it by the attested rule that "the prophet is not accepted by the regular authorities of established religious institutions, and that reform in religion comes slowly".

Some of Dr. Parkes' conclusions deserve full acknowledgment, especially his insistence upon the continuity of Jewish tradition in the New Testament. But though Parkes tries to guard himself against the charge "that the whole mission of Jesus was simply to reform certain abuses in Pharisaism", he has not succeeded in preventing such a conclusion.

Against Dr. Parkes' assertion that "nothing in the teaching of Jesus made necessary the separation between Judaism and Christianity", we would place Klausner's maxim: ex nihilo nihil fit. We agree, however, that the main cause of friction was not connected with his teaching, which was basically Old Testament doctrine.

Dr. Parkes has failed to include in his considerations some important facts: 1) Jesus, by assuming the role of Messiah (a fact Dr. Parkes does not deny) set himself above the position of a prophet; 2) Jesus, as Messiah, knew himself inaugurating the Messianic Age; his intentions must have, therefore, been different from that of a reformer; 3) Pharisaism is not the only offshoot of Old Testament religion. This is a fallacy which has obscured the vision of many writers. The question, therefore, whether Jesus intended to separate himself from Judaism is fallacious. It presupposes that Rabbinic Judaism in New Testament times was the sole heir of Old Testament tradition. Jewish writers have vigorously asserted that Pharisaism is the only legitimate offspring of the prophetic tradition and the direct heir of the Hebrew Bible. It has retained its original purity and "has no Greek strand" like Christianity. L. I. Finkelstein goes so far as to assert that half the world derives its faith from the Pharisaic tradition. The final argument for the truth of Pharisaism is usually seen in the fact of its survival. But it may be questioned whether Rabbinic Judaism continued in a straight line the Hebrew tradition. In the New Testament period, representing the last stages of the formative process of Judaism, there still existed a parallel tradition closely related to the Prophets of the Old Testament. Prof. Burkitt maintains with good reason that Christianity and Judaism are both two daughters of what he calls "Old-Judaism". Christianity has as much a claim upon heirship as Judaism has, unless spiritual rights are narrowed down to physical descent. Whether Jesus belonged to Judaism of the strictly Rabbinic type may be doubted. But that the Pharisees and Jesus had much in common is now a well established fact. It is not here that we can find the reason for the cleavage which finally led to the Crucifixion.

An interesting attempt to solve the puzzle was recently made by Vladimir G. Simkhovitch. He views the struggle between Jesus and the Jewish authorities from the angle of the political situation. To Simkhovitch, "the great and fundamental cleavage was constituted by Christ's non-resistance to Rome". But because this could not be used as an accusation against him, other charges had to be invented. This explains why Pilate tried to save Jesus. Simkhovitch takes up the traditional line that Jesus aimed at a religious revival. This, however, clashed with the prevailing political sentiment and also constituted an offence to organised religion. Prof. Simkhovitch, however, does not mean to imply that Jesus remained indifferent to the political situation. He resented Roman aggression and the humiliating position of his people. But using deep spiritual insight, Jesus understood that "the balm for that burning humiliation was humility. For humility cannot be humiliated...Thus he asked his people to learn from him". Contrary to the general Jewish expectation, the Kingdom of Heaven Jesus understood as an inward change. "The great trouble was that Christ was teaching an insight, preaching ideas, while the people could only understand things". For Prof. Simkhovitch, Jesus' teaching reveals an "overwhelming intellectual system" of unusual grandeur, which only modern man can grasp in all its significance. To men of his own days, Jesus' views presented an offence which inevitably led up to his crucifixion.

No doubt, Prof. Simkhovitch has given expression to some profound truths, especially in his concluding paragraphs. Mere misunderstanding, however, does not fully explain the violence of the conflict. We know that Sadducean sentiment was, within limits, pro-Roman. The Pharisaic party, or a section of it was steering clear of political conspiracy. Though it must be admitted that the passivity of the Pharisees in the great struggle has been over-emphasised, Israel Abrahams rightly holds that there were definite limits for Pharisaic conformity to Roman demands. This is borne out by the picture Josephus draws of the Pharisees, and also by the connection between the Pharisaic party and the Zealots. But the answer to Prof. Simkhovitch is contained in the fact that the Gospels unanimously present a definite religious conflict with almost no political implications. It is for this reason that Klausner bitterly resents the "other-worldliness" of Jesus.

In this connection, Louis Finkelstein's theory may be mentioned. Dr. Finkelstein views Judaean history from the angle of a social struggle between the "plebeian" and "patrician" elements.
of Jewish society. He regards Christianity as a country movement directed against the urban population, whom the peasants viewed with suspicion, confusing "the social grace of the trader with dissembling and hypocrisy". H. Loewe accepts Finkelstein's theory as the most satisfactory for explaining certain religious and social problems connected with the rise of Christianity. It is certainly striking that Jesus' greatest success and best support were associated with the provinces, especially Galilee, and that his closest followers were country-folk and not townspeople. But the natural antipathies between town and country would have little influence upon the struggle between Jesus and the Pharisees, who were, according to Finkelstein, predominantly townspeople.

Class-consciousness does not appear to have been a decisive factor in the early Christian movement.

Prof. James Moffatt has drawn attention to the novelty which the ministry of teaching as practised by Jesus must have presented to the Jews, as this was not usually associated with the Messianic function. It is obvious, however, that the practice could have constituted no offence, as the democracy of the Synagogue admitted free expression of views, provided these views were in agreement with the great principles of Judaism. It is generally held, as we have already seen, that Jesus' teaching was not opposed to Judaism.

We are thus driven to the conclusion that Jesus' teaching in itself could have been no sufficient reason for the deep cleavage between him and the authorities. Prof. W. Manson has shown that though parallels to the teaching of Jesus may be found in Rabbinic literature and among the heathen moralists, nowhere can be found "the same rigour either in the formulation or in the application". But if we understand Prof. Manson aright, it is not the subject-matter forming the substance of Jesus' teaching which marks him as the Messiah, but rather the realism "with which the sovereignty or kingdom of God is brought home to men". It is thus that men confronting Jesus found themselves in a crisis, facing the supreme demand of the Kingdom which Jesus represented in his own person. Prof. Manson, therefore, insists that the ethic of Jesus is the ethic of the Kingdom. The Sermon on the Mount is neither a moral code nor the expression of an utopian Weltanschauung, but rather an "existential summons to our spirit, by which we are called primarily not to thought, but to action: and to action vis-à-vis with God".

The ultimate reason for the friction between Jesus and the authorities, therefore, is not to be sought in a divergence of views on matters of doctrine. The background of the struggle is the claim to unique authority underlying the words and actions of Jesus Christ. It is a mistake to define the significance of Jesus in terms of abstract truth. "His coming", says Principal Curtis, "was not simply to give to mankind by His actions and character an example, and by His words a teaching or a rule of guidance, but through both media a Spirit. The life He lived, the things He said, combine to embody the Truth He was."

5. The claims of Jesus.

Most scholars are agreed that Jesus made extraordinary claims. Jewish scholars readily accept the view that Jesus made the claim to Messiahship. The crucial question is whether the exaggerated claims connected with that office were made by Jesus himself or by later generations; in other words: what meaning did Jesus attach to the function and person of the Messiah?

It may be said at the outset of our inquiry, that an unbiased answer is almost impossible. An attempt to give an objective answer deduced from a critical study of New Testament sources must fail, for these sources, however critically examined, are in themselves biased. Whatever importance we assign to Q, it is nothing else but a Christian document. There is no other evidence outside the Christian tradition which could throw light upon our problem. It must be remembered that the various answers offered by scholars are merely a reflection of their own convictions. For it is at this critical point that we are left to our own intuition. In this connection it may be interesting to note Albert Schweitzer's remark: "Es gibt kein persönlicheres historisches Unternehmen, als ein Leben-Jesu zu schreiben". There is great truth in E. Hermann's statement that the character of every individual mind that approaches the person of Jesus leaves an infallible stamp upon the great Portrait: Renan's Jesus reveals Renan more than Jesus. Hausrath's Jesus is the wise and benignant rabbi, emitting brilliant aphorisms which strike home even to the blasé mind of the nineteenth century; and there we have Hausrath's own somewhat amateurish and shallow mind. For Matthew Arnold, Christ is sweetness and light... Caird's Jesus is a poetical Hegelian; Seeley's, a moralist touched with emotion.

It is thus natural that Jewish scholars should offer an answer from their own point of view. It is characteristic of Jewish historical realism that most scholars affirm Jesus' claim to Messiahship: "Die Eigenart der jüdischen Forschung zeigt sich nun auch darin, dass sie fast ohne Ausnahme in Jesus den Messiasprätendenten sieht. Ohne dieses Messiasbewusstsein Jesu wird seine ganze Geschichte mit ihren Konsequenzen nach jüdischem Empfinden ein Rätsel". The best Jewish scholars, like Montefiore and Klausner have firmly held to this view. But they differ considerably as to the nature of the claims which Jesus made in connection with his Messianic mission. Montefiore asks: "Did he call himself Son of Man, and what did he mean by the appellation? Did he regard himself as the Son of God in some unique special sense which could be applied to none other than himself? Had God entrusted him with powers such as He had entrusted to none after him again? And had he these powers given him because he was not only human, but divine?" It is clear to Montefiore that Jesus made extensive claims: "Jesus as the Messiah in posse felt that he possessed greater power, and claimed a more personal allegiance, than any prophet before him." He also attached an unique significance to his own person: he believed he stood in an important personal relation to the Kingdom of God. "A deduction of this kind from the Synoptic records does not appear to be unwarranted." But granted all this, Montefiore holds that the claims recorded in the New Testament were not Jesus' claims, but were made on his behalf: "Yet so far as we can judge, his estimate of his own power, and of his relation to God, was gradually intensified by the sources and the editors."

Montefiore, in admitting that Jesus made unique claims, goes further than most Jewish scholars. Klausner refuses to believe that Jesus could have made any extraordinary claims, apart from the claim to Messiahship. Evidence for this Klausner finds in Jesus' use of the phrase 'τὸ αὐτός', which occurs, according to him, not in its technical sense, but instead of the pronoun "I"; its meaning being simply "man", "without any qualification or specific intention". A similar view is taken by Herbert Loewe: "I do not believe that Jesus called himself "son of God" in a sense different from 'children are ye to the Lord your God'" (Deut. XIV,1), that he rejected the Law, or that he did or said anything that a good Jew in that environment and in that age would have abhorred. For example, I do not believe that he claimed a mystic or supernatural power to forgive sins, in spite of Mark 2, 10-12. That such opinion is utterly subjective and devoid of historic support can be seen from the striking plea made by Montefiore. Admitting that Jesus "may have regarded obedience to his commands as equivalent to the doing of God's will", he is determined that "Jewish admirers will cling to the hope that he did not believe that he was a better, wiser man, with a fuller knowledge of God, than anybody who had ever lived." This is indeed a fine example of wishful thinking. What if the historic Jesus did not fulfil modern Jewish hopes?

Dr. J. K. Moseley in his book, The Heart of the Gospel, has a striking paragraph which deserves quoting in full: "Is the Son of Man Who forgives sins, Who overrides the Law of the Sabbath, Who gives His life a ransom for many, Who shall come to judge in glory, and sit upon His throne, so much less than the message which He brings that really He is quite outside it?" And he continues: "Of course it is tremendous - far more so than we often realize - that Jesus should have spoken in this way, and I think I can understand how scholars like Bousset are drawn to reject such sayings as reflecting the mind of the later Church read back into the words of Jesus. But to understand is not to justify." However biased Dr. Mosley's opinion may appear to the critical mind of a modern scholar, it has the merit of possessing the whole weight of the New Testament evidence on its side. Jewish writers have sometimes made ingenious efforts to shift at least some of that evidence in support of their own theory. Thus, H. P. Chajes has tried to make out that "έ̂σουςία" in Matthew 7,29, goes back to a misreading the Hebrew 'מען to mean 'מען, which is to say that, instead of "he taught as one having authority", the original text must have read, "he taught in parable". Another example is S. Schechter's suggestion that קוקしさה... יִּשַׁרְשֵּׁשׁ... יִּשַׁרְשֵּׁשׁ is a translation of the Rabbinic formula שומע ואיני... עָם אֵין... הָעַרְרִי where שומע means "I might hear" or "one might hear", that is to say "one might be mistaken in pressing the literal sense of the verses in question too closely": therefore יִּשַׁרְשֵּׁשׁ "there is a teaching to say that the words must not be taken in such a sense". This would explain, in Schechter's view, how Jesus could have declared in the same breath his attachment to the Torah and have quoted passages to show its inferiority. "The formula being a strictly Rabbinic idiom" was rendered inaccurately by a Greek translator. But if Schechter were right, the whole pointe of Matthew 5,21ff would have lost much of its power and the impression upon the crowd (Matthew 7,29) could not have been so profound.

Montefiore rightly observes that such an explanation "is unsuitable for the last two, and rather awkward though not impossible for the middle two examples". The fact remains that according to the Gospels, Jesus claimed extraordinary privileges and exceptional authority. This is the impression conveyed on almost every page. Montefiore, in his usual scholarly honesty, admits that the Synoptic records warrant the deduction that "Jesus was not mere herald or prophet of the Kingdom, such as John. He was more than a prophet..." It is the "more" which conceals the mystery, but also gives a clue to the riddle why Jesus met with opposition and a cruel death.

The Roman Catholic writer, André Charue, like A. T. Robertson, strongly opposes the view prevalent amongst modern writers that the Gospels represent a false picture of Pharisaism. Charue, like most orthodox writers, agrees that there were saints amongst the Pharisees, but on the whole the portrait in the Gospels faithfully reflects the truth about the Pharisaic character. Charue appeals to Josephus and quotes the authority of P. de Grandmaison. On the other hand, there is the whole weight of modern scholarship in defence of a misrepresented and a misunderstood religion. Chwolson's plea, has ever since been the plea of many Gentile and most Jewish scholars: "Die Pharisäer hatten gar keine Ursache Christus zu verfolgen, da die Lehren desselben im Ganzen und Grossen zu den ihrigen nicht nur in keinem Widerspruche, sondern in vollem Einklange mit ihnen standen". Orthodox Christian writers fall back upon the authority of the New Testament. Jewish writers appeal to Rabbinic literature. To find a solution, many explanations have been proposed: none satisfactory. The reason for this failure lies in the desire to fit Jesus into a preconceived theory; to modernise him and to present him as an acceptable figure to men of his age. Thus, the possibility that Jesus made unusual claims for himself is from the start ruled out as improbable.

After careful examination, we are driven to the conclusion that the opposition which Jesus met was not specifically actuated by political reasons on the part of the Sadducees. It was also not called forth by any provocative teaching or behaviour on the part of Jesus in opposition to the Pharisees. Even in the case of the Law, Jesus was no mere revolutionary. There is much truth in J. Gresham Machen's statement to the effect that "there is definite reason to suppose that He (Jesus) observed the ceremonial Law as it is contained in the Old Testament, and definite utterances of His in support of the authority of the Law have been preserved in the Gospels". Chwolson rightly argues that the claim to Messiahship could have never constituted a capital offence in the eyes of the Pharisees. Jesus could not have been classed as a הָרִים הַשׁוֹפֹר nor as a יָשְׁרָה לְעֻפָּנָיו as there is no trace of his inducing the people to idolatry.\(^{176}\) We must also recognise the justice of the plea of Jewish apologists that it is wrong to form a picture of Pharisaism solely on the Gospel evidence. The fact is that Jesus does not attack the Pharisees qua Pharisees. It is not that because they were Pharisees, he was opposed to them; there was nothing wrong in being a Pharisee, on the contrary, the Pharisaic ideals were close to the heart and mind of Jesus.

J. Loewe finds it somewhat amusing that the Barthian "assault" upon the Pharisees is on the ground that they were good men.\(^{171}\) But strange as such a view may seem to a Jewish Rabbi, there is more psychological and religious truth in Barth's perception of the case than would appear on the surface.\(^{172}\)

Jesus does not criticise Pharisaism as an outsider. He stands right in the midst of Pharisaic life. His first concern was with the pious. The Pharisaic effort was the most heroic effort man could make. But such heroism involved great spiritual danger. It made for self-reliance and self-sufficiency: the publicans and the harlots entered the Kingdom before the just and the Pharisees.\(^{173}\) The first shall be last and the last first, is the recurring note of the Gospels. The elder son in the parable, who was offended by the reception of his prodigal brother exhibits all the psychological reactions of the sincere and the pious. This has been re-enacted throughout the whole history of religious life in Church and Synagogue alike. Such is human nature. It is not a case of how good or how bad the Pharisees were: before the absolute demands of God, no human being holds his own. This is the burden of Paul's message. The danger is with the religious man who inevitably takes up the position of spiritual self-assertiveness. But Jesus said: Blessed are the humble in spirit, for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven. He knew himself sent not to the strong who need no physician, but to them that are sick: "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners". Montefiore is right, there is biting irony in these words. The tragedy of the religious man is that he knows about his righteousness. Montefiore's constant contention is that there were pious, sincere and righteous Pharisees. Indeed, judged by human standards, the Pharisees were the most noble section of Jewish society; but judged by the eternal standards of God, all men are under sin, there is none righteous, all are unprofitable, there is none that doeth good. This levelling of all human prerogatives and the revaluation of all standards was the first cause of offence to the pious Pharisee.

The second cause of offence was Jesus' supreme claim. There can be no doubt that Jesus not only claimed to be the Messiah, which could have been no real offence to an Israelite, but that together with that claim, he made demands and assumed an authority which were nothing short of blasphemy. Those who came in immediate contact with the Master of Nazareth stood between two alternatives: either become disciples, or opponents. The challenge which Jesus presented, pressed for decision. It is only natural and psychologically explicable that the pious, those deeply concerned about God and His Law, should lead the opposition. It could not have been otherwise. There is some truth in Montefiore's statement that both Pharisees and Jesus were right. For the Pharisees to leave Jesus unchallenged would have been equal to complicity in the greatest offence - blasphemy. For Jesus to \textit{limit} his message to the publicans and sinners would have been an offence against his Messianic consciousness. As the Messiah, his first claim was upon the pious in Israel. His first concern was with those who lived and hoped for the Kingdom of God. Thus two loyalties have \textit{clashed}, two rights have resulted in a bitter struggle. The lesser right won, as it always wins. But the defeat of Jesus was \textit{paradoxically} a manifestation of his \textit{greater} right. Vladimir Simkovitch well said: In the conflict between moment and eternity, the moment wins; to this we would like to add: but eternity \textit{ultimately} conquers.

Only seldom do Jewish scholars view the conflict between Jesus and the religious authorities as connected with the extraordinary claims he made. The general tendency is to explain the struggle as a controversy centring round the validity, permanency and holiness of the Law. This preoccupation with the Law is only natural, but has obscured the main issue. In this, Pauline teaching, and persistent Jewish reaction against it, has been projected upon the person of Jesus. But the real conflict between Jesus and the authorities, Sadducean or Pharisaic, as the case may be, was not of an academic nature. It was personal. The offence laid to the charge of Jesus, was his claims. As already said, not the claim to Messiahship, which in itself was no offence, but the claim to unique authority. Such claim, the pious Jew could only repudiate. That this was so is sufficiently borne out by the Synoptic evidence. It appears to us that the Johannine Gospel betrays an apologetic interest in stressing the claim to supreme authority on the part of Jesus. The whole controversy with the Jews seems to turn round the question of \textit{ئـدِلُمـت}.

It thus adds another genuine feature in its presentation of certain historical facts. It is of psychological importance that this claim to supreme authority constituted an offence, not only to the leaders of Judaism, but to many others throughout the ages. For it is at this point that the last decision is made concerning the Man of Nazareth.

Jesus' claims were extensive and unusual, they revolved round the significance and the authority of the Messiah. There is a certain truth in Dr. Lee Woolf's contention that Jesus' interpretation of Messiahship exceeded those of popular expectancy. But Dr. Woolf is hardly justified on this account in detaching the authority of Jesus from his Messianic office. He does it on the grounds that Jesus refused to be the Messiah in the traditional sense. But we would ask, how does Dr. Lee Woolf know that? His only evidence lies embedded in the Gospel accounts, but is it not so that in spite of all the secrecy surrounding Jesus' messiahship, our records are intent on conveying the impression that he was the Messiah? To detach the authority of Jesus from his Messianic office and to transfer it to his own self-consciousness seems to us unwarranted. It is a suggestion which may have far reaching consequences if thought out to the end. Dr. Woolf says that Jesus became the Messiah, not by virtue of an external "call", but through an inner experience. This may be so: in the last resort it is futile to attempt an explanation as to the nature of "experience" the Messiah may undergo. When, however, Dr. Lee Woolf maintains that the Messiahship of Jesus was "born of his own soul, through his own communion with God", and that consequently, Jesus' ministry was not a "conferred rôle", but a self-assumed vocation, he lays himself open to grave objections. Such a presentation of the case puts Jesus under the suspicion of arbitrariness and subjectivity. It actually defeats Dr. Woolf's own ends, for the Church has always held that Jesus, by virtue of his Sonship, was the Messiah, and not because he thought himself to be the Messiah did he become the Son of God (Adoptionism). We would, therefore, maintain that Jesus derived his claim to supreme authority from his Office. It was this that turned the controversy into a personal issue. A compromise became impossible; either he was right in his claim, then the only answer was submission, or he was wrong, then he committed blasphemy.

It is important that at an early stage of Christian history Jesus came to be called "Lord" by his disciples. This has been vigorously denied, notably by Bousset, who contends that the title "Lord" is of Gentile origin and was never used by the primitive Church in Jerusalem. To this may be added Dalman's evidence which would go to prove that on Palestinian soil the title "Lord" was nothing more than "a term of deferential homage". Kύριος would therefore, in most cases of Synoptic tradition, lead back to the Aramaic form of מָלָיָה or Κύριόν. But Lachen has shown with considerable force that at least in a few instances, the Synoptic Gospels imply by the use of the word more than mere reverence. From Acts, but especially from the Pauline Epistles, it is clear that the Lordship of Jesus was an early and universally accepted doctrine of the Church. Moreover, the use of the Aramaic phrase "Maranatha" by Paul, points to the Hebrew Christian community in Palestine, thus discrediting the theory which associates the term only with Gentile Christianity. Such an appellation reveals the extraordinary authority exercised by Jesus. In that the early Church called Jesus "Lord", it acknowledged his claims and submitted to them. It was this that characterized the believers and singled them out from among the other Jews.
6. The continuation of the Struggle.

The opposition which Jesus met, and which finally led to the Cross, did not cease after his death. It passed on as a legacy from the Master to the disciples. It could not have been otherwise: the Synagogue rejected Jesus, and because it rejected Jesus, it consequently had to reject the movement which was associated with his name. The stronger Christian influence grew upon Jewish society, the stronger grew also the opposition of Judaism towards the Church.

The Messianic movement which centred round the person of Jesus, was later continued by his disciples, spreading with remarkable rapidity upon Jewish soil. It soon reached the Jewish diaspora, and found ready acceptance among the semi-Hellenised communities abroad. The fact that Hellenistic Judaism showed more response to Christianity than Palestinian Judaism would refute the theory proposed by Montefiore and accepted by Parkes, that "the Judaism which Paul opposed to his Christianity was not Rabbinic Judaism"; but the Judaism which Paul knew, i.e. that of the Diaspora.

There is reason to suppose that the national disaster of 70 A.D. increased the influence of the Christians. The frustration which followed the fall of Jerusalem, and the destruction of the Temple, gave the Hebrew Christians a new impulse, and provided them with a new weapon: the calamity was interpreted as God's punishment for the rejection of the Messiah. Such reasoning must have made a deep impression upon the perturbed minds of many Jews. It is possible that a trace of it is still preserved in a strange passage of the Talmud which explains the destruction of the second Temple י"ח קב ותל " Jochanan ben Tortha, who lived about A.D. 110, must have, in some way received this tradition from Hebrew Christian sources. The phrase which goes back to Psalm 35, 19 strikingly reminds one of John 15, 25: 'οντι ἐμίκηναν με δισελίνων κατοικείστρωτον' which Delitzsch translates "προς οἱ ἄνθρωποι." Hebrew Christian influence upon Jewish society increased to such an extent as to cause apprehension amongst the Rabbis. This is evident from the countermeasures taken: active persecution, alterations in the liturgy, introduction of the Birkat-ka-Minim, and calumny of the person of Jesus.

a) Persecution.

Rabbi Ignaz Ziegler, who attributes to Paul alone the creation of Christianity, admits that persecution began with the appearance of the Pauline party. Saul accomplished what the other Apostles would have never even attempted - the removal of the Law. "Damit war das Tischtuch zerrissen", between Judaism and the antinomian movement led by Paul, his friends and his successors. The Jews have taken up the challenge and have fought the new heresy with all available means. Ziegler adds: "Ich würde mich noch heute meiner Ahnen schämen, wenn sie in gedankenloser Feigheit nicht von allen Mitteln Gebrauch gemacht hätten, um den Feinde an den Leib zu rücken." This frank admission needs only one correction: persecution did not begin with the appearance of Paul, it began with Jesus. But, no doubt, Paul's attitude to the Law and the Gentile world must have provided a new stimulus.

Evidence of definite hostility towards Jesus and his disciples is to be found in the whole New Testament literature. The impression the Gospels try to convey is that the Messianic movement initiated by Jesus was bitterly opposed by an important section of the Jewish community. That opposition developed into violent hatred causing the death of the Master and endangering the lives of his disciples. When Paul entered the Church, he entered as a former persecutor. How this fact could have escaped the attention of Dr. Ziegler is not easy to explain. Israel Abrahams, who discusses the question of Jewish persecution directed against Christianity more fully, shows with good reason that it was mainly a measure of self-defence and that it was directed against Hebrew Christianity only. As to Gentile Christianity, the Synagogue was not vitally concerned with it, at any rate, not "until the organised Church had become imperial and was in a position and displayed the will to persecute the Synagogue".
Until then, "Christianity as such was not the object of much attention, still less of attack". Abrahams admits, however, a certain measure of persecution but thinks that "the protagonists of a new movement, and their heirs and historians in later ages, are always inclined to mistake opposition for persecution". His main point of emphasis is upon Jewish lack of interest in Gentile Christianity. He, therefore, contests Harnack's affirmation that the Jews were the main source of anti-Christian activity and the instigators of persecution. However the case may be with regard to Gentile Christianity, and after careful examination of the arguments on both sides, Harnack's opinion seems psychologically more justifiable, though some of his remarks are based on conjecture, there can be no doubt about the Synagogue's attitude to Hebrew Christianity. If Abrahams questions the historicity of some of the New Testament passages recording persecution on the part of the Jews, there is ample evidence from Rabbinic literature to establish the case. To use Abrahams' own words:
"The Jewish sources have a good deal to say about Christians, but almost invariably it is Jewish Christians that are the
The attitude of Judaism towards Hebrew Christianity must be viewed from the angle of national emergency. Prior to 70 A.D., the Messianic movement was looked upon as another kind of heresy, but after that date, and especially after the Bar-Cochba incident, a new element came into play. The Jewish people, deprived of its national life, could not afford to its members freedom of conviction without endangering its national existence. To preserve a small religious minority, surrounded on every side by hostile nations, was a task which only the ingenuity of the Synagogue could accomplish. Christianity, with its universalistic outlook and supra-national tendency, constituted a menace to the integrity of Jewish life. Hebrew Christianity was a breach in the walls of nationalism, opening wide doors to assimilation. Opposition, therefore, towards Jewish Christianity, tended to grow in violence in proportion to the worsening of the Jewish national position. In the end, it became relentless and uncompromising. The weapons the Synagogue used were social ostracism, religious excommunication and every other form of suppression.

All that the Talmud has to say about the Jewish attitude to the Ḳinim primarily relates to Hebrew Christians. The rules laid down aim at a complete separation from those in any way suspect of that heresy. These rules are severe, almost ruthless, but have probably never found full application in actual life. Thus, a Ḳin was to be treated worse than a heathen: nobody was to sell to him, nobody was to buy from him. No business transactions were made with him. His son was not to be taught a profession. Medical treatment was not to be accepted from him. He was to be regarded as a renegade and traitor, who is not helped in need and whose life may be exposed to danger.

The books of the Minim were not to be rescued from fire, though the name of God is to be found in them; but R. Jose, the Galilean (ca. 110 A.D.) suggests that if the burning of the "Gilionim" takes place on a week-day, the name of God may be cut out. Meat slaughtered by a Min was to be regarded as if purposed for idol sacrifice; his bread like that of a Samaritan; his wine as if destined for idols; his fruit as untithed; his books as books of sorcerers, and his children as bastards.

b) Liturgical alterations.

R. Travers Herford, in a short essay on the separation of Christianity from Judaism says: "Judaism was hardly at all affected by the rise and separation of Christianity, except while the process was going on". This process Herford puts as covering a period of about 50 years: "It began with the ministry of Jesus and it ended when the declaration against the Minim (Jewish Christians) was officially made by the assembly of Rabbis at Jabneh, in the year 80 or thereabouts". But actually, the process of separation covered a much longer period and its influence upon Judaism was considerable. In fact, the whole stress of the Synagogue since that time was upon those features of Judaism which emphasised its difference from the new faith. It is true that the Synagogue's opposition was not only directed against Christianity, but also against gnostic and other heresies. Moore makes it abundantly clear that Judaism was not only opposed to the Christian weakening of the Unity of God, but to every kind of dualism which was "in the atmosphere of philosophical and religious thought". But the Synagogue's chief antagonists were the Hebrew Christians; we owe the emphasis of this fact to Herford's thorough labours in his valuable book on Christianity.
in Talmud and Hidrash. Merford rightly says that the Hebrew Christians "were the class of heretics most likely to be affected by regulations concerning the liturgy to be used in worship. No doubt other heretics would be detected if any such were present; but the Jewish Christians were the most important". The above quotation refers to Mishnah Megillah IV,8 and similar passages, where it is laid down how to detect the presence of a Min. The Hebrew Christians naturally visited the Synagogues, participated in the Services, took part in the discussions and based their arguments upon Scripture. Thus, we hear of a certain Pin who used to plague R. Joshua b. Levi with questions about the interpretation of Scriptural texts. Indeed, the controversy between Judaism and Christianity was, to a large extent, of an exegetical nature. Characteristic is the case of R. Simlai, an eminent Haggadist who lived in Palestine and Galilee, and who engaged in many controversies with Jewish Christians. Prominent amongst the christological proof-texts were the passages which indicated a plurality in the Godhead: the word ה' in Gen. 1, and Deuter. 4,32 - the recurring question put to the Rabbis was, how many divine personalities were responsible for the creation of the world? Who assisted God in the creation of man (Gen. 1,26)? What is the meaning of the threefold name of God in Jos.22,22; Ps.50,1? What is the meaning of יהוה לבר י in Jos.24, 19? What is the meaning of יהוה לבר in Deuter.4,7? etc. Other questions under constant discussion were as to the time of the coming of the Messiah, and the Resurrection from the dead.

An amusing story is attached to the name of R. Safra. R. Abbahu (ca.300 A.D.), recommended him to the Minim as a great scholar. R. Safre was therefore exempt from paying taxes for One day, the Minim, on meeting the Rabbi said to him: 'It is written, You only have I known from all the families of the earth, therefore I will visit upon you all your iniquities'. (Amos 3,2); If one is angry does one vent it on one's friend? The Rabbi could not answer; so they wound a scarf round his neck and began to torture him. When Abbahu came, he asked why they were thus treating him, to which they replied: "Have you not told us that he is a great man? He cannot explain to us the meaning of this verse!" R. Abbahu explained: "I may have told you (that he was learned) in Tannaitic teaching; did I tell you (he was learned) in Scripture?" The Minim then inquired why he himself knew the answer to their question, Abbahu replied: "We who are frequently with you, set ourselves to the task of studying it (i.e. Scriptures) thoroughly, but others do not study it as carefully".

Herford places the incident in the beginning of the 4th century. R. Abbahu, was the disciple of R. Jochanan and lived in Caesarea. R. Saphra was a Babylonian. Herford does not think there is sufficient ground for dismissing the story as a fiction. He is also convinced that the Minim here are Hebrew Christians. However the case may be, the frank admission of R. Abbahu that the Minim forced the Rabbis to a more thorough study of Scripture, throws much light upon Jewish reaction to Christianity. This took the form of eliminating passages from the Synagogue worship which might give support to the Minim for their interpretation; of reinterpreting texts with a Messianic tradition; and of placing special emphasis upon the absolute humanity of the expected Messiah and the absolute unity of God. But the contact with Christianity was not without influence upon the Rabbis themselves. R. Abbahu, who seems to have acquired expert knowledge how to answer the many questions of the 'Kinim, and who plays so prominent a part in Jewish-Christian controversies, himself shows traces of Christian influence. 2/4

Joél mentions some immediate effects upon Judaism as a result of the Jewish-Christian controversy:

1) The omission of the Decalogue in the daily Services (Ber. 12a)
2) The injunction to recite Num. 15, 37-41 morning and evening (Ber. 12b)
3) The prohibition to use the LXX. 2/5

Mishnah Tamid (v. 1) records that the Ten Commandments, together with the Shema and several other passages of Scripture were daily recited in the Temple. This was also the custom in the Synagogue worship. "But the custom was discontinued in the Synagogues outside Jerusalem because of the cavilling of the heretics, for they might say: These only were given to Moses on Sinai" (Berachoth, 12a). 2/6 Thus, the Decalogue was omitted in order not to create the impression that it is singled out as of greater importance than any of the other Commandments contained in the Torah. But the whole case is wrapped up in mystery and lacks an adequate explanation. Finkelstein refers to it as "the curious excision of the Decalogue." 2/7 The crucial question, of course, is, who were the 'Kinim who forced the Synagogue to make so drastic a change? They could not have been Gentile Christians, for controversies with such would hardly affect the Synagogue's liturgy. They must have been Jews; either Jewish Christians or other heretics. In view of the fact that the validity of the Law was the main issue between the Church and the Synagogue, the heretics were obviously Hebrew Christians. This view is supported by the early date of the change. Finkelstein puts it as early as the middle of the first century. Oesterley and Box say that though it is impossible to determine the exact date when the exclusion of the Decalogue from the Liturgy was effected, "in all probability it was during the first century A.D. ". A. L. Knox suggests two reasons why the Decalogue was withdrawn from public service: "in the first instance the withdrawal took place in the synagogues of the Dispersion as a precaution against blasphemous parodies", by Gentile opponents. The second reason being the "cavillings of the heretics", as the Talmud explains. Knox adds: "The heretics here are, no doubt Christians". But the writer seems to imply that the excision of the Decalogue from the liturgy in the Synagogues of the Diaspora was not directly effected by the "cavillings of the heretics", but occurred at an earlier date "in order to avoid the danger of blasphemy by Gentile opponents". Such a step, according to Knox, was prompted by the feeling of special reverence towards the Decalogue in some Jewish circles. It is, however, difficult to see how the danger of blasphemy from outside could affect public worship within the Synagogue. The fact that there existed an ancient Christian, though unorthodox, opinion, that the Decalogue was the original Law, and that the rest of the Law was given as a punishment for the sin of the Golden Calf, together with the other fact that the Rabbis stressed the validity of the whole Law, even trying to prove by way of gematria that the Decalogue "implied the whole Torah plus the Rabbinic commands", favours the argument that the decision was taken with the view of refuting Christians. Knox cautiously accepts such a probability. It is, therefore, reasonable to say that the excision of the Decalogue from Synagogue worship was primarily dictated by apologetic reasons in the controversy with Hebrew Christianity. The later argument of the Gentile Christians regarding the Decalogue was merely a clumsy elaboration of an earlier view. The Decalogue played an important part in early Christian thought. It is frequently referred to in the Gospels. It is summarised by Paul by the law of love (Rom. 13:8ff), it forms the background of the Didache. It is only natural that later Christians, following Paul's example, should see in the Decalogue the essence of the whole Law. The section of Hebrew Christianity which refused to adhere to the ceremonial law must have laid special emphasis upon the permanent validity of the Ten Commandments only. The fact that there were Jewish Christians in greater numbers who took a Pauline view of the Law is of far-reaching consequence.

2) The second point mentioned by Joëll is of lesser importance. It concerns the last section of the Shema, (Num. 15, 37-41). There seems to have been some difference of opinion whether it was obligatory to recite this section in the evening as well as in the morning. The Mishnah definitely enjoins that it be recited in the evening also. The case seems to have some connection with the controversy against the Minim. This is also Joëll's opinion. In his view, the decision to recite Num. 15, 37-41 morning and evening was taken "damit man täglich zwei Mal das Joch der Gesetze auf sich nehme"; Joëll adds: "wenigstens finden die Alten darin Anti-LinMisches", and he points to Berakoth 12b. If Joëll's is the correct explanation, this is another case where the dispute centres round the validity of the whole Law.

In this connection it may be mentioned that another ancient custom underwent alteration because of the Minim. It used to be the practice to recite the Benediction: "Blessed be His name, whose glorious Kingdom is forever and ever", which follows immediately after, "Hear, O Israel etc." in a low voice. But because of the Minim this custom was abandoned. R. Abbahu explains that in Nehardea (Babylonia), i.e. where there are no Mini, this doxology is still said in a whisper.\(^{128}\) The reason for this alternation is obvious: the suspicion arose that the Mini might take advantage of the occasion and insert a heretical prayer, or in the case of Christians, the name of Jesus the Messiah.\(^{129}\)

3) The main reason for the hostile attitude to the LXX lies in the fact that it provided the Christians with specific Christological arguments, and the many gnostic sects with a vast field for speculation. Together with the denunciation of the Greek text went an aversion to the Greek language. There is a prohibition to teach the Jewish youth Greek recorded in the Mishnah which dates back to ca. 116 A.D.\(^{130}\) Joël thinks of four further reasons which led the Rabbis to prohibit the Greek language and the Septuagint: 1) The LXX contained not only mistranslations (Missverständnisse), but also a number of spurious texts. This Joël bases upon Justin Martyr's accusation that the Jews have left out certain passages from Scripture.\(^{231}\) 2) The importance the Gnostic sects attached to Old Testament exegesis, basing their arguments upon the Greek version. 3) The fact that the Gnostic sects began to betray signs of hostility towards the Jews (Judenthum), may have been a further consideration. 4) The political effect which Greek understanding (Auffassung) of the Old Testament had upon Jewish life, may have also come into play. But to our mind, the main reason for the prohibition to use LXX, is closely connected with the Jewish-Christian controversy. To provide a more reliable translation which would eliminate the LXX from general use was attempted by the Greek proselyte, a convert from Christianity to Judaism, Aquila (middle 2nd century).\(^{232}\) His aim was to give a literal translation closely related to the masoretic text. But though upheld by the Synagogue, it was not a success. Joseph Reider describes it as something of a monstrosity, "its Greek vocabulary and grammatical forms being often uncouth and barbaric". Its significance lies in that it provided a separate Greek version authorised by the Synagogue, while "the Septuagint became the official Bible of the Christian Church". The Jewish attitude to the Apocrypha was also conditioned by the dispute between the Church and the Synagogue. Ephraim Levine observes that Akiba's objection to this literature "was directed against Jewish Christians, who drew many of their arguments from that source". To this ought to be added the fact that there is some connection between the fixation of the Canon at Jabneh and the Jewish-Christian controversy.

Fr. Buhl has shown with good reason that the Canon was already in existence prior to the Destruction and that even the Hagiographical part of the Old Testament was firmly determined before the 1st century. The discussion at Jabneh, therefore, was not concerned with the fixation of the Canon, but with the revision of it. There appear to have been objections to some of the canonically sanctioned books. The Rabbis reaffirmed the canonicity of these books. Buhl sees a connection between the decisions at Jabneh and "the conflict with the powerfully advancing Christianity". Loewe seems to hold a similar view. He remarks: "When Christianity had definitely parted from Judaism, the provision of a canon became imperative." It appears to us, however, that the incident at Jabneh still belongs to the process of separation itself. The reaffirmation of the already existing canon and the removal of objections to some of its books was probably designed to separate the Old Testament from the Hebrew Christian literature and to provide an answer to the Christian contention that not all the books of the Canon enjoy equal In a curious passage in Pes. R. 14b, we get a glimpse of the Jewish reaction to the Gentile (?) Christian claim which was made possible by the possession of a Greek Bible: God foresaw that the Gentiles would one day translate the Torah and read it in Greek and say: "They (i.e. the Jews) are not (the true) Israel". God said to Moses: 'The nations will say, We are (the true) Israel, we are the sons of God; and Israel will say, "We are the sons of God". So God said to the Gentiles: "Why do you claim to be my sons? I know only him who has my mystery in his possession, he is my son". Then the Gentiles ask, "What is thy mystery?" God answers: "It is the Mishnah" (i.e. the Oral Law). The meaning of the passage is two-fold: it denies the Christian claim to have superseded Israel, and it claims on behalf of the Synagogue the key to the right interpretation of Scripture.

c) The Birkat ha-Minim

The Shemoneh Esreh, which is the Tephillah par excellence and "the central feature of the three daily prayers", contains a strange "blessing", the much discussed Birkat ha-Minim. It is associated with the names of Gamaliel (ca. 100 A.D.) and Samuel the Small (died ca. 125 A.D.). The classical Talmudic passage recording the introduction of the "benediction" reads: Our Rabbis have taught: Simeon the cotton-dealer (Dalman transl. Flachsschäler) arranged the eighteen benedictions in order in the presence of Rabban Gamaliel at Jabneh. Rabban Gamaliel asked the sages: "Is there anyone who knows how to word the benediction relating to the Minim?" Samuel the Small stood up and worded it. The Shemoneh Esreh, which according to tradition, was drawn up by the Men of the Great Synagogue, has thus acquired an extra "benediction", though it still retained the former name of "Eighteen" (benedictions). Immediately preceding the passage quoted above the question is being asked: "As to those eighteen benedictions - there are nineteen! R. Levi said: The benediction relating to the Minim was subsequently instituted at Jabneh. Corresponding to what was it instituted? R. Levi said: According to R. Hillel, the son of R. Samuel b. Nachmani, it corresponds to "The God (El) of Glory thundereth (cp. Ps. 29, 3); according to Rab Joseph, it corresponds to "One" in the Shema; according to R. Tanchum in the name of R. Joshua b. Levi, it corresponds to the small vertebra in the spinal column". It is obvious from this passage that the Rabbis have tried to find some justification for the introduction of a curse into the otherwise lofty prayers of the Shemoneh Esreh. Jewish scholars have for a long time maintained that the Birkat ha-Minim was mainly directed against heresy as such, and only indirectly against Hebrew Christianity. Even Israel Abrahams in his notes to Singer's Prayer Book says that the benediction "was directed against antinomians - those who rejected or neglected the Law - and also against sectarians (Minim) within the Synagogue. The statement which originated with Justin Martyr that the paragraph is an imprecation against Christians in general has no foundation whatsoever". This is correct in so far as it applies to Gentile Christianity. It can hardly be expected of the Synagogue to be so concerned with Gentile Christians as to denounce them publicly in its liturgy. The course of the Gentile Church only indirectly affected Jewish religious life. From this quarter, the danger to the Synagogue was remote. But the case with Hebrew Christianity was different. The Jewish believers in Jesus of Nazareth were the real and immediate danger to the Synagogue. There can be little doubt who are meant by the "Minim". There was no other sect or heresy which could compare in importance with Hebrew Christianity.

The Hebrew Christians were steeped in the traditions of Judaism, many of them were loyal to the "traditions of the elders. They were spiritually alive, abounding in religious zeal. They were aggressive, and above all, they were the enthusiastic bearers of the greatest Jewish heritage - the Messianic hope. They were dangerous because they had the advantage of attacking Judaism from within. It therefore became imperative for the Synagogue to isolate them. For that purpose the Birkat ha-Minim was composed. Loewe rightly calls it a "test passage"; its intention being "to separate the sheep from goats, and compel the Minim to declare themselves". It naturally had the effect of widening the breach between the Jesus-believing and the non-believing Jews in that it made it impossible for the believers to worship in the Synagogues.

The present text of the 12th benediction which begins with the word $\pi\nu\nu^\gamma\lambda\nu$ reads: And for slanderers let there be no hope, and let all wickedness perish as in a moment; let all thine enemies be speedily cut off, and the dominion of arrogance do thou uproot and crush, cast down and humble speedily in our days. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who breakest the enemies and humblest the arrogant. But in this form the prayer is a "comparatively late substitution". The Birkat ha-Minim has undergone alterations, made by the Jews for fear of censorship, and by the mediaeval censors for fear of blasphemy. That the original text of the Birkat ha-Minim must have made mention of the Christians was anticipated by the learned Prof. Samuel Krauss. Dr. Krauss rightly concluded from the repeated complaints by the Church Fathers that the Jews curse the Christians in their Synagogues three times daily, that this must have constituted an integral part of the Daily Prayers.\textsuperscript{153} This assumption was borne out by an old text found in a Cairo Gemizah by Dr. S. Schechter. That text reads: "For the renegades (דומענים) let there be no hope, and may the arrogant kingdom (=Rome ?) soon be rooted out in our days, and the Nazarenes (נאוואליים) and the Linim perish as in a moment and be blotted out from the book of life and with the righteous may they not be inscribed. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who humblest the arrogant".\textsuperscript{154} It is difficult to assess the age of the Gemizah fragment, but it is not the only instance where the Nozrim are explicitly mentioned in the Birkat ha-Minim.

Strack, referring to Schechter's text remarks: "Auch der Siddur des Gaon Rab Amram nennt in dieser Berakha die Christen in dem im Anfange des Jahres 1426 vollendeten Codex Oxford Bodl. 1095...Auch der Mahzor - Codex de Rossi Nr. 159 in Parma sagt Blatt 2, dass die Berakha gegen die Schüler Jesu von Nazareth, talmidê Ješu ha-nošri, gerichtet sei". He also points out that Rashi, in one \textsuperscript{155} to Berachoth, expressly says, that the 12th benediction has the Christians in mind. But the question what was the original form of the Birkat ha-Minim is a difficult one. Many scholars, like Derenbourgh, Hamburger, H. Friedlander, Bousset and Hirsch favour the view that the Birkat ha-Minim has been added to some similar prayer already in existence. In support of this theory an old Baraitha is brought forward, where, strangely enough, מוןになっている and קלאשין occur together.\textsuperscript{156} Levy translates in this case the word קלאשין by "Dissidenten", apostates. But Schwaab rightly holds that this is untenable.\textsuperscript{157} It rather looks as if מוןになっている is a scribe's mistake. Jer. Ber. II, 4 contains the phrase מוןについては and IV,2 reads:
therefore, may easily be a mistake for either of these. But there are other considerations which favour the view that the Birkat ha-Minim was an entirely new addition.

1) The Talmud Jerushalmi says explicitly that before the introduction of the prayer against the Minim, there were only seventeen benedictions. This led Schwaab to the view that the number Eighteen was fixed at the time of Gamaliel II. Though the number of the petitions was fluid, prior to the destruction of the Temple, there were already in existence 17 benedictions in the amidah. After 70 A.D., the benediction Abodah was augmented by the words: יְנַעַבְתָּה יְדוֹבֵּר יִמְּלָה and later the Birkat ha-Minim was added. But there still remains the fact that the Babylonian Talmud actually counts 19 benedictions. In order to account for this, Schwaab, following the Hidrash, explains the process: "erst 17 Benediktionen, dann durch Hinzufügung der 12. Bitte 18 und zuletzt 19 durch das Hinzutreten der 15. Benediktion". The 15th benediction having arisen out of the 14th, which was divided in two parts. But a glance at the text suffices to contradict this view. The process seems to have taken place in the opposite direction: not that the Babylonian Talmud has divided the 14th petition into two, thus creating 19, but that the Jerushalmi has contracted petitions 14 and 15 into one, thus retaining the original number "Eighteen".

Strack-Billerbeck show that the number Shemoneh Esreh was known at least before Gamaliel's retirement from the presidency at Jabneh. It is fairly safe to assume that it was known before his time, otherwise it would be difficult to account for the fact that the Babylonian Talmud uses the name Shemoneh Esreh for the amidah.
2) Samuel the Small, the composer of the Bir'at ha-Minim, a year after he had composed the prayer, was leading the service at the Synagogue. When he came to reciting the Bir'at ha-Minim, he could not remember it. He tried to recall the prayer הָנַעַמְתּוֹן בְּרִקְבַּת הָהוֹלֵכִים but he was not dismissed. The question is asked, why did they not dismiss him? The rule laid down by Rab Jehudah (died 299) on the authority of Rab (i.e. Abba Arika, 167-247) was that if the precentor errs in any of the benedictions they do not dismiss him, but if he errs in the Bir'at ha-Minim, they dismiss him, because there is the possibility of his being a heretic. But in the case of Samuel the Small it is different, because he himself composed it. But could not he have changed his mind? To this, Abaje (died 338/9) replied that there is a traditional saying: A good person does not become bad. From this story, one conclusion is certain: the Bir'at ha-Minim was introduced as something new and even its composer found it difficult to get used to it.

3) The next question is as to the exact time of the composition of the Bir'at ha-Minim.

Jo'el attempts to prove that the prayer was introduced at the time of Trajan, as a reaction against the Christian interference with the rebuilding of the Temple. This is a conjecture which is devoid of any historical evidence, but it shows that even a conservative Jewish writer like Jo'el puts the Bir'at ha-Minim at an early date. Chwolson does not think that it could have taken place before 100 A.D., as prior to that time, the leaders of Judaism were preoccupied with important political questions; but it could not have been composed after 120 A.D., as Samuel must have composed it a few years before his death, which occurred in 125 A.D. At present, most scholars are agreed that the introduction of the Birkat ha-Minim took place some time before the end of the first century. The exact time is naturally impossible to fix, but taking into consideration the inner circumstances, we may surmise that the inclusion of so violent a curse into the Amidah points to a time when the Synagogue was witnessing a new surge of Hebrew Christianity in the form of a revival of Messianism. This must have taken place not many years after the destruction of Jerusalem. The frustration which that greatest national disaster, prepared the ground for Christian propaganda. Since it is possible that Gamaliel II took over the presidency at Jabneh before the death of his predecessor, R. Jochanan ben Zakkai, it is safe to assume that the Birkat ha-Minim was introduced about the year 90 A.D., or even earlier.

4) The second question which presents itself, is against whom is the prayer directed? There are two opinions on this point: 1) The Birkat ha-Minim had in view all heretics including Christians. This is the view of most Jewish scholars. 2) The Birkat ha-Minim was chiefly directed against Christians, naturally included other heretics. An adequate answer to the problem depends on what meaning we assign to the word Minim, and whether we assume that the word מְנִים originally belonged to the wording of the prayer. It must be admitted that these are difficult questions, and that a final decision is impossible. But there are some considerations in favour of the second view.

Schürer explains that the word מְנִים in the Birkat ha-Minim is "der engere Begriff, die מְנִימים der weitere (=Netzer, Abtrünnige überhaupt)". Schwaab, too, tries to answer whether Nozrim and Minim were the original words, and whether they stand in some relationship to each other. He asks: "Ist nun dieses
V/ort (i.e. Tozrim) von Anfang an neben der Bezeichnung נִזְרִים als 'der engere Begriff gestanden?" And though he differs from Hoennicke as to the reason why the word Tozrim was inserted at a later date, he agrees with him that it was not originally in the text. Schwaab finds the answer to the puzzle in Schlatte's statement that the complete Hebraisation of the liturgy in the Greek Synagogue was in the fourth century by no means an established fact: "Minim durfte aber einer Übersetzung, und die nächstliegende Übertragung war das von Epiphanius and Hieronymus bezeichnete \( \text{ναζωραῖον} \)." Schwaab, accepting Schlatter's opinion adds: "Dann wäre \( \text{ναζωραῖον} \) als eine der häufigen und beliebten pleonastischen Hinzufügungen zu erklären." According to this theory, the Hebrew word Minim was translated into Greek for liturgical use by \( \text{ναζωραῖον} \) which, in course of time, became a "wörtliche Rückübersetzung neben Minim" and slowly both words came in use. There seems to be some reason in Hoennicke's argument that Krauss has attached too much importance to the evidence of the Church Fathers in trying to prove that in the original prayer the word \( \text{נִזְרִים} \) was already present. In the case of Justin, it cannot be shown that he is actually referring to the 18 benedictions, and in the case of Epiphanius, it must be borne in mind that his evidence refers to the prayer the Jews had in use in his own time. Hoennicke, therefore, concludes: "Es wird \( \text{ναζωραῖον} \) die ursprüngliche Textform sein; in späther Zeit hat man das Wort \( \text{נִזְרִים} \) hinzugefügt." This is important; whatever view we accept in explaining the presence of the word Nozrim, there is reason to surmise that it was not originally in the text. It was added at a time when the word Minim assumed a wider meaning including all heresies, and when the bitterness against Christianity assumed such depth as to require special mention. Justin's testimony, on the other hand, cannot easily be brushed aside. We would, therefore, assume that Justin knew that the Birkat ha-Minim had primarily Christians in view. This he could have easily learned from Hebrew Christians or from sources related to them.

We therefore feel justified in drawing the following conclusions:

1) The Birkat ha-Minim had no precedent in the Synagogue, it was a new creation, entirely dictated by internal necessity.

2) It was composed at an early date, not many years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

3) It did not contain the word Nozrim, but it did contain the word Minim.

4) It was primarily directed against Hebrew Christians. In this we go a step further than Schwaab, who says that the 12th benediction was directed "zum mindesten auch - gegen die Christen".

It is only natural to assume that the introduction of the Birkat ha-Minim resulted, not only in widening the breach between Hebrew Christians and orthodox Jews, but also in further prejudicing the Jews towards Jesus of Nazareth.

3) Calumniation of the person of Jesus.

Both the Talmud and the vast halakhic literature contain some references to the person of Jesus. Scholars are agreed that these references are mostly, with a few exceptions, legendary and devoid of all historical authenticity. In the words of Klausner: "they partake rather of the nature of vituperation and polemic against the founder of a hated party, than objective accounts of historical value". This is also Leible's view.

After carefully examining all the data, Leible says: "Zweierlei ist uns fortwährend in sinnfälliger Weise entgegengetreten:
1. die ungemeine Dringlichkeit und Späritlichkeit dieser Notizen,
2. ihre fabelhafte Beschaffenheit". This is a curious and disappointing fact. We would have expected historically well authentified evidence from Jewish sources respecting the person of Jesus of Nazareth. But this is not so. Klausner gives two reasons for this: 1. The Talmud authorities rarely allude to events which took place in the period of the Second Temple;
2. The contemporaries of Jesus hardly noticed his appearance in the turbulent days of the Herods and the Roman Procurators. By the time Christianity, however, became an important sect, they already possessed no historical knowledge of the actual facts.
This probably explains the case, though it is difficult to see how the Rabbis have completely overlooked the historical facts connected with the life of Jesus, or remained ignorant of them.
Klausner's second point suggests that the life of Jesus did not create the stir, and its effects were not as momentous as we are led to suppose on New Testament evidence. But there may still be another explanation. The Talmud seems to adopt two methods in dealing with opponents. The one method is to ridicule, the other is to ignore the adversary altogether. It adopted the first in its presentation of the life of Jesus, and the second in its attitude to John the Baptist. It is a curious fact that the whole Rabbinic literature does not contain a trace of the existence of John. But John's activity was important enough to be noticed by Josephus. However, the same can be said about other important events in Jewish history which find no mention in the Talmud. Klausner rightly draws attention to the fact that, had it not been for 1 and II Maccabees, and the writings of Josephus, the Talmud would not have conveyed to posterity even the name of Judas Maccabeus! But whatever the reason may be, the Talmud makes some statements about the person of Jesus, though admittedly under the strain of heated controversy. Later references contained in the Rabbinic literature were called forth by way of reaction against Christian oppression: "a highly treasured, private form of vengeance in return for the attitude of the Christians towards the Jews".282

1. Talmudic statements about Jesus.

Neither the historical value, nor the authenticity of references or hints regarding Jesus contained in the Talmud are decisive for our investigation. All we are concerned with is to collect the features which formed the portrait for those Jews who sought information about the Man of Nazareth from the pages of Rabbinic literature.

There is extant at least one Mishnaic reference to Jesus; it is generally held to be the oldest mention of our Lord. R. Simeon b. Azzai said: I found a family register in Jerusalem, and in it it was written, 'Such a one is a bastard through (a transgression of the law of) thy neighbour's wife', confirming the words of R. Joshua.293 There are also several Baraitas and a number of Midrashic allusions either to Jesus himself, or disciples of Jesus. Only occasionally does the actual name of Jesus occur, in the form of יושב מָלַשׁ (or יִשָּׁבָה הָלָשָׁתְהוֹן) or יֵשַׁבָּה הָלָשָׁתְהוֹן (also יֵשַׁבָּה מָלַשׁ). More often he is referred to as the anonymous one or "that man"; this is chiefly due to medieval censorship. Later Jewish authorities seem to have confused the person of Jesus with a certain Ben Stada, and have thus added another synonym to the collection.286

The contents of the passages referring or alluding to Jesus in the Talmudic and Midrashic literature have been care­fully examined by many authorities. After the work done by schol­ars like, Laible, Strack, Herford, and more recently, Klausner, there is no need for a detailed discussion. It may suffice to quote the summary of the story as given by Herford: "Jesus, called ha-Notzri, B. Stada, or Pandira, was born out of wedlock (M. Jeb. IV, 13, cp. Bab. Shabb. 104b). His mother was called Miriam, and was a dresser of women's hair (Bab. Shab. ib. where 'Miriam megaddelah nashaia' is a play on 'Miriam Magdalaah', i.e. Mary Magdalene). Her husband was Pappus b. Judah; and her para­mour Pandira. She is said to have been the descendant of princes and rulers, and to have played the harlot with a carpenter =(Bab. Sanh. 106a). Jesus had been in Egypt, and had brought magic thence. He was a magician, and deceived and led astray Israel. He sinned and caused the multitude to sin. (Bab. Sanh. 107b). He mocked at the words of the wise, and was excommunicated (ib.). He was tainted with heresy (ib. 103a). (He) called himself God, also the Son of Man, and said that he would go up to heaven (Jer. Taan 65a; Jesus is not mentioned by name, but there is no doubt that He is meant). He made himself live by the name of God (Bab. Sanh. 106a; also anonymous). He was tried in Lydda (Lud) as a deceiver and as a teacher of apostasy (Tos. Sanh. X, 11; Jerus. Sanh. 25c,d). Witnesses were concealed so as to hear his statements, and a lamp was lighted over him that his face might be seen (ib.). He was executed in Lydda, on the eve of Passover, which was also the eve of Sabbath; he was stoned and hung, or crucified (ib. and Tos. Sanh. IX, 7). A herald proclaimed, during forty days, that he was to be stoned, and invited evidence in his favour; but none was given (Bab. Sanh. 43a). He (under the name of Balaam) was put to death by Pinhas the Robber (Pontius Pilatus), and at the time was thirty-three years old (Bab. Sanh. 106b). He was punished in Gehenna by means of boiling filth (Bab. Gitt. 56b, 57a). He was 'near to the Kingdom' (Bab. Sanh. 43a). He had five disciples (ib.). Under the name of Balaam, he was excluded from the world to come (M. Sanh. X, 2). Two things are obvious from this account:

1) The Rabbis "deliberately attempted to contradict events recorded in the Gospels". 2) An effort is made to present Jesus in an unfavourable light. In the words of Hennecke: "Im ganzen muss man billigerweise sagen, dass Jesus im Talmud nichts anderes ist, als das, natürlich durch den jüdischen Widerwillen verzerrte, Spiegelbild der Juden - oder heidenchristlichen Christusbilder der Kirche."

2. The Tol'doth Yeshu.

Besides the sparse and inadequate Talmudic references to Jesus, there is in existence an old Jewish source which offers a more elaborate and rather fantastic account of his life. It has been the object of much discussion since the Middle Ages. More recent investigation of the Tol'doth Yeshu was in respect to their origin and age. The most valuable work was done by the learned Samuel Krauss, who carefully selected and classified the MSS, and minutely and critically examined their contents. A more recent study of the Tol'doth Yeshu, with the object of establishing a connection between the Jewish source and the Gospel According to the Hebrews, was made by Mr. Hugh J. Schonfield, himself a Hebrew Christian.

This strange parody of the Life of Jesus shares some features with the traditional account in the Talmud, but is more elaborate and less restrained. Its readers were the more ignorant people in Jewry.

The Tol'doth differ in two important points from the Talmudic account: 1) They purport to replace the Gospel story, thus offering a coherent account of the Life of Jesus of their own making; 2) Their intention is not only to replace the Gospels, but also the Acts of the Apostles, offering instead "eine entsprechende jüdische Darstellung". Dr. Krauss does not regard the Talmud as the main source of the Tol'doth Yeshu. He says: "Gerade der Umstand, dass die Toldoth-Recensionen Jesum nur als ben Pandera, nicht als ben Stada kennen, also in demjenigen Sagenkreise, den auch Celsus kennt, beweist, dass der Toldoth-Schreiber nicht aus dem Talmud compiliert, sondern die lebendige jüdische Überlieferung aufzeichnet: ein Theil dieser Überlieferung gelangte im Talmud, der andere Theil im Toldoth zur schriftlichen Fixierung..." Krauss regards the canonical and apocryphal Gospels as the background of this Jewish tradition, but its immediate and most important source was "Das hebräische Geschichtswerk Josippon, welches auch von Jesu und von den Anfängen des Christentums berichtete..." On the other hand, Schonfield, after comparing the Tol'doth with the canonical and extra-canonical Gospels arrived at the conclusion, that the author must have had another source before him. Schonfield identifies that other source with the lost Gospel according to the Hebrews. He even thinks that a reconstruction of the lost Gospel is possible by following closely the order of the Tol'doth account. In Mr. Schonfield's view, the author of the Tol'doth wrote his "counter-Gospel" by copying the form and arrangement of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, but perverting its contents. Schonfield, then concludes: "The Tol'doth Jesu will be found on serious examination to supply a most important witness to the structure of the lost Gospel according to the Hebrews". It seems that Mr. Schonfield's main argument is based on the fact that the Tol'doth has appended the story of the Acts of the Apostles, or rather a perversion of it, while Prof. Benjamin Bacon has suggested that the Ebionite Gospel must have had a similarly appended story in which Peter, and not Paul, was the chief hero. Epiphanius actually mentions such Acts of the Apostles according to the Ebionite version. Schonfield goes a step further and declares that the Ascents of James in the Clementine Recognitions are "an expanded form of a section of the Hebrew Acts", which concluded the Gospel according to the Hebrews. From this, Schonfield adduces: 1) That many Jews adhered to the doctrine of Jesus; 2) that serious disorders resulted from the Nazarene preaching; 3) that the Nazarenes accused the chief priests of slaying the Lord's anointed; 4) that the Nazarenes did not leave the Jewish community; 5) that strife and discord developed between the opposing parties. But Schonfield's patristic evidence is very meagre and his conclusions forced. There is no need to rely upon so dubious a source as the Ascents of James to prove the above mentioned points. Every point is amply borne out by the first chapters of Acts. A very weak link in Schonfield's argument is the assertion that the compiler of the Tol'doth has utilized the appropriate points in his narrative, taking care not to do too much violence to his source. This seems to contradict the whole thesis that the author of Tol'doth was bent upon presenting "a Satirical Gospel" in spirit truly related to Celsus', The Discourse, and Lucian of Samosata's De Morte Peregrini. It is difficult to see why historical fact should have had a restraining effect upon the author's imagination?

As to the time of the Tol'doth, there is great difference of opinion, but Krauss' reasoning seems to compare favourably with other views. He says: "Wahrscheinlich müssen wir uns das Toldoth im 5. Jh. entstehen denken. Die Schrift berichtet nur Ereignisse welche ins 5. Jh. reichen; sie spricht ausser von Jesus noch von Petrus und Paulus, von Simon Magus, von der Auswanderung nach Pella, von den Bischöfen Kleophas und Jacobus, hat Thatsachen, die auf Pseudo-Hegesippus weisen, berichtet die Kreuzauflösung, weiss von Nestorius, aber nichts darüber hinaus, auch nicht von der Wegnahme des Kreuzes durch die Perser im Jahre 614, wo doch dieses Factum dem jüdischen Autor sehr willkommen gewesen wäre, wenn er es gewusst hätte. Krauss also points to the list of Christian festivals referred to in the Tol'doth, and especially to Christmas (natalis). Schonfield thinks that the original form (the Ur-Tol'doth) is probably earlier than the 5th century. Klausner rejects the view that our present Tol'doth goes back to the 5th century. But he admits the possibility "that some book entitled Tol'doth Yeshu - though more or less different in content and altogether different in form and Hebrew style - was in the hands of the Jews as early as the fifth century, and that it was the same book which fell into the hands of Agobard, Bishop of Lyons, (who refers to it in his book, "De judaicis superstitionibus", which he composed in conjunction with others about the year 830), and into the hands of Hrabanus Maurus, who became Archbishop of Magenta in 847, and, in his book, "Contra Judaeos", referred to Jewish legends about Jesus which correspond to much of the contents of the surviving Tol'doth Yeshu." But Klausner affirms that the present Hebrew Tol'doth "even in its earliest form, is not earlier than the present Yosippon, i.e. it was not composed before the tenth century". But this statement refers only to MSS which have come down to us. The tradition itself is very old and goes back to a time when "the propaganda of the Nazarenes among their non-Christian brethren, and the circulation of their Gospel", was counteracted with the story of the Tol'doth. Krauss rightly relegates the Tol'doth to the class of apologetic and polemical writings. Schonfield's suggestion that it originated at Tiberias may point to an even earlier date than the 4th century.

A brief summary of the contents of the Tol'doth can be found in Klausner's book. The main gist of the story is the assertion that Jesus was an illegitimate child, that he performed miracles by means of sorcery which he learned from the Egyptians; that he acquired the power of performing miracles by stealing the Ineffable Name from the Temple and sewing it underneath his skin; that he was arrested on the eve of Passover; that he was hanged on a cabbage stem (the reason given is that Jesus had previously adjured all trees by the Ineffable Name not to receive his body but he failed to adjure the cabbage stem, which does not count as a tree!); that his body was removed on the eve of the Sabbath and interred; that the gardener removed his body and cast it into a cesspool.

Such is the story which Krauss affirms "was intended seriously as a history of Jesus", to Herford's great surprise. To indicate the influence of the Tol'doth upon the Jewish people, we will quote an interesting passage from Klausner: "This book is not now common, though at one time it had a wide circulation... in Hebrew and Yiddish among the simpler minded Jews, and even more educated Jews used to study the book during the nights of Natal (Christmas)... Yet the book may still be found in MS, and in print among many educated Jews. Our mothers knew its contents by hearsay - of course with all manner of corruptions, changes, omissions, and imaginative additions - and handed them on to their children." In the Middle Ages, and even up to our own days, the Tol'doth Yeshu served as a popular handbook and was almost the only source left to the Jewish people from which to draw their knowledge concerning Jesus Christ. It used to be read with great relish, especially on Christmas Eve, and even now, Jewish school-boys in countries like Poland, are given the evening free to enjoy the story on the night of Nit'el.

The lingering past.

The scanty references in Talmud and Midrash and the derisive account offered by the Tol'doth Yeshu were the two main sources upon which the children of Israel drew concerning Jesus, his life, his labours, his teaching and his end. The characteristic feature of both these sources is best described by the Jewish Encyclopedia when it says: "It is the tendency of all these sources to belittle Jesus by ascribing to him illegitimate birth, magic and a shameful death". To quote once again the authority of S. Krauss: "Jesus' illegitimate birth was always a firmly held dogma in Judaism, which found clear expression in its ancient and modern literature, passed over to the heathens of antiquity and lives today in the consciousness of every simple minded Jew, who only knows as much on this subject as he has learned from his parents".

The purpose of these disfigured and fantastic statements was to repel the Jew from the person of Jesus, and to keep him immune from Christian influence. No doubt, the effort has been crowned with complete success.

Generations of Jews have lived and passed into oblivion, and though surrounded by Christianity on every side, have never actually faced the truth about Jesus. Equally little have they known about Christianity itself. To the son of Israel, his Christian neighbour remained a Gentile who believed in three gods, worshipped the Cross and hated the Jews. A large measure of the guilt for this state of affairs falls upon the Church itself, an equally large measure falls upon the spiritual leaders Conservative Judaism still refuses even to discuss the case of Jesus. Appeals made by enlightened Jews to reconsider the Jewish attitude towards Jesus of Nazareth immediately raises in these quarters an outcry of indignation. In this respect, nothing has changed. Even critical studies of the life of Jesus made by Jews seems to be, in the eyes of conservative Judaism, an unpardonable sin. Thus, Prof. J. Klausner's book, which is anything but favourable to Christianity, has raised a storm of protest: "Jesus must never again even cross our minds", is the rule of the orthodox camp. Yet even more astounding is the fact that this persistent and uncritical, almost wholesale rejection of Jesus, is by no means characteristic of the Orthodox group alone. The attitude of supreme negation is the general rule for Jewry at large. Here, as nowhere else, do we meet with the lingering memory of Jewish suffering which, in the Jewish consciousness, is closely associated with the name of Jesus. This is the burden of the Christian guilt.
Chapter III

The Church and the Jews.

The second potent factor in the process of alienation between Jesus and the Jewish people was the Church. This is the darkest spot in the history of Christianity. The Christian record of Jewish wrongs and suffering is the most incriminating testimony against the Church. This explains why, to the Jew, Christianity became a synonym for Jew-hatred. It is commonplace for the Jew to associate the name of Jesus with the Ghetto, the Badge and the Inquisition. To Jews of Eastern Europe, the Cross to this day is the symbol of persecution. And how could it be otherwise?

Dr. James Parkes has studiously traced back the evil which is usually called anti-Semitism to Christian exegesis and theology. He has shown in his valuable work on the Origins of Antisemitism the extent to which the Church is to be held responsible for the suffering of the Jews throughout the ages. Much has been written on the subject especially by Jewish writers. Every detail has been thoroughly investigated by Jewish and Christian historians. All that remains for us to do is to give a general outline.

I. The ascendency of the Church.

We have already seen the extent of reaction on the part of the Synagogue to the Christian heresy. But the Synagogue's struggle against Hebrew Christianity was entirely an internal affair. It was a controversy between Jews as to the significance and meaning of certain events which have taken place in their own midst. The dispute was of a religious nature and as is always the case, it grew in violence until it came to a split. The minority, which in this case were the "Christians" was defeated. This involved suffering and persecution. Jews were persecuting Jews. Such internal strife is no isolated case in history. But soon a new element came into play. The Messianic Movement broke its national ties and confronted the Gentile world. Jewish missionaries began to preach the Jewish Messiah to the heathen and met with remarkable success.

The starting-point for the Christian evangelists were the Synagogues of the Diaspora which attracted considerable numbers of Gentiles. The ἑβραϊκός and φοβούμενοι in Acts, however we interpret their status in the eyes of Judaism, were naturally the first of the Gentile world to respond to the Gospel message. The reason Harnack gives for assigning the name ἕβραικος exclusively to Gentile Christians has convincing force. The heathen populace at Antioch coined the name to designate the Gentile believers. Acts 11, 26, therefore, marks a new stage of development where the Christian community shows already a preponderance of Gentile members. But this may have been an isolated case. At first, the proselytes who were won for the Gospel remained in the Synagogue or attached themselves to small Hebrew Christian groups within the Synagogue. But soon new converts were added who had no previous attachment to Judaism. The question whether these newly won heathen were first to be received in the Synagogue or might become ἔβραικος without the mediacy of Judaism was bound to become a burning issue. On this point opinions were divided, and it came to a split between the "liberal" party headed by Paul and the "Judaizers", whom Paul calls the "false brethren". The rôle which the leaders at Jerusalem played in the dispute is not clear. The name of James is usually associated with the Judaizing party, but with what justification it is difficult to decide. A general agreement will probably never be reached in this matter. But one thing is fairly certain, Paul was by no means the only champion of "antinomianism" as is sometimes maintained. He was backed by a considerable body of men, and not all of them came from the Diaspora or were tainted with Hellenism. This is borne out by the behaviour of Peter at Antioch. Machen who has discussed the relationship between Peter and Paul at great length, significantly says: "The very existence of the Church would have been impossible if there had been a permanent breach between the leader in the Gentile mission and the leader among the original disciples of Jesus". The existence of a strong antinomian party within Hebrew Christianity is well authenticated from Jewish sources, as we have seen in the preceding chapter.

It is at this point that the Apostolic Decree of Acts 15 becomes of vital importance. This highly controversial subject has been keenly discussed for over a century without any conclusive results. The main difficulty is the interpretation of vv. 28 & 29. The question whether the Decree aimed at purely ethical standards or also involved a certain adherence to ceremonial law, is not easy to decide. Prof. A. S. Peake calls it "one of the most tangled problems in the history of the early Church". The great problem is the decision regarding the text, as there are considerable differences involved. The generally accepted text has three food prohibitions and one ethical prohibition. But early and important MSS omit "things strangled". This would leave two food prohibitions and one ethical prohibition. "But the removal of 'things strangled' makes it possible to take all three as ethical, that is as prohibitions of idolatry, murder and impurity".

Strangely enough, most authorities which omit "things strangled" \( (πνιμτον\') \) add the "Golden rule" in its negative form. First Hilgenfeld and later Gotthold Resch have accepted the Western reading as the original, i.e. the version which omits the clause "things strangled" and adds the "Golden rule" in the negative form. Harnack previously fought for the Eastern, i.e. the common text, but has later accepted Resch's view with the exception of the Golden rule which he regards as a later addition. Harnack's change of opinion is important: only grave considerations have caused him to accept the other view. This is now the generally accepted view. Kirsopp Lake says: "The 'three-clause' Western text of the Decrees seems to be right". But Kirsopp Lake finds it more difficult than Harnack to interpret the "three clauses" in a strictly ethical sense, as the "Inbegriff eines Moralkatechismus" to use Harnack's phrase. And it seems to us that this balanced opinion is nearer the truth. Lake says: "\( ποσει\) whether it means "fornication" or marriage within prohibited degrees", has no place in a food-law, and \( αλμ\) though it might have meant murder is not likely to have done so... Therefore the theory of a "food-law" seems to be blocked by one word, and that of a "moral-law" by the other. The Decree, in our opinion, actually represents both, the elementary moral and "food-laws" required from the Gentile if social intercourse with a Jew was to become possible. The division between the strictly moral and the "ceremonial" in our modern sense was entirely unknown to the Jews. In view of the fact that both Weiss and Harnack are inclined to regard Acts 15, 23-29 not as the original letter, but only a "Compilation" made by the hand of Luke from an older document (Urkunde), it is not unreasonable to assume that Luke's decree is an abridged form of a slightly longer statement. To this we would add the fact that most scholars are agreed that the Decree has affinities with the Rabbinic rules concerning Gentile "God-fearers". Prof. Lake says: "there is sufficient resemblance between the Apostolic decrees and the Noachian rules to make it probably that both represent the regulations which controlled the intercourse of Jews and God-fearers in the middle of the first century." The rules concerning the "Sons of Noah" were the minimum the Rabbis required from the Gentiles who lived in their midst if any social intercourse was to become possible. These seven consisted of submission to the authorities, the rejection of idolatry, the prohibition of blasphemy, incest, shedding of blood, robbery and the cutting of a limb from a living animal. These Noachian Commandments have played considerable importance in Jewish jurisprudence, though their actual application was only seldom in use for lack of opportunity. It is possible that these were the rules to which the had to submit; those Gentiles who were only semi-proselytes. Maimonides declares: "Whosoever receives the seven commandments, and is careful to observe them, he is one of the pious of the nations of the world, and has a share in the World to come". There is therefore every reason to suppose that these or some similar commandments were to form the basis for the intercourse between the Gentile Christians and the Church at Jerusalem. But the acceptance of the Noachian rules in itself, did not put the Gentile on an equal footing with the born Jew. To become a full member of the Commonwealth of Israel, complete conformity with the requirements of the Law was expected. The Apostolic Decree has therefore left the Gentile position undefined, so much so that Peter himself was uncertain to what length it was permissible to go. Paul's silence about the decree may be due, not so much to his refusal to accept the verdict, as Prof. Lake suggests, but rather to a desire to avoid a controversial issue; there must have been considerable division of opinion as to the interpretation of the Decree. The Judaizers interpreted it one way, the circle of which Paul was representative another way. The clash between the two parties centred round this problem as the Epistles of Paul testify. A solution was never reached, a compromise was impossible. In the course of time, however, the Pauline view prevailed. Such a triumph was only possible thanks to the leniency, if not active cooperation of the Church at Jerusalem. This is a point too often overlooked.

The reaction of the Synagogue to the antinomian tendency in their midst was naturally violent. The position was aggravated by the fact that many semi-proselytes to Judaism embraced the new faith, which offered them equality without the requirement to undergo the painful ceremony of circumcision and without submission to the ceremonial part of the Law.

Jewish scholars, as we have seen, have strongly opposed the generally accepted view that the Synagogue was guilty of persecution. Abrahams categorically repudiates Harnack's statement that the Jews were the first and the greatest enemies of Christianity. Making allowance for Jewish protestations, we would still hold that the Synagogue was responsible for a good deal of persecution, not only of Hebrew Christians, but also of the Gentile Church. The reason for such behaviour lies not only in the fact that in the eyes of Judaism Christianity was a heresy, but that it was also a rival religion which soon proved a dangerous competitor in the mission-field. This psychological factor is of considerable importance.
Jewish writers have sometimes alleged that the Church was at pains to explain to the Roman authorities the essential difference between Judaism and Christianity. This was done in order to escape "the penalties attached to the observance of the Jewish religion" after the Destruction of the Temple and especially after the Bar Cochba incident. Mr. Ephraim Levine suggests the possibility that Christians who opposed the Bar Cochba insurrection gained special favour with the authorities and were thus not hindered in setting up a bishopric in Aelia Capitolina, the pagan city built on the ruins of Jerusalem. But none of these views can be supported by reliable evidence. On the other hand there is the witness of the N. T. & the Church Father's. Even allowing for the measure of exaggeration suggested by J. Weiss, the Synagogue still appears in violent opposition to Christianity. Trypho himself was not indifferent to the fact that Justin was a Christian; to him Christianity was tantamount to forsaking God and reposing confidence in man.

Jewish scholars who emphasise the Synagogue's lack of interest in Gentile Christianity, overlook the fact that the Church constituted a continual challenge to Judaism. Justin's Dialogue is a classical example. The Synagogue could not possibly remain indifferent to the Christian appropriation of all Jewish hopes, the national hope included. The Church disinherited the Synagogue and usurped all its privileges. The Synagogue naturally refused to accept such a situation. A clash was inevitable where Synagogue and Church had to live side by side. Justin remarks that Jews don't hesitate to put Christians to death, when they have the power to do so (ch.95). But by 160 A. D. (i.e. the time the Dial. was written), the actual division has taken place, and the controversy has lost much of its heat. Harnack rightly observes: "Der Dialog mit Trypho ist in Wahrheit der Monolog des Siegers. Nicht der Gegner selbst spricht mehr; Justin lässt ihn sprechen." Christianity is already in the ascendancy, the Gentile Church has won the field.

Hebrew Christian connection with Jerusalem was broken prior to A.D. 70 when the community migrated from Jerusalem to Pella. The second crisis which deepened the disruption between the Jewish followers of Jesus and their brethren was caused by the difficult situation which arose during the Bar Cochba insurrection. Bar Cochba made claim to Messiahship and was upheld by the most prominent Rabbi of the day, Akiba. For Hebrew Christians to lend a hand in the struggle virtually meant a denial of the Messiahship of Jesus, as there could not be two Messiahs to command their loyalty. Hebrew Christians therefore refused to join the insurrection and were bitterly persecuted. This marks the end of Jewish-Christian relationship. When, after the insurrection, the broken tradition was re-established by setting up a bishop in Jerusalem, now a pagan city called after a pagan god, the new bishop was a Gentile and a stranger to the old life of the Hebrew Church. From now onwards, Hebrew Christianity is pushed into the background. It is Gentile Christianity which occupies the forefront of history.

2. The Victory of the Church & its effect upon Jewish life.

The Gentile Church, together with the primitive tradition has taken over the struggle between the Jewish-Christian minority and orthodox Judaism, as a legacy from the early Church. But here an important change took place: 1) The champions of the new faith were now strangers and by nature deeply prejudiced towards the Jewish people. 2) While the controversy between the "Judaizers" and Pauline Christianity was an internal controversy between Jews, against the new background of the Gentile Church it assumed an altogether different proportion. The original struggle of the Judaic Church against Judaistic tendency assumed in the Gentile Church the aspect of direct opposition against the Jews. Thus, two elements have combined, the racial and the religious, to form a barrier dividing Gentile Christianity from the Jewish people. Both Church and Synagogue have developed under the sign of opposition to each other, and as is usual in human relationships, the weaker antagonist was destined to carry the burden of responsibility.

a) Spiritual disinheritance.

The Apostle Paul introduced a new conception regarding the meaning of Israel. While hitherto "Israel" was a purely national conception, Paul widened it to include all those who by faith in Christ Jesus entered the spiritual tradition of the Jews. Thus, those who were formerly "alienated from the common-wealth of Israel" (Eph. 2,12) became through faith sons of Abraham (Gal. 3,7). For in Christ Jesus, the Gentiles become united with the seed of Abraham, and therefore, "heirs according to promise" (Gal. 3,29). But Paul goes actually further than this. He distinguishes between Israel κατὰ λαόν (1 Cor. 10,18) and the Israel of God (Gal. 6,16). "For he is not a Jew, who is one outwardly...but he is a Jew who is one inwardly" (Rom. 2,29); therefore: "they are not all Israel, who are of Israel" (Rom. 9,6); for "it is not the children of the flesh that are the children of God". (Rom. 9,8). Yet with all that Paul holds on tenaciously to the election and prerogatives of the Israel κατὰ λαόν (cp.Rom. 8,4,5). He refuses to believe that God hath cast off his people (Rom. 11,1f), and he expresses his hope in the day when all Israel shall be saved (11,26): "For the gifts and the calling of God are irrevocable" (ἅμαμέλητα v. 29). It has been said "that St. Paul is not always consistent with himself", and that "he shies away from the logical conclusions of his own arguments". But it must be born in mind that Paul is a stranger to the modern secularised conception of nationality. To him, a Jew who detaches himself from his religious background forfeits all privileges. Israel, for the Apostle, is not racially nor nationally, but religiously defined. Rom. 9-11 is not concerned with nationhood, but the Church. It does not constitute a political discourse, but an interpretation of the history of grace, i.e. God's sovereign dealing with man. Conclusions as to the future of the Jewish people in the secular sense are therefore misapplied. But however we interpret these chapters, Prof. Goudge rightly observes that the Apostle discloses here a "passionate love for his nation".

But with the transformation of the background there soon came into existence a different attitude towards the Jews. The Jewish people, to the Apostle of the Gentiles, still the elect people of God, gradually becomes in the eyes of the Gentile Church, a God forsaken people divested of all merits. The Church appropriates not only the spiritual heritage of Israel, but even the national history of the Jews, their patriarchs, saints and prophets. In time, the whole spiritual and national background of Judaism was torn away from the Synagogue and claimed as the sole property of the Church. Even the heroes of the Maccabean wars were included in the Christian legacy. Eusebius makes a clear distinction between the Hebrews, God's chosen people, the most ancient people in the world, and the Jews, a reprobate people which rejected the prophets and crucified Jesus.
The process of appropriation began early in Christian history. Justin Martyr makes already full claim to the Hebrew Scriptures. He says to Trypho that the Jewish Scriptures belong to the Christians: "For we believe them: but you, though you read them, do not catch the spirit that is in them". This was a natural claim, for the Church knew herself to be in possession of the Holy Spirit, the only competent interpreter of the Scriptures. But with Justin, the affinity between Church and Synagogue is still clearly realised. The whole discussion with Trypho makes this apparent. Here the Christian appeals to the better judgement of the Jew; the appeal is based upon Scripture: What David sang and Isaiah preached, and Zechariah proclaimed and Moses wrote— is familiar to both, Trypho the Jew and Justin the Christian. The difference between them is a difference of interpretation. A dialogue is therefore still a possibility. There is still close proximity between the Church and the Synagogue and the middle link between the two is Hebrew-Christianity. But Hebrew Christianity, that vital bridge between the two parties, gradually faded away from history. With the weakening of Hebrew Christian influence, the breach between Judaism and the Church became complete. Jerome (347-420) already goes as far as to maintain that God gave the Jews the Law with the deliberate intention of deceiving them and leading them to destruction. To him, the Jewish place of worship is nothing else but the "Synagogue of Satan"; Ambrose calls it the Temple of Impiety. Dr. Parkes points out that Constantine in the first law dealing with the Synagogue refers to it by a term which, in Roman slang, meant a brothel. When we come to Chrysostom (347-407), we find the process of alienation completed and hostility the guiding rule in Christian-Jewish relationships. Chrysostom's denunciations of Judaism of which he knew little can scarcely be surpassed. Lukyn Williams, whose balanced judgement may be relied upon, comments on Chrysostom's attitude to the Jews: "There is no sign that he felt the slightest sympathy with them, much less a burning love for the people of whom His Saviour came in the flesh, or, indeed, that he regarded them in any other way than as having been rightly and permanently punished for their treatment of Christ, and as being emissaries of Satan in their temptation of Christians." Apart from the notorious eight Homiliae adversus Judaeos, there are many disparaging references to the Jews scattered throughout his many works. They all breathe the same spirit, that of contempt and utter rejection, with the exception of his treatise Contra Judaeos et Gentiles, quod Christus sit deus, which Chrysostom must have written at a much earlier period. It must, however, be borne in mind that Chrysostom is primarily a religious opponent. His first concern was the purity of the Christian faith which he thought jeopardized through too great familiarity between Jews and Christians.

It was these religious considerations which aggravated Jewish-Christian relationship and made friendship impossible. The Church viewed with misgiving Christians who entertained too friendly relations with Jews. The fear of "Judaizing" and the proselytism on the part of the Synagogue was ever present in the mind of Christian leaders. The whole situation must be viewed from the aspect of religious rivalry. Most of the Papal bulls and the many decrees of Church Councils concerning the Jewish people were protective measures. Their aim was to hinder the Jews from exercising religious influence upon Christians. This legitimate aim was ensured by methods, not only sub-Christian, but inhuman. In this respect the Jews fared no worse than other heretics. Religious intolerance is a general human failing. The Church felt no compunction to put obstacles in the free exercise of the Jewish religion, but was full of holy indignation at any sign of proselytism on the part of the Synagogue. At the same time, the Church was using every conceivable device to force the Jews to conversion. The right of the strong and the right of the weak are two different rights. The picture which the Church drew, for the benefit of the faithful, of the Jew and Judaism, was detached from experience, it was a distorted picture with little reference to actual fact.
Dr. Parkes hardly exaggerates when he describes the impression gained from the pages of early Christian literature of the Jew as a "monster, a theological abstraction, of superhuman cunning and malice, and more than superhuman blindness". The extent of Jewish unworthiness in the eyes of Christianity is well illustrated by the case of Anacletus II, the "Jewish Pope". On his accession to the see in 1130, Christendom split into two parties. On the side of Cardinal Pierleoni were "the majority of the cardinals with the Bishop of Porto, the Dean of the Sacred College", and the Roman clergy and dignitaries, and almost the whole population of Rome. In the rival camp supporting the antipope, Innocent II, was his chief champion, St. Bernard of Clairvaux, the emperor Lothair III, and "the entire European royalty of the time, the Councils of Rheims and Pisa, and the majority of the Roman Catholic clergy". The main cause of the schism, at any rate, the centre of attack by the opposing party was concentrated upon the Jewish descent of Pierleoni. For his great grandfather was a Jew called Baruch, who after baptism assumed the name of Benedictus Christianus and married a lady of an old Roman aristocratic family. Anacletus himself was at first a monk at Cluny, who later attained to the dignity of Cardinal. He was accused of a Jewish physiognomy, of using bribery to effect his election, of Jewish perfidy, and even of the crime of having a deformed brother who looked more like a Jew than a Christian. The temper of the Church was expressed in the words of St. Bernard in a letter to the Emperor: "Ut enim constant, Judaicum sobolem sedem Petri in Christi occupasse injuriam..." To that extent had the Church forgotten its Jewish connections.

The process of spiritual expropriation was completed at an early stage of Church history. An interesting example is the attitude of Archbishop Gregentius concerning the Scriptures and the Promises given to Israel. In his discussion with the Jew Herban in ca. 480 A.D. the Christian prelate finds it quite natural to adduce proof from the Scriptures that Israel had forfeited his rights. Such a deduction was easy in the light of the Pauline Epistles, but it is doubtful whether it actually represents the Pauline view. For the inclusion of the Gentiles in the commonwealth of Israel is one thing, but the inclusion of the Gentiles at the expense of the Jews is another. In this respect the Gentile Church was nearer to the views of Marcion than that of Paul.

b) Legal discrimination.

It would exceed the scope of this work to trace the various stages of the process which changed the legal position of Judaism from a religio licita under Roman rule to the inferior position it occupied under the rule of the Church. Dr. James Parkes has studiously examined the subject and we mostly draw upon his work.

We have already noted the fact that many of the decrees which the Church has promulgated against Judaism were dictated by necessity. The two rival faiths called to exist side by side were forced to take protective measures in order to guard their followers from harmful influence. In this respect, both Church and Synagogue acted on the same principle, though their methods were of necessity different. The Synagogue lacking legislative power resorted to moral coercion in enforcing the strictest rules of separation from Christian influence. The Church enjoying enormous political power endeavoured to protest its faithfulness by legally restricting Jewish rights. The fact that the Jews were not only religious opponents but ethnically strangers facilitated the process.

It may be argued that the Church cannot be held immediately responsible for laws enacted by the secular powers or for the many acts of violence committed by infuriated mobs. Admittedly, the Church has often exerted a restraining influence upon overzealous authorities and repeatedly denounced mob-violence. A characteristic case is the action taken by Gregory the Great at the complaint of the Jews in Rome. Bishop Victor of Palermo had, without case of provocation, confiscated some of the Synagogues and thus deprived the Jews of their places of worship. This was an act of violence and against the law which provided that new Synagogues were not to be built, but that old ones were not to be confiscated without reasonable cause. Gregory at once investigated the case and finding the Jews innocent, ordered that due amendment be made. His pronouncement is significant of the official attitude of the Church: "If the Jew may not exceed the law, he ought to be allowed peaceably to enjoy what the law permits." The Church was deeply concerned that the disabilities imposed upon the Jews be applied without slackening. We hear of constant threats and admonishments addressed to kings and prelates, occasionsd by their failure to apply the oppressive laws in all their rigidity. Gregory VII (Hildebrand, 1073-1085) rebuked Alfonso the King of Castile for employing Jews in high offices of state; he admonished the Spanish bishops to desist from too friendly relations with Jews. Similarly, Innocent III (1198-1216), who strongly disapproved of acts of violence and rebuked the Crusaders for their despicable practices upon the Jews of France, was anxious that none of the restrictive laws be infringed. Philip of France, who according to the pope's view, was too lenient with the Jews, met with severe criticism. The Count of Nevers was told in a letter dated 1208, that "The Jews must wander about the earth like the fratricide Cain, they are fugitives and vagabonds and are to be covered with insults". Against the few humane popes, like Alexander III (1159-1181), Innocent IV (1243-1254), Gregory X (1271-1276) and Paul III (1534-1540), who attempted to shield the Jews from acts of violence, there is the long list of Roman pontiffs who pursued an opposite course. Many of them regarded the Jews with contempt, some were indifferent, others were guilty of active persecution even to the extent of allowing acts of violence. In Rome itself "the fate of the Jews hung upon the personal character of the Popes, who sometimes bravely and humanely protected them; sometimes threw over them a shield from the selfish advantage they might reap from their presence; sometimes drove against them with fagot and sword as bitter persecutors". Thus, John XXII (1316-1344) is held to have been personally responsible for the massacres of Jews. He ordered their expulsion from the provinces outside Rome and only revoked the edict against the sum of 20,000 golden ducats. Eugenius IV (1431-1447) reenacted a decree dating from 1412, which forbade every form of intercourse between Jews and Christians. Paul IV (1554-1557) excelled his predecessors in harshness and intolerance towards the Jews. He ordered Synagogues to be destroyed, the practice of Judaism to be severely restricted, the enforcement of a distinctive headgear for Jewish men and women, and every form of intercourse with Christians to be avoided. Jews were precluded from belonging to guilds, forbidden to own property, even the number of annual marriages was strictly limited by law.

The legal position of the Jews is closely connected with the relation between Church and State in Christendom. Fishberg observes that "in countries where the Church has been part and parcel of the machinery of the State the fate of the Jews has been more or less deplorable, while wherever the Church has been divorced from the State, the Jews have enjoyed some degree of civic and political liberty". This may seem a biased view, but Dr. Parkes' opinion is to the same effect. Speaking on the influence of the Church upon anti-Jewish legislation in Spain, Parkes remarks: "those kings who were not elected by the favour of the clerical party, either passed no laws against the Jews at all, or reversed and ignored those of their more pious predecessors."

The first steps towards legal discrimination were made by Constantine the Great. This mainly affected the Jews in three points: their treatment of Jewish converts to Christianity, their treatment of non-Jewish slaves and their proper share in the duties of the decurionate from which they were hitherto exempt. It is mainly in the second of these points that the legal rights of Judaism were infringed. Jews were prohibited from circumcising their slaves and conversion to Judaism came to be regarded as an offence. Constantius went one step further and imposed additional restrictions upon the Jewish possession of slaves: no Jew was to be in possession of a Christian slave. The contravention of this law became a criminal offence punishable with the confiscation of all property. Furthermore, it was decreed that the circumcision of a slave was an offence deserving capital punishment. Under Gratian, the burden of the decurionate was extended to include Jewish Rabbis, while the Christian clerics were naturally exempted. "This is the first real infringement of the rights of Judaism as a lawful religion, for it placed it on a definitely inferior plane to orthodox Christianity", writes Dr. Parkes. Theodosius I went still further. He enacted that marriage concluded between Jew and Christian was equal to adultery; Jews were only to marry amongst themselves, and this according to the Christian tables of affinity. Dr. Parkes expresses the opinion that the law prohibiting the building of new Synagogues, a law very burdensome to Judaism, the infringement of which was one of the causes which led to the deposition of the last patriarch, Gamaliel, in 415, belongs to this period. The prohibition of building new Synagogues became a general rule in Christian legislation. Its purpose was to reduce Jewish influence upon the Gentile population. But at this stage Jewish freedom was still only limited. The Jews still enjoyed internal liberty to live in accordance with their own custom. Yet such a peculiar position could not last long. As Parkes well remarks: "Inferiority and equality cannot be permanently combined. The equilibrium is bound to change in one direction or the other". The defenceless position of Jewry decided the direction of the change. The Jewish minority had no means in its power to arrest the process. New legislation further curtailing Jewish rights followed in continuous succession, until in the Middle Ages, we find the Jew the personal property of the reigning prince.

The transition from antiquity to the Middle Ages is marked by a steady decline of the Jewish legal position in Christendom. But the process itself took many centuries and went through various intermediate stages, until finally the Jews sank from the status of civis Romani to that of servi camerae. This process progressed at a varying speed in different parts of Christendom. The Apocriticus of Macarius Magnes, a book which was certainly not later than A.D. 410, but probably much earlier, shows strange embarrassment in answering the question of a heathen critic, how St. Paul could have laid claim to being both a Jew and a Roman. The only answer Macarius can think of is by making a pun on the word $\delta\omega\mu\gamma$. He attempts three explanations: 1) Paul was driven by the Jews into the hands of the Romans, and so he could say he was not a Jew but a Roman. 2) He was right in calling himself a Roman for by the might ($\delta\omega\mu\gamma$) of the spirit he was to teach the Roman nation. 3) When he calls himself a Jew, he honours his countrymen when he calls himself a Roman he proclaims his nobility. Gratian, in a footnote remarks: "Macarius does not seem to have grasped that a Jew could be a Roman citizen". But this is not the case. Elsewhere Macarius explicitly says that there was a time when Jews were Roman subjects. In view of the fact that Caracalla conferred Roman citizenship on all free-born subjects of the Empire in A.D. 212, the discussion must have taken place long afterwards, at a time when the legal position of the Jews had already changed considerably. At the beginning of the 5th century, it is therefore an already established fact that to be a Jew is to belong to an inferior race. For, once a precedent was set, as in the case of Constantine, the logic of events proceeded with mathematical precision until legal discrimination ended in legal nonentity.

Gratian deprived converts to Judaism of all testamentary rights. Honorius removed the Jews from all political influence and from military service. Valentinian III enacted a law forbidding parents and grandparents of Jewish converts to disinherit them after their baptism. Theodosius II went so far as to impose upon his Jewish subjects the observance of Christian feasts and fasts. His successors enforced his laws not only in the Byzantine Empire, but also in Babylonis where Mar Zutra II (c. 496-530), the Prince of the Captivity, managed to maintain for some 7 years a measure of independence over against the Persian king Qubad I. Such interference may have contributed to the decline of intellectual life in the hitherto flourishing Talmudic academies of Sura and Pumbeditha.

It is difficult to say to what extent Jewish behaviour was responsible for some of the edicts against them. There are naturally instances on record where the provocative behaviour of some Jews called forth restricting enactments. Purim, the festival commemorating Esther's triumph over Haman sometimes gave occasion to grave offences. Theodosius introduced a law, 29th May 408, prohibiting the burning of Haman's effigy, which apparently in some cases led to the mockery of the Cross. Such misbehaviour was probably prompted by the desire to retaliate for the humiliation they suffered. But whenever an opportunity for revenge occurred, the Jews were not slow to seize it. A typical instance is the case in Alexandria, which ultimately led to their expulsion under Cyril in 415. It is, however, doubtful to what extent the Jews are to be held responsible for the massacre. It is significant that Orestes, the governor of the city, the authority immediately responsible for law and order sided with them and refused to be reconciled to Cyril for this act of violence.

Gradually the restrictive measures against the Jews in Spain and France reached a severity far exceeding the enactments of Justinian I (527-565) and Heraclius (610-641) in the East. While the Jewish community soon recovered under Omar (c. 581-644), after his victories against the Persians, the Spanish Jews under Egica (687-702) continued to meet with new restrictions. They were forbidden to own land and houses, to trade with North Africa, to transact business with Christians. In the end, on the pretext that the Jews were plotting with the Moors, the whole population was virtually sentenced to slavery and their children of seven years and upwards were handed over to Christians to be brought up in their faith. Fortunately, this state of affairs came to an abrupt end when Egica's second successor, Roderic, (711-713), the last Visigothic king in Spain, was defeated and killed by the Mohammedans in the autumn of 713. It is of no mean significance that during the occupation of Spain by the Saracens, the Jews enjoyed a period of peace and security, with the exception of the persecution started by the Caliph of Damascus, Omar II, in 720.

A strange consequence of the legal discrimination which the Jews had to endure, was the necessity of taking them under the special protection of the selfsame authorities which brought about such a situation. The legal enactments aimed at severely restricting Jewish freedom, but they did not sanction violence. The margin, however, between law and lawlessness became so narrow, that mob-violence prompted by greed was the inevitable result. Measures, therefore, had to be taken, to protect the Jews against injury. The first instance of such protection is connected with the name of Louis the Pious. We learn thus, that in 825, the king granted special letters with the purpose "to protect the Jews from arbitrary acts of violence, to allow them to carry on their trade undisturbed". The fact that the Jews had already reached a state in which special protection of the crown became necessary reveals the precariousness of their position. It foreshadows the future development which will ultimately make them the private property of the ruling prince. An analogous case is in the gradual development of the ghetto. The bishop of Speyer, Rüdiger, in order to protect the Jews against the mob conceived the idea in c.1084 of confining them to a special quarter of the town. Gradually, what was at first a measure of protection, became a place of involuntary confinement enforced by law. In Spain, in 1412, every city was enjoined to establish special quarters for Moors and Jews surrounded by a wall with one single gate. In the end, the Council of Basle in 1334 decreed that the Ghetto be universally applied in Christendom.

In 920, we hear of Louis of Provence confirming to the Archbishop of Arles not only the possession of the city, but also of its Jews. In 1103 the Emperor, Henry IV, is forced to include the Jews, for their own safety, in the patris generalis, thus singling them out from the rest of the population and putting them on the level with the women and clergy. The Jew is now not only under the special protection of the prince, but to all intents and purposes, the personal property of his host. All he has, his life included, is no longer his own. His disabilities are innumerable: "He had to obtain royal permission to settle in any city or town, from which he could not remove without similar leave; his property was continually liable to be taxed or tallaged; at his death the King claimed the whole, and secured a large share of his possessions". Like other serfs, he was obliged to do work for his master, but while the Christian was privileged to till the soil, the Jew was pressed into the business of usury. With some variations, such was the Jewish position in Christendom till the French Revolution.

It is vain to argue that Jewish disabilities were chiefly imposed by the secular powers and that the Church exercised a mitigating influence. The fact is that the moving spirit behind the secular arm was the Christian Church, which relentlessly pressed for discrimination. This is clearly seen by the many edicts of the various Councils affecting Jewish life. It must also be remembered that the distinction between ecclesiastical and secular spheres is a comparatively modern division. The close relationship between Church and State which pervaded Christendom makes a distinction of that kind inadmissible. On the contrary, there was a great measure of unity of purpose between Church and State concerning the Jewish people. Church and State worked hand in hand in the policy of keeping the Jew at bay. Frequently, the Church interfered in the life of the state, to the state’s disadvantage, by demanding the elimination of Jewish influence in the political and social spheres. It is therefore not surprising that for almost every law passed by the secular authorities there can be found the parallels in the canons of the Church.

The first canons were chiefly concerned with creating a barrier between Jews and Christians with the purpose of eliminating Jewish influence upon the Christians. Such influence was very considerable at first. In later centuries, when Jewish-Christian relationship became more strained, the various Church Councils entered upon the path of direct anti-Jewish legislation. An outstanding example are the canons passed by the succession of Councils at Toledo in the 7th century. These Toledo enactments were the main source of incitement "in the persecuting policy of the later Visigothic kings". The nature of that policy we have already described. It was thus the Church which not only encouraged but often compelled the State to bar the Jew from citizenship and from the enjoyment of the ordinary human rights.

c) Forced baptisms and other means of coercion.

The most outrageous crime committed, not only against the Jews, but also against the Church itself were the many instances of forced baptism. It must be said, however, to the honour of the Church, that officially it never approved of such action. But in spite of official disapproval, forced baptisms were a widely practised evil in which not only fanatical mobs and ignorant clergy, but often high ecclesiastical dignitaries indulged.
Even the Bulls issued by the papal see were unable to stop the evil. The oldest bull of this kind which has been preserved is that by Alexander II (1159-81). In it the Pope announces his intention to follow his predecessors, Calixtus II (1119-24) and Eugene III (1145-53) in their charitable treatment of the Jews. But already Gregory IV (827-44) asked that Jews should not be baptised by force, though he thinks that once baptised they ought to remain Christians. It is this inconsistency which made such a situation possible. On the one hand, the popes frequently under pains of excommunication prohibited violence against the Jew, on the other hand, they often held the impossible position that once baptism had taken place, though against the will of the baptised, that person is a Christian. Such an attitude towards baptism has a long history behind it, and was primarily dictated by doctrinal considerations. Once the opus operatum view predominated even to the exclusion of the proviso of non ponere obicem, the Church had consistently to demand of those baptised against their will to remain Christians; thus, those who were guilty of such violence knew they were performing a pious deed. This is probably one of the reasons why forced baptisms, in spite of frequent protests, were a constant feature of medieval life. Another reason was the fact that even the highest dignitaries of the church were often guilty of using compulsion.

A mild form of compulsion was the practice of conversional sermons. It seems to have been a generally accepted practice to send preachers on the Sabbath day to the Synagogues in order to instruct the Jews in the tenets of the Christian faith. This often led to scenes of violence, especially when together with the appointed preachers, a Christian mob entered the Synagogue to support them. In other instances, Jews were compelled to attend sermons in Church on special occasions. James I of Aragon (1213-76), who tried to protect the Jews of Lerida from the interference of the Inquisition, granted to them as a special privilege the right of non-attendance when these sermons were delivered outside the Jewish quarters. But he seems to have been either unwilling or unable to relieve them of the obligation of listening to the friars in their own Synagogues. The only stipulation he makes is that those friars be accompanied by not more than ten Christians of good repute. Since the establishment of the Inquisition, the Dominicans enjoyed the privilege of entering Jewish synagogues with the view of preaching to the worshippers.

The compulsory hearing of sermons by Jews in Christian Churches was already practised in the 13th century. Two centuries later it became a general custom, especially in Italy. Abrahams records the comic situation how the ears of Jews used to be examined on entering the Churches "for they were suspected of stopping them with cotton. Overseers were appointed to ensure that the Jews remained awake during the two-hours' sermon delivered to them. The conversion of at least one Jew was a necessary part of the function in some instances". The Bull of Benedict XIII of 1415 decreed that three public sermons were to be preached to the Jews annually and that all above 12 years of age "shall be compelled to attend to hear these sermons". But there was already in existence a Bull of Nicholas III issued in 1278 in which the Dominican and Franciscan Orders were instructed to gather the Jews as often as suitable and to read to them a lesson with the object of winning them for the faith.

Another form of compulsion of much greater severity was the repeated choice put to the Jews to accept either baptism or expulsion. Here, again, the official policy of the Church was towards leniency. But in most cases the secular powers acted either under Church influence or in order to please the ecclesiastical party. This is particularly the case with the Visigothic rulers of Spain after the Conversion of Recared from Arianism to Catholicism in 586. Thus Sisebut, in Visigothic Spain decreed that all Jews within his Kingdom were either to leave the country or to accept baptism. Similar decrees were enacted by his successors. Dr. Parkes records an interesting case where the alternative of Baptism or expulsion is actually propagated by the pope himself. The Archbishop of Mainz asked Leo VII (936-939) for advice how to deal with the Jewish population within his jurisdiction. The Pope's reply was that the religion of the Holy Trinity and the Mystery of the Incarnation be preached to them "with the utmost wisdom and prudence". But should this effort to win them fail, the Archbishop is at liberty to expel them, "since we ought not to dwell with the enemies of God".

Apart from direct interference in Jewish life many indirect methods were used to induce the Jews to conversion. In this category will fall the prohibition of building new Synagogues. Such a law was first introduced in the 5th century, or perhaps even earlier. One of the many restrictions imposed upon the Jews by Theodosius II was that new houses of worship were not to be erected. But at the same time, the emperor made it plain that the pulling down and the confiscation of already existing Synagogues was not lawful. In later years, Theodosius assumed a harsher tone. In the third Novella he declared: "Whoever builds a synagogue shall know that he has laboured for the Catholic Church... whoever repairs a Synagogue shall be fined fifty pounds: whoever corrupts the faith of the Christian shall be put to death". The law regarding new Synagogues was included in the Barbarian recension of the Theodosian Code and is contained in the Breviary of Alaric, thus being transmitted to the West. This law was repeated in other legislations and was jealously guarded by the Church. One of the offences which fell under the punishment of the Inquisition was the building of new Synagogues, an act forbidden by secular as well as canon-law.

Historical records tell, not only of the prohibition of building new Synagogues or the repairing of old ones, but also of the barbarous practice of destroying and confiscating Jewish houses of worship. Thus, Justinian, in his Novella 37 to Salamon, the Governor of Africa, ordered all Synagogues to be confiscated and handed over to the Catholic Church. It is recorded of the bishop of Dertona in Northern Italy, that he, together with his flock, destroyed a Synagogue and built a church on its site. The bishop's name was Innocentius. John of Ephesus boasts that during his mission to Asia, he had turned no less than seven Synagogues into churches. There were other forms of subtle compulsion serving the same end. Thus Paul III established an institution for Jewish converts; the support of the inmates was laid to the charge of the Jewish community in Rome. Under Gregory XIII, the Jews were made to pay the monks who sermonised them against their will. The most effective pressure however was that of economic coercion. Jews were frequently offered wealth and honour in exchange for their religion. To return once again to the strange incident in Minorca: Reuben the Jewish convert says naively enough to Theodorus, a prominent Jew: If you wish to live securely, "in honours and riches, believe, like me, in Christ". This is not the voice of Reuben the convert, but of an impatient, intolerant Church, sanctioning any method in order to attain her end. But the most repulsive form of coercion was the Church's attitude towards those who had been baptised against their will, or in the case of minors, against the will of their parents.

In an effort to break Jewish resistance, there have been many instances when fanatical mobs imposed baptism upon defenceless Jews, notably at the time of the First Crusade. In contravention to canon-law, and with the disapproval of the official Church there were also cases when local Churches and Councils made themselves guilty of using force in inducing the Jews to accept Christianity. Thus at a council held in Paris in 614, it was decided that any Jew found holding official position prohibited by law, was to be taken by the bishop and immediately baptised together with his whole household. The VI Council of Toledo decreed that only Catholics may reside in the Kingdom.
Jews were thus put between the choice of baptism or expulsion.

We learn of Sulpicius, the bishop of Bourges, that he is to be held responsible for a number of forced baptisms taking place between 620-644. The bishop of Trier, Everard, four hundred years later, put before the Jews baptism or expulsion; thus sustaining the spirit of intolerance which has persistently continued till modern times.

The Church officially condemned such practices. Alexander II (1061-73) reprimanded prince Landulphy Benevente in 1065 for forcing Jews into baptism. But notably Calixtus II (1119-1124) in his bull Sicut Judaeis (ca. 1120) explicitly forbade the practice of compulsory baptism on the grounds that it encouraged hypocrisy. The question however arose what was to become of those who had been baptised? Were they to be allowed to return to Judaism?

Such a problem arose after Sisebut's death. The king had ordered all Jews who had remained in his dominion after the expulsion, to be forcibly baptised. The IVth Council of Toledo presided over by Isicore of Seville strongly condemned Sisebut's action, but it nevertheless declared these baptisms valid. This was due to the peculiar view regarding the efficacy of the sacraments, as already indicated. The same council devoted much of its time to meting out punishment to those Jews who after having been forcibly baptised relapsed into Judaism, under the mild rule of Swinthila. The VIth Council of Toledo upheld the view. In a letter addressed to the pope Honorius, the Council expressed its surprise at the pope's leniency allowing baptised Jews to return to their former faith. It assured the pope that such a thing could have never happened in Spain. Gradually it became the general rule in the Church that once a Jew was baptised, he was under obligation to remain a Christian. Urban II strongly disapproved of the Emperor, Henry IV's decision to allow the Jews who had been forcibly baptised during the disturbances of 1096 to return to Judaism. Similarly, Hugues Aubriot, the Prevôt of Paris was severely reprimanded in 1380 and made to do penance for allowing Jews to reclaim their children who had been forcibly baptised. Louis VII was even persuaded by the Church to compel Jews thus baptised to remain faithful Christians "under pain of banishment, death or mutilation". Men like Vincent of Beauvais and John Duns Scotus "vehemently defended the practice of enforced baptism".

Such practice was only gradually evolved. The Church fathers were champions of tolerance. Tertullian laid down the rule that the natural law authorised man to follow only the voice of conscience in the practice of religion, since its acceptance was a matter of free-will and not of compulsion. Origen points to the difference between the law of Moses and that of Christ: Christians were no more at liberty to kill their enemies and to burn or to stone violators of the law. A fine plea for tolerance, is made by Lactantius. He lived at a time of bitter persecution. In 308 he wrote his Divinae Institutiones where he pleads for tolerance, as "there is no occasion for violence and injury, for religion cannot be imposed by force: the matter must be carried on by words rather than blows, that the will may be affected". But in the struggle against the Donatists, at a time when the Church could already count on the support of the State, the tone towards those whom she regarded to be in error gradually changed. Even Augustine, who displayed so much restraint and tolerance towards the Manicheans, who after their expulsion from Rome and Milan sought refuge in Africa, seemed to have changed his views in later life. Writing against the Donatists, Augustine admits the right of the State to use force, for it may sometimes prove wholesome to the erring and give protection to the faithful. Aquinas quotes Augustine's well known sentence: "It was once my opinion that none should be compelled to union with Christ, that we should deal in words, and fight in arguments. However this opinion of mine is undone..."

The first Catholic bishop to justify the co-operation of the State in questions of religion was Optimus of Mileve. He even asserted the right of the State to inflict the penalty of death on heretics, appealing to the authority of the Old Testament. But such was not the common view. Chrysostom, for instance, thought that "to consign a heretic to death is to commit an offence beyond atonement". The II Council of Nicaea of 787 refused to administer baptism to the children of Jewish Christians who were insincere in their faith. St. Bernard of Clairvaux still held that the only way of dealing with heretics was by argument, since: fides suadenda non imponenda. But gradually the harsher view prevailed. In the end heresy was associated with crimen laesae maiestatis. The position of the Roman Church has been defined theologically by Thomas Aquinas. In his Summa Theologica, Part II Q 10, 8, he quotes Chrysostom: "unbelievers ought not to be compelled to the faith"; he also quotes the Decretals (Can. De Judaeis) "The holy Synod prescribes with regard to the Jews, that for the future, none are to be compelled to believe": also Augustine's earlier view: "it is possible for a man to do other things against his will but he cannot believe unless he is willing". Aquinas therefore concludes: "Among unbelievers there are some who have never received the faith, such as the heathens and the Jews: and these are by no means to be compelled to the faith, in order that they may believe, because to believe depends on the will: nevertheless they should be compelled by the faithful, if it be possible to do so, so that they do not hinder the faith, by their blasphemies, or by their evil persuasions, or even by their open persecutions..."

"On the other hand, there are unbelievers who at some time have accepted the faith, and professed it, such as heretics and all apostates: such should be submitted even to bodily compulsion, that they may fulfil what they have promised, and hold what they, at one time, received."

"Those Jews who have in no way received the faith, ought by no means to be compelled to the faith: if however, they have received it they ought to be compelled to keep it..." It is obvious, then, that Aquinas is emphatic as to the attitude to the "lapsed" and ambiguous with regard to unbelievers. Such has been the Church's position throughout. L. I. Newman rightly says: "Conversions by force were officially condemned by the medieval Church, but in a fashion which left room for other missionary methods, the result of which was almost equally distasteful."

The fate of the Jews who have been forcibly baptised was more than tragic. At times of popular uprisings, Jews had often out of fear accepted baptism and allowed their children to be baptised. When persecution abated, however, they returned to their former faith. Newman records an instance of such lapsed Jews being imprisoned and excommunicated. After having been kept for a year without recanting their error, the inquisitors inquired of the pope, Nicholas II, as to the further steps to be taken.
The pope's answer was that they were to be treated as heretics, i.e. burned for continuous obstinacy. It was a rule in the Church that children under seven years of age were not to be baptized without the consent of their parents, but once baptism had taken place, they had to remain Christian, living in separation from their unbaptised parents. The Church however took the view that children past the age of 7 were sufficiently grown up to chose for themselves and could be baptized even against the will of their parents.

It was with heretics and "lapsed" Christians that the Inquisition was called upon to deal. To elicitate the truth from its victims, it received the sanction from Pope Innocent IV, May, 1252, to apply torture. This was later confirmed by other popes.

Henry Charles Lea, who has made the most detailed and scholarly study of the Inquisition, "exonerates the papacy and the Church generally from any large measure of responsibility for the constitution or practice or methods of the Inquisition". It is enough to read Adler's book, where a brief summary of Dr. Lea's work is contained, to gain the conviction that the Church must take a large share of the blame. Adler rightly remarks that "Persecution was not uncongenial either to pope or king, and, if not always welcomed for its own sake, was rejected by neither when it could advance some high political purpose". The Holy Office which put on its banner the words: Misericordia et justitia, became the most unholy institution of blackmail and robbery. The saddest part of the story of the Inquisition is the importance bribery played in its procedure, deciding about the life and death of its victims. The Church ingeniously left to the secular powers the task of carrying out the sentences passed by the Inquisition. There was only much jealousy between Pope and King regarding the spoil; but otherwise there was complete unity of purpose.

To the Jews, the activities of the Inquisition were the source of untold suffering, though as such they could have hardly come under the category of Christian heretics. In fact, Pope Martin V, explicitly forbade the Inquisitors to inquire into matters concerning the Jews. But an institution which was set up to deal with blasphemy and witchcraft and since 1257 with usury, could not have passed by the Jews, who, in the eyes of Christianity, were guilty of three crimes combined. But in addition to these three cardinal crimes which fell by law under the authority of the Holy Office, medieval ingenuity invented a number of other offences which exposed the Jews to the inquiries of "La Suprema" as the supreme Council of the Inquisition was called. Philip the Fair extended the authority of the Inquisition to deal with Jews who were found guilty of inducing Christians to heresy; of handling the Host; of blaspheming against the Sacraments; of circumcising Christians; of sheltering heretics; of building Synagogues; or singing too loudly in them; of possessing copies of the Talmud, or deluding Christians. It was fortunate for the Jews that the King soon afterwards renewed his quarrel with the pope, and thus restricted the privileges of the Inquisition. At times, the chicanery of the Inquisition went so far as to use force to induce Jews to accept baptism in order to be able to accuse them afterwards of heresy. Proof that at least in some instances the Church's concern was not only the purity of the Catholic faith can be seen from the readiness it showed in accepting the offer by Solomon ben Abraham of Montpellier and his supporters to proceed against the Maimonists in the same manner as against Christian heretics. The Dominicans and Franciscans were only too glad to lend a hand in purging Judaism from heresy, with the result that all Maimonist books were confiscated and publically burned in Dec., 1233. Thus was set a precedent for the future burning of Hebrew books. But it was not until the 15th century in Spain under Ferdinand and Isabella, the "Catholic" monarchs, that the Inquisition reached the height of its activities. Its main victims were the Marranos, a disparaging name for Jewish Christians suspected of heresy.

The true organiser of the Spanish Inquisition was Frey Tomas de Torquemada (1420-1498), whom Sabatini describes as "the arch-enemy of the Jews". He was appointed inquisitor-general of Castile and Aragon in 1483 or earlier, by pope Sixtus IV. During the fifteen years of Torquemada's activity as leader of the Holy Office, thousands of heretics were sent to the stake and tens of thousands suffered lesser penalties.

It is strange to hear a modern Roman Catholic writer explain that "the much maligned autos-da-fe were in reality but a religious ceremony (actus fidei)". The same writer tells us that "The Church established by Christ, as a perfect society, is empowered to make laws and inflict penalties for their violation. Heresy not only violates her law, but strikes at her very life, unity and belief; and from the beginning the heretic had incurred all the penalties of ecclesiastical courts". Such an attitude glaringly reveals the gulf which divides a Christian scholar from the forbearing spirit of his Master. But in the case of the Jews or the New Christians as the "Conversos" were called, Blötzler's explanation can hardly apply. Who was responsible for creating a situation by which thousands of Jews were condemned to the humiliation of outwardly feigning Christianity and inwardly clinging to the faith of their fathers? Was it not that the terrible massacres of 1391 which enveloped the whole of Spain created a new class of "Christians", consisting of Jews who accepted baptism as the only alternative to death and destruction?
It is not surprising that the Church looked with suspicion upon those "Conversos" whom she had gained in so unworthy a manner. The grim irony lies in the fact that these converts in whom "panic destroyed the unyielding fortitude so often manifested by the Jews under trouble", were held responsible for a situation which they had neither created nor could they help.

In order to rid the Church of a dangerous and undesirable element which she acquired by her own intolerance, the Inquisition resorted to the rack and the stake. At the height of its activity it was enough to have the smallest admixture of Jewish blood to make a man a suspect. "Much of the time of the Inquisition was taken up also in examining limpieza, or purity of blood from any Jew or Moslem admixture, of which it would grant certificates, which were requisite before taking up any public office". Spies were sent about the county and denunciations were made on the slightest pretext. But here as nowhere else, the tenacity of the Jew has been tried and proved. Though whole congregations under the heavy blows of persecution accepted Christianity, love for the faith of their fathers and abhorrence of a religion which employed such barbarism only stiffened their inner resistance. Nothing could erase from their embittered hearts their love for Judaism. They remained Jews. Many Marranos were burned at the stake, many fled for their lives abroad, some survived for centuries upon their native soil. As recently as 1920, a number of Marranos in Northern Portugal openly professed Judaism and under the leadership of Captain Arthur Carlos de Barros Basto established a Synagogue of their own.

3. Jewish reaction

It is no exaggeration to say that the empirical Church, i.e. the Church of history, has shown herself the greatest enemy of the Jewish people. The Church has, therefore, been the first and foremost stumbling-block in the Jewish appreciation of Jesus. In the words of Canon Danby, no mean authority on the subject:

"The Church, by its deliberate choice and conduct, has made itself one gigantic and seemingly impenetrable obstacle between them and the figure of our blessed Lord."\(^{150}\)

The memory of terrible wrongs suffered at the hands of Christians has deeply entered the Jewish consciousness. It could not have been otherwise. Crimes perpetrated in the name of one religion against another religion, make the victims into martyrs, and martyrs are not easily forgotten. The experience of the past still lives on in the Jewish tradition and has become an integral part of Judaism. An instance is the introduction to the prayer in the Musaph Service of New Year, still retained in some old editions of the Jewish Prayer book, according to the German and Polish rite. Legend has it that Rabbi Amnon of Mayence, a learned and wealthy Jew, was repeatedly pressed by the Archbishop to accept Christianity. In a moment of weakness he promised to consider the matter in the space of three days. But on leaving the palace he repented of his promise and at the end of the three days refused to follow the summons of the Archbishop. For this he had his members amputated and placed next to him in a coffin. After his mutilation, at his own request he was carried to the Synagogue. It was New Year's Day, and the reader was just about to begin the לְרָדוֹת when the Rabbi interposed and began to recite. לְהַנָּה גָּדוֹלָה. The fact that Amnon of Mayence is only a "legendary martyr" and that "the poem itself is much older than the period of the Crusades", has left the main impression unimpaired: Amnon the Rabbi dies at the hands of the Archbishop, paying the price for his constancy to the God of Israel. That such a price was exacted and exacted frequently has for ever embittered Jewish-Christian relationship. Characteris-tically enough, the great Hebrew poet, Judah ha-Levi (ca. 1085-1142), lets his hero say to Al Khazari: "I only seek freedom from service of those numerous people whose favor I do not care for, and shall never obtain, though I worked for it all my life". This was the modd of a Jew in the 12th century. The coming centuries were to add still heavier burdens upon the children of Israel.

לְהַנָּה גָּדוֹלָה

The most eloquent witness of what the Jews thought about Christianity comes from a letter addressed to German Jewry by Isaac Zarphati, a fugitive from Christian Europe to Mohammedan Turkey: "I have been informed of the calumnies, more bitter than death, which have befallen our brethren in Germany; of the tyrannical laws, the compulsory baptisms, and the banishments which daily take place. And if they flee from one place, greater misfortunes befall them in another. I hear an impudent nation raising up its impudent voice against the faithful, and see its hand swinging over them. There are woes within and woes without; daily edicts and taskmasters to exort money. The spiritual guides and the monks, the false priests, rise up against the unhappy people, and say 'We shall persecute them to destruction, the name of Israel shall no longer be remembered'. They imagine that their religion is in danger because the Jews in Jerusalem, peradventure, purchase the Church of the Sepulchre. For this reason, they have issued a decree that every Jew who is found on a Christian ship sailing for the East is to be cast into the sea. How are the holy German communities treated! How are their energies weakened! The Christians not only drive them from place to place, but lurk after their lives, brandish over them the sharpened sword, cast them into the flaming fire, into surging waters, or into stinking swamps. My brethren and teachers, friends and acquaintances, I, Isaac Zarphati, who came from France, was born in Germany, and there sat at the feet of masters, proclaim to you that Turkey is a land in which nothing is wanted. 'If you are willing it shall be well with you'. You shall go safely from Turkey to the Holy Land. Is it not better to live among Mohammedans than among Christians? Here we are allowed to dress in the finest material, here everyone sits under his own figtrees and vines, while in Christian countries, you are not permitted even to dress your children in red or blue without exposing them to be beaten red or blue. Hence you are obliged to walk about like beggars and in rags! All your days are gloomy, even your Sabbaths and festivals; strangers enjoy your possessions, and what use are treasures to a wealthy Jew? He keeps them only to his misfortune, and they are all lost in one day.'

But it must not be inferred that the present attitude towards Christianity is simply determined by past history thus showing an irreconcilable spirit on the part of the Jews. Jewish experience is not only coloured by past events handed down by tradition. Every generation has added its own bitter knowledge to the common stock. And this is as much true of the 20th century as of the 12th. It was not only a medieval bishop who, on obtaining an additional few cities to his jurisdiction and finding some Jewish inhabitants there, decided to solve the "Jewish problem" by burning the Jews. The president of the Holy Synod in Czarist Russia, in our own modern days, followed the path of hallowed tradition, when he suggested that the solution to the Jewish problem lay in the emigration of one third, the "conversion" of another third, and the massacre of the rest. More recently, in 1938, when the Patriarch of the Church in Roumania, Miron Cristea, became Prime Minister, he solemnly declared himself in favour of anti-Semitism. In the long list of inveterate Jew-baiters is a strange collection of Christian names from fanatics like Peter Hermit, Peter of Cluny, to men like Stephen Langton, Innocent III and Martin Luther. A new note was struck by the late Pope Pius XI in a famous broadcast in Sept. 1938. Commenting on the Canon of the Mass sacrificium Patriarchae nostri Abraham, the Pope said: "Notice that Abraham is called our Patriarch, our ancestor. Anti-Semitism is incompatible with the thought and sublime reality expressed in this text. It is a movement in which we Christians can have no part whatsoever...Antisemitism is unacceptable. Spiritually we are Semites". These unequivocal words uttered at a time when anti-Semitism in Germany had reached its height, have made a deep impression upon the Jewish people. But it is rightly felt that such pronouncements have come too late. At a time when the racial philosophy has begun to threaten the very existence of the Christian Church, it is only natural that official Christendom should dissociate itself from the taint of anti-Semitism. It is, however, doubtful whether the Church is able at this juncture to ward off the evil. There are still countries in Europe where anti-Semitism and Catholicism are almost synonyms. A popular way of demonstrating one's love for the Church is to hate the Jews.

It is therefore not surprising that in the Jewish consciousness Christianity is associated with terrible wrongs and bitter suffering. To many Jews, especially in Eastern Europe, the Cross is still the symbol of hatred and persecution. It is only natural that Jewish aversion to Christianity should take the form of suspicion and antipathy to Jesus Christ. If it is true that "in the sinister shadow of the Cross, the Church has forgotten not only the words 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do', but in the vast extent of her indebtedness to the Jews"; it is equally true that the Jews have forgotten to distinguish between historic Christianity and Jesus Christ. But the Jewish mistake is easier to explain. Rightly says A. Fürst about the Jewish attitude to Jesus: “Dass sich dieses für Liebe empfängliche Herz so stoisch und hartnäckig der opferfreudigen Liebe des Einen Gerechten aus seiner Mitte verschließen konnte, das ist ein psychologisches Rätsel, welches nur Israels lange Leidensgeschichte unter den Heidenchristen zu lösen vermag”¹⁶¹. He aptly remarks that to Treitschke’s famous phrase: The Jews are our misfortune; the Jewish people has greater right to retort: The Christians have been for nearly two thousand years our misfortune.¹⁶²

Nobody can seriously deny that there was tension between the Church and the Synagogue from the earliest days. Such tension is almost a necessity considering the uncompromising claim of both. The existence of Church and Synagogue side by side, makes a compromise impossible if both are to remain what they are. Any rapprochement on a religious basis can only prove detrimental to both parties. The nature of Judaism and Christianity is such that they exclude each other. Any attempt to create a “bridge theology”, however well intended, will prove futile. Church and Synagogue can only exist in eternal challenge to each other. Martin Buber has grasped this significant fact, Lev Gillet has not.¹⁶³ It is vain to seek an understanding between Christianity and Judaism on the basis derived from the common Bible. Church and Synagogue have actually two different Bibles and a different approach to the Old Testament. While to the Jew the old Testament points to Moses, to the Christian it points to Jesus Christ.¹⁶⁴ The dividing line between them is the Cross. This St. Paul and the Old Church knew better than our modern theologians. Yet the struggle between the two rival faiths is of a purely spiritual nature: the Church’s claim to represent the New Israel, the Israel of God in the spiritual sense, should have been a stimulus to herself and a challenge to the Synagogue, for this is a holy rivalry. Alas, the Church exchanged the Sword of the Spirit for the sword of steel. In an attempt to defend her faith she betrayed it. The struggle which began on a spiritual plane ended in an earthly fight for privilege, honour and gain. Here we have found the second answer to our question: How did it happen that Jesus of Nazareth became a stranger to his own people?

Between Jesus and the Jews stands the Christian Church.
CHAPTER IV.

CONTEMPORARY JUDAISM AND JESUS CHRIST.

From the middle of the 2nd century A.D., until the time of their emancipation, i.e., from the time when the process of separation between Judaism and Hebrew-Christianity was completed, till the time when they re-emerged from the medieval Ghettos, there was no Jesus-problem to the Jews. For many generations, Jesus' name was not mentioned amongst them, unless in derision. His life was not seriously considered as is evident from the Tol'doth Yeshu. His claims were made the subject of ridicule. Somehow the Jews managed to shut themselves up in their own dreamy world and to ignore the Man who changed the course of history before their eyes. There were, of course, great Jews who fully realised the significance of Jesus for the Gentile world, like the great commentator, Rabbi Sh'lo'mo Yitzhaki, or the great religious philosopher, Moses ben Maimon; but these were exceptions.

The ever growing difficulties of Jewish life in the Middle Ages, the repeated expulsions, the destruction of schools of learning, the severe censorship of literature, the burning of Hebrew books, ultimately caused an intellectual decline. Thus, the Jews, who had played so prominent a part in philosophy and science, and who had made such vital contributions to the revival of learning in Europe, thus paying the way for that mighty spiritual awakening which goes under the name of the Reformation, became themselves intellectual paupers. It is no exaggeration to say that after the 15th century, the end of which was marked by the tragic expulsion from Spain, Jewish importance in the sphere of learning rapidly declined until it sank into insignificance. Laurie Magnus describes this period of decline: "Socially, and morally too, to some extent, it is a story of degraded conditions; linguistically, it was an age of jargon; and intellectually, the influence of Jews on literature and thought was either merely occasional or chiefly revived from earlier times.\(^5\) Such was the inevitable result of the stress under which Jewish life was lived. An eloquent example of the difficulties the Jews had to face is furnished by the vicissitudes of the Talmud in Christian Europe.

Already, Justinian tried to force upon the Jews by an imperial decree the Greek translation of the Old Testament, and the abandonment of \(\delta\)\(e\nu\tau\varepsilon\)\(\gamma\)\(\omicron\)\(\omicron\)\(\upsilon\)\(\iota\)\(\sigma\)\(\rho\)\(\omicron\)\(\nu\)\(\varsigma\). In later centuries, after the establishment of the Inquisition, the Talmud was singled out for special attack. A famous instance of wholesale destruction occurred in Paris, in 1242, when twenty-four cartloads of copies were publicly burned. Later, by a papal bull of 1554, severe censorship of the Talmud and other Jewish literature was introduced. In 1559, the Talmud was included in the first Index Expurgatorius.\(^7\) Pope Pius IV, decreed in 1565 that the Talmud be deprived of its very name. But all efforts to suppress it proved altogether unsuccessful. Renewed attacks upon the Talmud were made by Gregory XIII. In 1593, Clement VIII again interdicted the possession of copies of the Talmud. The beginning of the 16th century saw the great controversy between John (Joseph) Pfefferkorn, a baptised Jew, in the service of the Dominicans, and the great and noble scholar John Reuchlin (1455-1522). The violent controversy lasted over 10 years, and ended with the actual triumph of Reuchlin, though he himself was condemned by the Pope. But, as Canon Danby says, the condemnation was only "on principle", for the decree against Hebrew literature was not renewed.\(^8\) For the first time in history, the Talmud was printed together with other Jewish books by a Christian printer, Daniel Bomberg of Antwerp. This was the immediate result of Reuchlin's victory. But many years had still to elapse before the Jews were given the freedom to read and write as they pleased. Meanwhile, not only the possession of the Talmud, but in some instances, the possession of any Jewish literature was regarded by the authorities as a criminal offence. The Jewish struggle against the severe censorship exercised by the Church, and the many prohibitions against Jewish writings, was carried on with courage and self-denial. But it was certainly no inducement to the furtherance of learning. Small wonder that under such circumstances, intellectual life became stagnant. The ghetto became, not only the symbol of physical enslavement, but also of intellectual decline. In the end, the Jews grew accustomed to Ghetto conditions and as a psychological reaction, deliberately refused to show any interest in what was happening in the outside world. As a Jewish writer put it: "Das Mussere Ghetto wurde beantwortet mit dem gewollten, bewussten, dem inneren Ghetto". Thus, the Jew confined to the narrow walls of his own home, concentrated all his intellectual faculties upon the study of the Talmud and upon mystical speculations. There was neither the freedom nor the will to gain an independent view regarding Jesus. For critical study and open expression of thought conditions were unpropitious. The Jews only entered into public discussion with the Church under duress, as the weaker partners labouring under severe handicaps. The extent of the Jewish disadvantage can be seen from the two most famous public discussions of that kind. The first took place between Pablo Christiani, a Jewish convert, and the famous R. Moses ben Nachman (1194–1270) at Barcelona in 1263, lasting four days. The second was the one between Geronimo de Santa-Fé (the former Jewish physician Joshua ben Joseph ha-Lorki) and a body of representative Jews lead by the physician and poet Don Vidal Ben-Benveniste Ibn Labi (Ferrer) of Saragosa. It took place at Tortosa in the Kingdom of Aragon and extended over a year and 9 months (Febr. 1413 - Nov. 1414) covering 68 (69) sessions in all. The public dispute between Pablo Christiani and R. Moses ben Nachman was turned into a state occasion and was held in the presence of the King of Aragon, Jayme I. In spite of the fact that the Rabbi was assured by the king of no evil consequences, and was granted freedom of speech, the Dominicans procured the public burning of his pamphlet which gave an account of the discussion and a sentence condemning him to exile for two years. The disputa­tion at Tortosa, which is unique in Jewish history both for the length of time it covered and for the interest it aroused, ended with even more disastrous consequences. For it resulted in a bull (1415) forbidding the study of the Talmud and other forms of degradation.

An unique case is that of the Karaite Isaac b. Abraham of Troki (1533-1594), the author of Chizzuk Emunah. His freedom in expressing his views was due to the peculiar circumstances of Polish life at that time, permitting great liberty of speech and lively exchange of thought. A striking exception to the conditions in Europe at that period.

1. Emancipation and its effects upon Jewish life.

Neither the Renaissance nor the great Reformation Movement following in its wake made any impression upon Jewish life. The great change came with the Age of Enlightenment.

The first condition for the re-entering of the Jewish people into European society was the removal of political and civil disabilities. Such a condition was created at the end of the 18th century. The process of emancipation was naturally a slow one, and the new problems it created are still acutely felt by both Jews and Gentiles. The process itself is still in progress and its ultimate success entirely depends upon the triumph of the great liberal ideals of the 18th century which initiated it.

The "natural rights" which Locke and Rousseau have claimed for the individual have laid the philosophical foundations for our modern age, and have thus paved the way for Jewish emancipation. This became possible when the old medieval rule of cuius regio eius religio became obsolete. The famous sentence: "In my states everyone may be saved after his own fashion", marks the spirit of the new age.

The 18th century saw the beginning of a new epoch in world history. It was also one of the most pregnant periods in the history of the Jewish people. On July 4th, 1776 was published the Declaration of American Independence, thus adumbrating the French Revolution. It was soon followed by the famous Declaration of the Rights of Man, issued by the Constituent Assembly of France in Aug. 1789. But Jewish emancipation was not won without a struggle. Characteristically enough, the extension of the Rights of Man to the Jewish population of France met with considerable resistance within the Assembly. It was not till one day before the closing of the Assembly that better judgment prevailed. Sept. 27, 1791, brought political freedom for French Jewry, "although some minor political and civil disabilities were yet enforced for years thereafter". This was the first instance for Jews in Europe to become citoyens actifs, and thus to enjoy equality of rights. The French example was soon imitated by other European states. Thus, the King of Prussia, Frederick William III, under the guidance of his liberal-minded prime minister Hardenberg, issued his famous edict of toleration, March 1812, which raised the Jews to Prussian citizenship and opened their way to greater opportunities.

The process of Jewish emancipation in the West of Europe lasted throughout the 19th century, and though it has known many setbacks, its course remained unarrested. The conservative reactionary forces made a last attempt to stay the tide of progress and many political battles were fought, but the spirit of the New Age prevailed. Even in England, where first attempts at emancipating the Jews were made earlier than anywhere else in Europe, the actual removal of disabilities did not pass without a prolonged struggle. Already, John Toland (1670-1722), in an essay entitled Reasons for naturalising the Jews in Great Britain and Ireland, (1714) was demanding equality of rights for the Jewish population. In 1753, Pelham (1696-1754) tried to introduce a Bill which would make it possible for the Jews to apply to Parliament for naturalization. Curiously enough, this bill passed without much opposition in the Upper House, but was defeated in the Commons. All the cities of England sent in their protests. A hundred years later, it was the House of Lords which raised most objections, as can be seen from the fierce struggle over the well known Oath Bill. It was not until 1858 that the effort at emancipation was crowned with success. But in some European countries, the process was carried over to the 20th century. In Russia full political equality came to the Jews with the Revolution of 1917.

The entry of the Jews into European life instantaneously met with a wave of reaction. European society was spiritually unprepared to accept the Jews as equal partners, and the old stored-up prejudice created a new phenomenon which passes under the inaccurate name of anti-Semitism. It is a characteristic product of our modern, secularised age. In that it is moved not by religious, but by purely racial and economic considerations, it differs vastly from the older form of Jew-hatred.\textsuperscript{21}

The home of modern or "scientific" anti-Semitism was Germany, and its most prominent prophet was Houston Stewart Chamberlain, an Englishman, who gave the finishing touches to its pseudo-scientific dress. There may be some psychological reasons for German prejudice towards the Jewish people, but anti-Semitism itself is so irrational that an adequate explanation is impossible apart from the fact that xenophobia, "the instinctive hatred of the human being for the stranger", is deeply ingrained in human nature. There is the fact that, according to ancient Germanic custom, the resident stranger was outside the protection of the law, unless by some agreement taken under the patronage of an important member of the tribe.\textsuperscript{23} National Socialist Germany has, therefore, reversed the process of progress and returned to ancient Germanic custom when publishing the Nuremberg decrees of 1935.

In the early days, the anti-Semitic surge, which rallied the most conservative elements in Europe, had definite associations with the Church. This was specially true of countries like Germany, Russia and France. Behind it was the vain effort to stem the tide of rationalism and to preserve the old way of life.\textsuperscript{24} Thus, the name of Christianity was used as a weapon against the Liberal Spirit of the time of which the emancipation of the Jews was one of its manifestations. But gradually as the Church lost ground in the West, its propaganda-value decreased. Anti-Semitism freed itself from all religious pretence and became by the genius of German politicians, an independent science on a purely racial basis. The complete break between anti-Semitism and Christianity is of the greatest consequence in that it bears directly upon the Jewish approach to Jesus.

The moment the Jews found themselves outside the Ghetto walls their first and immediate problem was that of adjustment. They had not only to find themselves a place in modern society, but also an inner attitude towards its prevailing trends. The corollary to external emancipation was the initiation of the process of internal emancipation with its revolutionary effects upon the Jewish mind.

a) The Haskalah.

The Jews left the religious atmosphere of the Ghetto to enter a society of growing rationalism and secularization. Their first impulse was, therefore, "to acquire western culture and to become like their neighbours in language, dress and habits". There was the feeling "that only lack of Western civilization hindered the Jews from achieving full legal equality with the other peoples". The work of Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786) served as the opening phase of the long process of adjustment. His translation of the Bible in modern German first brought the Jews in contact with a language which served as a medium of European culture. By the device of printing the new translation in Hebrew letters, it became possible to be read and understood by almost every Jew in Europe.

The desire to avail themselves of hitherto unknown spheres of learning gave birth to an educational movement known as the Haskalah. The Maskilim made it their objective to spread the knowledge of European culture amongst their brethren. They were prompted by the desire thus to hasten the inner process of cultural development. Their aim was "to secularize and Europeanize" Jewry. Their greatest achievements were attained in Eastern Europe, especially amongst Russian Jews upon whom they left an indelible mark. It has been pointed out that the Haskalah is to be held responsible for the spiritual crisis into which the Jews were plunged immediately on coming in contact with Western civilization. For the Haskalah, by exerting a denationalizing influence upon Judaism, and by secularizing Jewish life, called in question the separate existence of Jewry. The two basic principles of medieval Judaism, "the Messianic hope and the dismissal of the outer world", have been undermined by the surrender to European civilization. But actually such a crisis became inevitable by the abruptness of the change from medievalism to modernism. What was achieved in Europe by a slow process of development covering several centuries, was appropriated by Jewry within the space of 50 years. The rapidity of absorption is exemplified by the intellectual transformation of the pioneer of Jewish enlightenment Moses Mendelssohn.

b) Apostasy.

The urge for the appropriation of Western culture created an unique situation in Jewish history. What neither the sword nor the stake were able to achieve in the days of persecution, was unintentionally accomplished by the Liberalism of the 18th century. Jewish emancipation in the West was attended by an alarming drift towards Christianity. This phenomenon had already become evident at the initial stages of the emancipatory movement. Most of Mendelssohn's own children accepted baptism; later, not a single member of his descendants remained faithful to Judaism.

We are told that of the 3,610 Jews who lived in Berlin in 1819, "only 1,236 became Christians within the next four years". Israel Cohen attributes the wave of apostasy to social pressure. He explains that "the secessions in Prussia were encouraged by the State, and welcomed by the King. Not only were the Jews excluded from all public positions, denied all civil and political rights, and subjected to special humiliations, but even when they attempted to reform the Synagogue service in the hope of stemming the tide of apostasy, they were hindered by the Government, which forbade the use in the Synagogue of the German language and the wearing of the talar (minister's gown). However, while admitting a certain form of coercion, we hold that it does not explain the tide of apostasy itself. Jews have lived under similar and worse pressure for many centuries, staking their wealth and their lives for the faith of their fathers. They have resisted greater temptations than the bonus of ten ducats offered by Frederick William III to every Jew at his baptism; or the wedding-present offered by Frederick William IV to every baptised Jewess at her wedding.

There can be little doubt that in the majority of cases, the motives which led to baptism were anything but religious. Though it seems to us that the generalisations of which Mr. Cohen is guilty do injustice to a small number of converted Jews. But the deeper reason for the drift from the Synagogue is to be sought in the prevailing spirit of the age. The fact was, that the philosophical humanism of the 18th century had broken into the Jewish position with devastating effect. This coincided with a surge of Liberalism in Christian theology which glossed over the points of doctrine appearing most offensive to the Jewish mind. Christianity was reduced to a system of lofty ideals to which every educated person could subscribe. There was more than mere opportunism on the part of many Jews who sought baptism. It must be borne in mind that the second half of the 18th century was a time of great philosophical and ideological renaissance. It saw the rise of humanism in Germany, of Deism in England, of materialism... in France. Most of these ideologies had the ethical standards of Christianity as their background. Christianity, therefore, in the mind of the Jew, striving after emancipation, became the symbol of Western culture. Baptism came to be looked upon as a necessary ceremony attending the entrance of the Jew into the civilized world. There is ample evidence to show that both the Church and the Jews understood it in this way.

De le Roi quotes some interesting incidents which show up the laxity of the Church of those days. For example, Chr. Wil. Krause is supposed to have declared with conviction in his sermon at the baptism of Ferd. W. Fliess (1783) that by this act, he is now receiving the "convert" into the religion of reason, taking him away from the God of the Old Testament. Fliess was assured by the pastor that from henceforth nobody would interfere with his religious convictions, his religious views being his own private concern. Even more striking was the sermon delivered at the baptism of Esther Moses (1795) in which the preacher, Pastor C. Fr. Zastrau of Breslau ridiculed the missionary attempts of the Church. What wonder that a man like Heinrich Heine (1797-1856) regarded his baptism as the entrance ticket to European culture?

On the Jewish side, the Liberalism which did not hesitate to resolve the Christian faith into a vague and sentimental humanism, was hailed with enthusiasm and gratitude. Jewish scholars, who have written on the subject usually miss the fact that it was not to orthodox Christianity, but to German liberal theology of the 18th century that those "converts" subscribed. An interesting case is that of David Friedländer (1750-1834), an intimate friend and collaborator of Moses Mendelssohn. Friedländer addressed an open letter: Sendschreiben an den Oberconsistorialrath Teller zu Berlin von einigen Hausvatern jüdischer Religion, in which he suggests the union between Judaism and Christianity based on a mutual reform of doctrine. Friedländer offered to accept Christianity on condition that the interpretation of certain Christian dogmas be left to his own private judgment. Teller's answer is even more remarkable. De le Roi well observes that it reveals "den ganzen Jammer des damaligen Rationalismus". In it Teller boldly declares that there is no need for the Jewish "Hausvater" to trouble themselves with the formal adherence to Christianity, as they are already the bearers of the spirit of Christ. Though Friedländer himself has later changed his views and has even written against the missionary activities of the Church, he was as incapable of preventing his family from being baptized as was his friend Mendelssohn. The drift towards the Church lasted throughout the 19th century.

c) Reform.

The Reform movement grew out of the need to adjust Judaism to the new conditions of life. Philipson admits that the first reformers were guided "not by the thought of Jewish development, but by the artificial motive of making the external expression of their faith respond to an aesthetic longing". But it was not merely "aesthetic longing" which pressed for the reform of Judaism. In the Reform movement, the Jewish instinct for self-preservation asserted itself once more. Reform of the liturgy and ceremonial practice was the only answer to the breach which had been made in the age-old institutions of the Synagogue. To prevent the drift from Judaism, reform became an imperative demand. It was an effort to save the sinking ship from utter destruction. The Reform movement bears evidence that the drift towards Christianity was more than the result of social pressure or the desire for gain, as Mr. Cohen makes out. Philipson rightly points to the difficult position in which enlightenment had placed Jewish youth.
The discrepancy between the spirit of the time and the demands of Judaism pressed for a compromise. Such a compromise could only be made possible by the re-thinking of Judaism and the re-defining of its essence. The first question which arose out of the discussion was the problem of authority. The conservative group naturally appealed to tradition, the progressive group held, in common with the spirit of the age, that reason was the last instance of appeal. In this it could claim men like Maimonides and Mendelssohn as partisans. The basis principle of the reformers was that Judaism is not a static, but a growing religion, ever adaptable to the changing conditions of life.

In Liberal Judaism, especially as it developed in Great Britain and America, the Reform movement has reached its final stage. It is distinguished by a marked rationalism, an overemphasis of the ethical elements in religion, and a non-national outlook. The first philosopher of Liberal Judaism was Solomon Formstecher (1808-89). Simon Radowicz describes the movement as a tendency to "continuing more the prophetic than the rabbinical heritage, standing for limitation, reforming or abolishing the 'practical ritual laws', aiming at 'purifying' Judaism in the direction of the highest concept of monotheism, emphasizing the ethical character of Judaism and the universalism of the Jewish ethics, often interpreting the supernatural revelation not in the verbal traditional way or considering it not essential and central, and putting instead the general religio-ethical content of Judaism as its leading idea..." Liberal Judaism repudiates all nationalistic traits in the Synagogue and regards the dispersion as an essential prerequisite of Jewish life. It aims at "separatism in religion with assimilation in all the other elements of the national life, political, social and cultural".
d) The Science of Judaism.

The necessity for justifying the existence of Judaism before the modern world gave birth to a new science: Die Wissenschaft des Judentum. The recognized founder of this new branch of learning is the great scholar Leopold Zunz (1794-1886). Next to him deserves to be placed Abraham Geiger (1810-1874). Lindeskog rightly describes his importance in these words: "Er ist der Schöpfer der jüdischen Theologie im modernen Sinne des Wortes". It is only natural that the Reform Movement and the Science of Judaism, two concomitant phenomena, should be closely related. They both served the same end and they sprung from the same need, namely the adaptation of Judaism to modern life. The Reform Movement stood in need of a scientific approach to the theological, philosophical and historical problems which Judaism presented. This need was met by Jewish scholars who strove to obtain a historical and connected picture of the development of Judaism. The result was a philosophical and theological re-definition of Judaism in keeping with the spirit of the modern age.

e) Assimilation and nationalism.

Next to the question as to the seat of authority in Judaism, arose the correlated problem as to the meaning and purpose of a separate Jewish existence. The broadening of the Jewish outlook in matters of religion went hand in hand with a tendency towards denationalization of Jewish life. The Reform Movement, with its emphasis upon abstract ethical values, was rapidly drifting towards national effacement, until in the end, "all recollections of national glory were stricken from the memorial tablets of the people, all striving for national redemption were denied. They reduced themselves to the rank of a religious confession and repudiated the peculiar character and content of that religion - all this for the sake of winning confidence of the European world, of showing themselves worthy of emancipation", complains a Zionist writer. Geiger already contended that the Jews are a religious community and not a nation in the usual sense of the word. This became a fundamental principle in Liberal Judaism. The reformers argued that they were Germans of the Mosaic persuasion" and that their distinctiveness in the past rested upon a misunderstanding of the essence of Judaism. The reformers' effort to detach Judaism from its racial background and to give it a universalistic dress, led to the unconditional "affirmation of the lands of their exile". Such an attitude was equal to national self-effacement. But once again, the Jewish will for existence asserted itself. The Haskalah movement, which aimed at breaking the barriers dividing the Jews from European life, became itself a means of awakening the national consciousness. By bringing about a revival of the Hebrew language, it gave rise to a modern Hebrew literature, thus preparing the way for the national renaissance.

The contact with Western thought released destructive forces within the Jewish community. "The sudden break with the basis of Jewish life in the Galuth, without original values to replace them was bound to endanger the very existence of the people". It led, on the one hand, to the violent desire of breaking with the past and submerging among the nations; on the other hand, there set in a sense of disillusionment and frustration. This is specially true of Russian Jewry, which made noble but vain efforts at emancipation. Spiegel gives an accurate picture of the spiritual struggle in those early days. He quotes the words of Moses Leib Lilienbaum (1843-1910), an outstanding writer: "My heart is empty, I am barren as an ice-waste, like an oak hewn down". This mood of frustration is best exemplified in the person of the most prominent Jewish writer of that time. J. L. Gordon (1831-1892) has been called "the leading poet of the Haskalah period". Spiegel says of him: "He believed himself to be the last of the singers of Zion and the Jews, not a people nor a religious fellowship, but a hopeless, aimless flock".

The lapse from orthodox faith into nihilism, the prevailing mood of the Russian intelligentsia in those days, the quick disillusionment with European culture which set in early under the stress of life under the Czar, cooperated in creating a vacuum in the hearts and minds of many. The reaction expressed itself in a renewed affirmation of the cultural values of Jewish life. There is an interesting connection between the revival of European nationalism and political Zionism whose origin leads back to the Maskilim of Russian Jewry. The rapid growth of the national consciousness in the Gentile world strangely contrasted with the spirit of national-abnegation amongst Western Jews. The appeal to national egotism proved stronger than the vague idealism offered by the assimilationists. Jewish national renaissance came at a time of spiritual stress and filled a gap created by the inroads of rationalism upon Jewish life. This was accelerated by the growing tide of anti-Semitism which swept across Central and Eastern Europe. It created new values for the Jewish youth and renewed the hope in a distinct Jewish future.

But an exaggerated emphasis upon nationhood is not an indication of strength, but of weakness. Behind the nationalist effort is a gnawing sense of defeat. The falling back upon one's own resources is a means to disguise the rejection meted out by the world outside. Nationalism is always an act of despair. Underneath the self-assertiveness of political Zionism is a yearning for the values of Judaism irretrievably lost. There is a subtle difference between ancient and modern Jewish nationalism: in the past, nationalism sprang from the religious consciousness, at present, the religious consciousness springs from nationalism. In other words: in the past, the Jew knew himself primarily a member of the Synagogue, and therefore a member of his people; at present, he knows himself a member of his people, and therefore feels some obligation to be still a member of the Synagogue. This difference indicates the extent of secularization of Jewish life.

f) Conclusion.

In summing up our investigation, we gain the following picture: Emancipation brought the Jewish people in immediate contact with European culture. The attempt to adjust Jewish life to the new conditions has profoundly endangered the former structure of Judaism. It led on the one hand to apostasy and assimilation, and on the other hand to secularization and nationalism. The Reform movement which grew out of the desire to find a positive answer to the new problems which Judaism had to face gave the impulse to the scientific study of Judaism and to a new theological orientation. It divided Judaism into two separate camps: orthodoxy and Reform (Liberal) Judaism, thus creating a schism, which broke the unity of Jewish life. 58

The entry into European civilization demanded an attitude towards Christianity and thus brought to the forefront the problem of the Jewish attitude to Jesus.

2. Contemporary Judaism and Jesus Christ.

The discussion concerning the Jewish attitude to Jesus began in the early days of the emancipatory movement. It has now lasted for over a century and is still in progress. The subject is not of a purely academical nature. The moral and spiritual power of Christianity constitutes an ever present challenge. The decline of Judaism and the constant threat of Christian missions has added to the urgency of the problem. The rationalism of our age has created a vacuum in Jewish life which made Jews singularly susceptible to the Gospel story. Eminent Jews have, therefore, found it imperative to speak out freely in order to warn those who are not able to form an opinion of their own.

But apart from the practical side of the problem, there is also a definite historical interest. A closer study of Judaism has made it necessary to place the Christian "incident" in its proper perspective. By right, it belongs to Jewish history. The sources of the Christian Church have sprung upon Jewish soil. Its Founder is an important product of the religio-historical process of Judaism. Who was Jesus? What did he teach? What is his significance for Judaism and the Jewish people? These are questions which legitimately belong to the realm of historical research.

Above all, the controversy concerning the person of Jesus is part, and an important part of the Zwieggespräch between Judaism and Christianity. It is a theological necessity for both, the Church and Synagogue, to continue the discussion till the end of time. It was to their mutual loss that such a dialogue became impossible. For centuries, the controversy lapsed into a monologue carried on by the Church, which lacked the grace and the patience to listen to the voice of her one and adequate opponent - the Synagogue. It was left to our modern age to create the conditions under which the resumption of the dialogue became again possible: to-day, the Jew may say openly and freely what he thinks of Jesus of Nazareth, without exposing himself to danger. Freedom of speech has become an integral part of modern life. The following is the result of the controversy carried so far.

For a closer analysis of the views regarding the person of Jesus expressed by a multitude of prominent leaders in Judaism, we select, for the sake of brevity, a few outstanding names. To give a balanced picture, we deem it necessary to choose from both camps, the orthodox and the liberal alike. Though both schools of thought widely differ on many important subjects, they show a striking similarity in their approach to Jesus of Nazareth; not so much in what they say about him, as in the way they circumscribe his person and limit his significance. Characteristic for both is the over-emphasis of the "Jewishness" of Jesus. But while for the orthodox group the Jewishness of Jesus is only a questionable quality, i.e., Jesus is only a Jew at his best; the liberal group is inclined to apply a text-critical method which presents him always as a Jew, and always at his best. It is a feature of Jewish criticism, with but few exceptions, to treat the Synoptic text recklessly. The text is always adapted to the preconceived portrait of Jesus; but this is not only a Jewish failing. Wherein the orthodox and the Liberal school of thought differ fundamentally is in relating Jesus to Christianity. While for the orthodox, Jesus is the Founder of Christianity and inseparable from the Church, the Liberals differentiate between Jesus and historic Christianity, assigning its foundation chiefly to Paul.

a) Orthodox Judaism: Rejection.

Orthodox Judaism is naturally marked by the faithful adherence to tradition. This alone already predetermines the nature of the approach. The Synagogue's attitude towards Jesus in the past is an important factor in the discussion. There is a section amongst orthodox Jews which even avoids mentioning the name of Jesus. Characteristically, the Chief Rabbi, Dr. J. H. Hertz, invariably refers to him as the Founder of Christianity, without mentioning his name. The attitude of this group is that of absolute negation. Such Jews look with misgiving upon all those of their co-religionists who engage in the study of the life and work of Jesus. Any sign of positive criticism is decried as a betrayal of Judaism. Guarded appreciation, such as Dr. Klausner's critical, and from the Christian point of view, negative book on Jesus, is enough to cause a storm of indignation amongst them. Judah David Eisenstein, the editor of the Hebrew Encyclopedia, explained that Jews who speak appreciatively of Jesus do so only to flatter the Christians. These are his words: "Some Reform Rabbis, eager to flatter Christians, are wont to praise Jesus of Nazareth as a Prophet, and they commend His moral Law. But these do us more harm than even Christian missionaries... And still more are we injured by these Jewish writers who come out from their holes and begin to paint things falsely, and break out in praise of Jesus of Nazareth, as, for example, Dr. Joseph Klausner does in his book Jesus of Nazareth and His Law. He was the first among Jewish writers to compose a whole book in vindication of Christianity and to describe the life of Jesus and His 'Law', and to establish him as a teacher of morals above all others. Ephraim Deinard in his book The Sword of the Lord and of Israel", the writer continues, "says that Klausner has given a scientific trend to his book that none may suspect death in it... 'For his book is deadly poison to young Jews, and a sharp sword in the hands of our adversaries'". Those who know Klausner's book will appreciate the exaggeration.

A source of irritation to the conservative-orthodox group is... the frequent homage paid by Liberal Rabbis to the person of Jesus Christ. Dr. J. H. Hertz joins issue with those who by their "attitude of indiscriminate adulation of the Founder of Christianity, whose whole life was one of enmity and warfare against the foundations of our Faith as well as of amazing vilifications of the Rabbis", cause great damage to Judaism. For in so doing, "we not only condemn the attitude of our forefathers towards him, but to all intents and purposes, accuse them of Judicial murder".

Such unconditional surrender to tradition, however, is quickly vanishing. The most common attitude to Jesus even amongst scholars of the orthodox school is that of guarded appreciation.

Paul Goodman's views are perhaps the most typical for the whole orthodox group. Martin Buber, on the other hand, who is a keen and independent thinker, is interesting for his peculiar moral approach.

Goodman speaks of the charm of Christ's personality, and frankly admits that countless human hearts have been inspired, through faith in Jesus, with the spirit of love and self-sacrifice. The writer is aware "of the most extraordinary paradox of history" which is that though "the roots of the life and thought of Jesus lie entirely in Jewish soil", yet the Jews, "the kinsmen of Jesus have to this day remained the most consciously determined opponents of his supremacy". Goodman then puts the question: What is the Jewish argument against the claim of Jesus? The answer is: "It is the Jewish view that Jesus added no important original element to the religious and moral assets which had been accumulated by the Jewish prophets and sages, and that he has certainly been the more or less direct cause of lowering the pure and lofty ideas about God and man current in Judaism". The grounds for the refusal are to-day the same as of old: "For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy, and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God". The Jews, the writer goes on to explain, "the standard-bearers of the highest form of ethical Monotheism", cannot believe in the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation. Such a doctrine is offensive to the "inner springs of the noblest Jewish susceptibilities". Goodman dwells often on the subject of Jesus' dependence upon basic Jewish teaching, a feature common to all Jewish writers. He complains about the misrepresentation of the Pharisees on the part of the New Testament, and of Christian theologians. He regards the Essenes, יְרוֹמֶה, (?) as forming the link between Pharisaism and the Nazarenes ("primitive Christians"). The "modernist" approach of Paul Goodman is marked by the fact that he makes an important distinction between the real Jesus and the Christ of the Gospels: "The four Gospels are not biographies of Jesus by men who knew him and were eye-witnesses of what they recorded". He stresses the spuriousness of the Synoptic account and points to the impossibility of using it as warranted historical evidence; he thinks it ridiculous to make the Synoptic tradition the basis for dogmatic conclusions. His plea is that "it is conceded by those who have utilized the accumulated results of New Testament criticism that there is no acceptable basis for the Christian dogma of the Incarnation, and that the Christian idea of a Logos and of a Trinitarian Deity can be easily traced to pre-Christian Jewish and heathen philosophical concepts which were grafted on to the Monotheism of the Jews". So much for Christian doctrine. Nevertheless, Jesus himself, was a true "Jewish monotheist". Here the author quotes not only Gospel sayings, but also utterances by St. Paul, to prove that Jesus never regarded himself, nor did others regard him, to be equal with God.
In the sphere of ethics, Jesus stands on Jewish ground. This is an axiom for the author. With the exception of the idea of non-resistance, there is nothing in the teaching of Jesus which cannot be traced back to the influence of Jewish thought: "Competent Christian theologians have acknowledged the equality of Jewish ethics with the loftiest thoughts enunciated by Jesus." But there is a serious flaw in Jesus' ethical teaching in that it oversteps "the righteousness of the Scribes and the Pharisees", thus turning the practical teaching of Judaism into "a set of fantastic rules followed by a very few, while it is consciously disregarded as utterly impracticable by the overwhelming mass of even the most earnest believers". This accounts for the fact that Christians have so miserably failed to walk in their Master's steps. Contrasted with the heroic demands of Jesus "it is the distinction of the Mosaic rule of life that it requires no impossible, superhuman effort, no seclusion or morbid saintliness, to carry out our duty to God and man". It is therefore Mr. Goodman's conviction that from the Jewish point of view, Jesus cannot be recognized as a teacher "who affected a revolution in the ethical domain of Israel". Christianity, he holds, owes its success in the world not so much to what is "characteristically Christian, such as its teachings on poverty and non-resistance, but to the healthy and vigorous ethical principles derived from Judaism".

Paul Goodman rightly sees the main issue between Judaism and Christianity to centre round the question: "Was Jesus God or man?" It is because he realizes that the person of Jesus "is indissolubly bound up with the Christian dogma of the Trinity" that he is driven to the conclusion: "The most rational attitude of the Jews towards Jesus is a purely negative one", as, "there can be no place for Jesus in the religion of Israel". The signinificance of Jesus for the Jew lies in his world-historical importance, "as a Jewish figure, who has shed a light over vast masses of his fellow men..." 76

The views of Gerald Friedlander are very much the same. He, too, reiterates Jesus' dependence on the religious and ethical values of Judaism, derived from the prophets and the psalmists.
He crosses swords with Mr. C. G. Montefiore for calling Jesus the "last of the prophets"; he finds it difficult to understand how Montefiore could consider him to be the greatest of them. 77 He attacks Montefiore for suppressing some of the evidence elaborated by Gentile and Jewish scholars, which throws doubt upon the historicity of the person of Jesus, though Friedlander himself is not prepared "to go quite as far as Drews and Robertson in denying the possibility of the existence of Jesus". 78 But he emphatically asserts the impossibility of relying upon the scanty records we possess: "we cannot obtain from the Gospels, the only available sources at our disposal, the necessary data for a critical and historical life of Jesus". 79

Friedlander asks: Was Jesus a prophet? He accuses Montefiore of "unbalanced judgement" for answering this question in the affirmative. For himself, he asks: If Jesus be considered a prophet, "did he reveal an aspect of the Deity previously unknown or forgotten in his day?" The answer is: to the Gentiles he may have been a prophet, for he taught them things they did not know before, but: "The Jews of the days of Jesus had nothing to learn from his message". 80 Friedlander stresses the fact that "the Jews have refused steadfastly to see in the hero of the Gospels either a God, or an inspired prophet, or a qualified lawgiver, or a teacher in Israel with a new message for his people". 81 There was nothing new or original in all that Jesus taught: "The Beatitudes have undoubtedly a lofty tone, but let us not forget that all that they teach can be found in Isaiah and the Psalms. Israel finds nothing new here". Even the originality which Montefiore ascribes to Jesus in combining Lev. 19, 18 with Deut. 6, 4f, Friedlander flatly denies: "the Jew, the Pharisee, who wrote the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs had already said before Jesus: I loved the Lord, likewise also every man with all my heart". There is nothing in the Sermon on the Mount of special value to a Jew: Four-fifths of it is exclusively Jewish, the rest is of doubtful quality; in other words: "the good is not new, the new is not good". With all that, Jesus may be counted among the teachers of humanity, though he was "less inspired than the prophets of the Old Testament". His significance is confined to the Gentile world, the same can be said of Mohammed.

Friedlander's greatest objection to Jesus is the authority he assumed and the claims he made: "No Jew could possibly admit these claims which involve, 1) his right to abrogate the Divine Law, 2) his power to forgive sins, 3) the efficacy of his vicarious atonement, and 4) his ability to reveal God, the Father of man to whosoever he will".

Thus, Jesus, the apocalyptic dreamer and the eschatological preacher, whose message is "of little practical value to everyday life", is of no real consequence to the Jewish people. He belongs entirely to the Gentile world.

Prof. Martin Buber, though in a sense representing orthodox Judaism, occupies a position entirely his own. His great powers of discernment and his depth of thought give him a characteristic approach to the Jesus-problem, which is consistently in line with his religio-philosophical conception of Judaism.
Buber, who combines fervent Zionism with religious socialism, regards as the most precious heritage of classical Judaism the tendency towards actualization (die Tendenz der Virwirklichung): that is to say, it is a characteristic feature of Judaism to translate the will of God in human action. Buber explains: "Gott ist in den Dingen nur keimhaft zu schauen; aber er ist zwischen den Dingen zu verwirklichen." The realization of the will of God can only take place within society (Gemeinschaft), and true society is where the divine is actualized among men. Judaism, thus, has only one aim, it tries to attain to the Truth of Action. This is one of its fundamental principles. Buber finds it significant, that the first word of Jesus' message as presented by the Synoptic and the Johanne tradition, was the key-word of the Prophets: "Die Schwungkraft der Botschaft Jesu ist die altjüdische Forderung der unbedingten Entscheidung, die den Menschen wandelt und ins Gottesreich hebt. Und sie ist die Schwungkraft des Christentums geblieben..."

Buber, therefore, views Jesus' activity in its prophetic setting and calls him the "central Jew" in whom the Jewish will for actualization found its deepest expression. When Jesus taught that if two shall agree upon earth as touching anything, it shall be done unto them; when he taught that no man who puts his hand to the plough and looks back is fit for the Kingdom of God; he was giving expression to the greatest truth of Judaism. For, the Kingdom of God to Jesus, is: "keine vage himmlische Seligkeit; es ist auch keine geistliche oder kultische Vereinigung, keine Kirche; es ist das vollkommene Zusammenleben der Menschen; es ist die wahre Gemeinschaft die eben dadurch die unmittelbare Herrschaft Gottes, seine Basileia ist". Jesus' emphasis upon positive action, his insistence upon the doing of the will of God, his conception of the Kingdom as "die kommende Gemeinschaft, in der alle, die da hungert und dartet nach der Gerechtigkeit, satt werden, und die nicht aus gotlicher Gnade allein, sondern nur aus ihrem Zusammenwirken mit dem Menschenwille und der geheimmisvollen Verbindung beider hervorgehen kann", distinguishes the Master of Nazareth not only from Essene teaching, but also from Pauline thought.

"Gemeinschaft" is an important word in Buber's religious philosophy. To him, the purpose of Jesus was to make this ideal human relationship possible: "Jesus, der von einer vergeistlichten Spatform der Theokratie auf die ursprungliche Gewissheit des Gotteskdnigtums und seiner Erfullung zuruckweist, verkundigt sie (i.e. die Gemeinschaft), indem er die Knechtskonzeption erneuert und wandelt. Seine Botschaft aber hat nicht in ihrer echten Gestalt, sondern in einer Verzweigung, die der Botschaft Jesu fremd ist, die Volker erreicht". Herein lies the tragedy of the Christian Church: it lacks that essential Jewish dynamic element (Element der Aktivitat) which presses towards unity and actualization.
The Church, therefore, though in the teaching of Jesus, it received Jewish teaching, missed its most vital element: "die Tendenz der Verwirklichung ist in die geistigen Grundlagen des Wilerlebsens nicht eingegangen". But for this the Teacher is not to be blamed. In his "Three talks on Judaism", Buber deplores the fact that the most important paragraph of the spiritual history of the Jewish people, the appearance of Christianity, should have been obliterated from its records, through no fault of their own.
It was due to circumstances which created the "galut" psychology with its superstitious fear of the Nazarean movement: "we must place it back where it belongs: within the spiritual history of Judaism". It is obvious then that Buber claims Jesus for Judaism.
but not the Pauline Christ, and not the second person of the Trinity, but Jesus the Jew, one of the Synagogue's greatest representatives: "Jesus wollte aus dem Judentum den Tempel der wahren Gemeinschaft erbauen, vor deren blossen Anblick die Mauern des Gewaltstaates zerfallen müssten". That he failed, does not detract from his importance. In a strictly limited sense, Jesus may even make a legitimate claim to Messiahship, without offending Judaism, for it expects salvation from man: "weil es des Menschen Sache ist, Gottes Macht in der Erdenwelt zu begründen". But as long as the Kingdom of God is not yet realized, Israel will never accept any man as the Messiah.

Buber is distinguished from most orthodox writers by a sharp emphasis upon the difference between Jesus and Christianity, and by giving to Jesus a positive meaning within the history of Judaism. He thus approaches the Liberal attitude, standing, as it were, midway between the two groups.

b) Liberal Judaism: Appreciation.

The discussion concerning the Jewish attitude to Jesus became necessary the moment the Jews entered Western civilization, it is thus closely connected with the Reform movement. It was Liberal Judaism, with its tendency to break the fetters of tradition and to assimilate surrounding culture, which initiated the controversy. The orthodox group was forced into it by way of reaction. The conditions for the resumption of the discussion were singularly propitious. Not only has the old prejudice towards the Founder of the Church been broken down, thanks to a better understanding of history, but also improved relationship with Christianity has greatly helped towards a more sympathetic approach to the subject. The modern Jews were, therefore, prepared to face the problem independently and to form their own opinions. They entered the discussion at a moment when the field for critical investigation was already well prepared. So much so that Jewish scholarship has not been able to contribute anything original to the general discussion concerning Jesus of Nazareth. It had to be content with repeating, modifying or correcting the views of Gentile scholars. Its main merit, however, lies in the field of Rabbinical studies which helped towards a better understanding of the background against which Christianity was born.

But we are here not concerned with the strictly scientific study of the origins of Christianity. Behind the Liberal approach to the person of Jesus were deeper motives than academic interest. These motives are closely connected with the two main principles guiding the Reform movement - inward and outward readjustment.

Inward readjustment was necessitated by the evergrowing tide of rationalism, and by the profound upheaval caused through the collapse of the old structure of Jewish life. It led towards a re-examination of the foundations of Judaism, and a redefinition of its lasting values. The result was the rejection of Rabbinism in favour of prophetic Judaism. Interest in the prophetic conception of religion brought Jesus to the forefront.

Again, outward readjustment demanded a positive attitude to Western culture. It was soon recognized that an integral element of that culture was essentially Jewish. Jesus, thus, formed the link between the Gentile world and the Jewish people. It was recognized that Judaism and Christianity have much in common. Behind the outward form of both, accretions which in the past have obscured their real essence, is the manifestation of the eternal Truth. The eclectic tendency in Liberal Judaism and its peculiar emphasis upon ethics has also helped to fix the attention upon the Master of Nazareth.
Still another important motive may be added: it is of a psychological nature: there is an undeniable need for the human mind to classify and co-ordinate. Jesus, the Great Enigma, created a feeling of discomfort and presented a constant challenge. He had to be fitted into the long chain of religious evolution. A place had to be found for him, and honour demanded that such a place be within the precincts of Judaism. Hence the constant emphasis upon the Jewishness of Jesus.

A detailed survey in the nature of an anthology, of the views expressed by Liberal Jews, concerning Jesus is here unnecessary. There is a strange affinity of outlook, not only within Liberal Judaism, but within Judaism at large. In essence, both Liberal and orthodox Jews are in agreement concerning Jesus of Nazareth. The difference is mainly of perspective and emphasis. By choosing, therefore, a few outstanding names within Liberal Judaism, we receive a pretty accurate picture of the general outlook within that group.

The most outstanding figure in Liberal Judaism is undoubtedly C. G. Montefiore (1858–1938). He has contributed more than any other Jewish scholar towards a dispassionate and critical study of the person of Jesus Christ. He may also claim the credit for being the first Jew to write a modern commentary on the Synoptic Gospels.

Montefiore approaches the person of Jesus with great reverence. As far as it is consistent with his liberal views, he is prepared to go to any length in acknowledging the genius and the greatness of the Master of Nazareth. He says of himself: "I believe that I hold a higher view of the greatness and originality of the teaching of Jesus than is common among Liberal Jewish writers." Lindeskog, who has studiously examined the author's many contributions to the subject says with justifiable appreciation that Montefiore, like no other Jewish writer, was quick to grasp the quintessence of Jesus' teaching." He also attaches special importance to Montefiore's contention that the teaching of Jesus must not be viewed piecemeal, bit by bit, but as an organic whole." Lindeskog favourably contrasts this approach which he calls "Totalitätsbetrachtung" with the former method which aimed at finding analogies("Parallelismus"), and he thinks that it will constitute a new departure for future discussion."

Montefiore's Jowett Lectures for 1910, Some Elements of the Religious Teaching of Jesus according to the Synoptic Gospels, present in outline the author's views on the subject. His later contributions show but little deviation from his main line of approach." Montefiore readily concedes to Jesus the right to be called a prophet. He says: "the inwardness of Jesus, the intense spirituality of his teaching...show his connection and kinship with the Prophets. He takes up and renews their message"." Though he refused to see in Jesus the prophet, he acknowledges him to be "one of the greatest and most original of our Jewish prophets and teachers"; he adds, however: "but I should hesitate to say that he was more original than any one of them"." To Montefiore, Jesus is essentially a reformer: he raised his voice in condemnation of self-righteousness and formalism and he was a seeker of souls. Jesus' main sphere of activity was amongst the afflicted and the unhappy. Though the Rabbis, too, attached great value to repentance and were always willing to welcome a penitent sinner, yet the redeeming activity "as practised with the methods and the intensity of Jesus" was "something new in the religious history of Israel." By introducing the idea of re-deraption, Jesus brought a new conception into the religious life of his time. But, otherwise, there was nothing new in the teaching of Jesus, which was neither anti-rabbinic, nor anti-Jewish. All that Jesus did was to give to the old familiar doctrines "a high degree of purity, warmth and concentration". In one point Jesus differs from the prophets; against their impersonal function, stands his personal authority, which goes far beyond that of a prophet: "None of them ask for renunciation or sacrifice for my sake". But Montefiore explains that this claim to authority was due to the fact that Jesus believed himself to be the Messiah. His Messianic consciousness prompted Jesus to connect the imminent Kingdom with his own person. But Montefiore is willing to overlook such a natural mistake and even thinks that such a view was not entirely unworthy of the Master.

On the other hand, Montefiore, is able to find weak points in the character of Jesus. Thus, Jesus, "like every other great teacher, was not always consistent. Nor was he always at his highest level". Sometimes he appears tender and loving, teaching to forgive our enemies; at other times, he appears violent, impatiently denouncing the sinner, especially if he happens to be his opponent. There are two sides in the character of Jesus, "one stern and one tender, one forgiving and one severe". There is also a "double current in the teaching of Jesus". First, the particularistic Jewish tendency in the "anti-Gentile" utterances; secondly, there is the "universalistic" tendency to embrace all nations.

Naturally, Montefiore's great difficulty, is in deciding the authenticity of the Synoptic tradition. The last chapter deals with this problem exclusively. Though the author assures us of his sincere intention to approach the problem unbiased and without prejudice, as a "modern and an unorthodox Jew", his judgements are often sweeping and sometimes illfounded.\textsuperscript{126} Passages in the Synoptic tradition which do not comply with his preconceived view of the "historic Jesus" are declared unauthentic or spurious.\textsuperscript{127} Not only are utterances of slight verbal disagreement in the Synoptic account attributed to later editors, but in a few instances, some of the most noble words are put to their credit. Thus, the words uttered from the Cross, "father, forgive them", are, according to Montefiore, "almost certainly not authentic".\textsuperscript{128} He solicits our gratitude to "an editor who could rise to such a noble height". Again, the words "come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden and I will give you rest", words which have brought, as Montefiore says, healing, strength and courage to many sorrowing and suffering souls, have probably never been uttered by the historic Jesus.\textsuperscript{129}

But with all that, Jesus is a real person and occupies a central place in the history of religion. Not Paul, but Jesus, against Wellhausen's view, was the great pathologist of Judaism: "Jesus put his finger upon real and sore places: upon actual dangers, limitations, shortcomings. But the author of the Epistle to the Romans fights, for the most part, in the air".\textsuperscript{130} Montefiore identifies three evils which Jesus attacked, 1) The putting of ritual in place of morality. 2) Self-righteousness or pride. 3) Ill-directed intellectualism. Herein Jesus fundamentally differs from Paul. While the Master of Nazareth was involved in practical issues of every-day life, Paul's chief concern was of a purely theological nature.\textsuperscript{131} But the main significance of Jesus lies in his person and character. Thus, Jesus, "by his teaching, and by certain qualities in his personality", broke down the barriers of law and nationality and made a diffusion of Judaism possible. He has accomplished what, on a small scale has repeatedly been tried, but without much success, namely the breaking down the barriers of race and nationality in order to bring the essential elements of Judaism to the Gentile world. In this, Montefiore significantly differs from most Jewish scholars, who assign the missionary success entirely to the influence of Paul. In several other respects, Montefiore's position is unique. Particularly in his insistence upon the originality of Jesus. We have already seen that Montefiore, like most Jewish scholars, stresses the dependence of Jesus upon his Jewish environment. But while others are content with stating the fact and hunting for evidence, Montefiore has an open eye for the powerful personality of the Master. "The originality of Jesus", Montefiore agrees with Wellhausen, "lies in this, that he felt and picked out what was true and eternal amid the chaos and the rubbish and that he emunciated and emphasized it with the greatest possible insistence and stress". Though much of the teaching of Jesus can be found in one form or another in Rabbinic literature, there is a definite difference of atmosphere. "Here (i.e. in the Synoptics) we have religion and morality joined together with a white heat of intensity. The teaching often glows with light and fire. Nothing is to interfere with the pursuit of the highest moral and religious ideal, nothing is to come before it". Already the fact of "bringing together so many excellent ethical and religious doctrines within the compass of a single volume constitutes an originality in itself".

Montefiore has clearly stated his position with regard to the teaching of Jesus. But his appreciation of the person of Jesus in no place pierces the closed circle of his Liberal outlook. He thus divides the Synoptic material in three parts, rejecting what he regards as inconsistent with his views and accepting what in his opinion is of lasting value. First, there are items in the teaching of Jesus (like retribution, merit, love for one's enemies etc.) which seem both "original and striking", and which "deserve the fullest and most careful consideration". Secondly, there are elements in the teaching of Jesus respecting repentance, forgiveness, humility, etc. which are "essentially Jewish" and though not original, present "Jewish doctrine in sayings and parables of great power, beauty and impressiveness". Thirdly, there are certain elements in the teaching of Jesus erroneous and due to the "limited outlook of his time", such as the teaching about the "strait gate", the "two ways", about Gehenna and its fire, etc.: these are categorically to be rejected. There are still some other elements of lesser importance and doubtful value, like Jesus' teaching about prayer, riches, non-resistence, etc. These are of an indifferent nature. The Liberal Jew has the inner freedom to approach the New Testament without prejudice, selecting what is good and noble and rejecting what is inferior and outgrown.

But there still remains to be noted one other feature of Montefiore's criticism, which singles him out from among Jewish scholars. It is the general line of Jewish criticism to point out the impracticability of the ethics of Jesus, designed for angels and not for human beings. Montefiore challenges such a view.
He says: a morality, devised for 'human beings and not for angels', which takes account of human limitations and weaknesses, seems to be a morality which least of all enables men to overcome their weaknesses and to transcend their limitations. Ideals that can be fulfilled are not ideals at all. A great poet has declared that a man's reach must exceed his grasp. The positive values of the Gospel teaching are such that it can be doubted whether the Liberal Jew can ignore them with safety. "The prophet of inwardness", as Montefiore calls Jesus, has still a message for mankind and can serve as an example of the good life. In fact, he cannot conceive a time when Jesus "will no longer be a star of the first magnitude in the spiritual heavens, when he will no longer be regarded as one of the greatest religious heroes and teachers whom the world has seen". But with all that, to Liberal Jews, Jesus can neither be "the one and only Master", "the adored exemplar of all perfection", or "the One Consummate Teacher". Neither can the New Testament be anything else but "secondary and supplemental". Liberal Judaism draws its life-blood from the Old Testament Scriptures where all its essentials are already present: "The bulk of our religion and the bulk of our morality seem due neither to Jesus nor to Paul, neither to Plato nor to Epictetus, but to the sacred Scripture of the Jews". In Jesus, Montefiore, admires a great man "aflame with love of God and love of man"; "a large-hearted man, who gazed into the deepest nature of righteousness"; "a man who loved and was beloved"; "a hater of shams and hypocrisy"; "a man of great tenderness, of deep compassion"; a strong and fearless man; "a lover of children, and a lover of nature"; a man who lived and died in the service of others and "in intimate communion with God". Such a man deserves our admiration and our homage. So far Montefiore goes. He can afford to do so without endangering his position. Between him and Christianity, not only in its orthodox, but even in its Unitarian form, is still a margin of safety. His appreciation of the person of Jesus in no place even touches the periphery of religion. His advances, as he rightly says, are "only supposed advances". Further he cannot go. One step more would mean to lift Jesus from the contingency of history and to assign to him a place, which in the Jewish mind can only be assigned to God. "The Jew cannot find God in man", he cannot call any man his Master. "The Master of the modern Jew - is, and can only be, God".

Next to Montefiore in importance and influence stands Kaufmann Kohler (1843-1926). H. G. Enelow says of him that he was "universally regarded as the foremost exponent of Reform Judaism". Kohler's views are similar to those of Montefiore, with the exception that he lacks the sense of proportion so characteristic of the latter. His judgements are less cautious and his pronouncements are more dogmatic. His appreciation of the person of Jesus is characterized by a free use of superlatives and his style is more that of a rhetorician than that of a scholar.

Kohler's approach to the Synoptic story is naturally highly critical. He views the biographical data with great scepticism and detects legend and exaggeration at every step. Sometimes his inventiveness reaches unusual heights of ingenuity. Thus, he remarks about Mark's account of the temptation in the wilderness: "Mark relates that he (i.e. Jesus) was carried up to the upper sphere of the world where he was with the Hayyot, that is, the holy beasts that carry God's throne-chariot - the translator erroneously took the word to mean wild beasts - and where the angels ministered unto him". But behind all the legends and miracles which tend to obscure the person of Jesus, stands the Man of Nazareth full of power and charm, a man of a greater personality than even Hillel. "Indeed we do him little justice when, in comparing him with Hillel, the great and meek teacher, we fail to give him credit for the simplicity and incomparable humanity in which the man of the people eclipsed the Pharisean schoolmen".

Kohler is convinced that both John the Baptist and Jesus belonged to the Essene sect, but the former must have exercised a far greater influence upon his contemporaries, judging from Josephus. Kohler deduces the Essenic connections from the fact that Joseph of Arimathea - Ramathaim - "was anxious to provide a singularly honorable burial for Jesus". The probability that Joseph was an Essene he rests upon the dubious witness of Abot de-Rabbi Nathan, according to which there was a colony of Chasidim and Essenes in Beth Rama, which Kohler identifies with Arimathea. But he holds that there was an important difference between Jesus and the Essenes, in that Jesus represented no particular group, or school of thought; he was a man of the people. Unlike John the Baptist, Jesus was specially drawn to the outcasts of mankind. Being filled with true greatness, he sat down with publicans and sinners and communed with those whom the Essenes would have regarded as already condemned.

Kohler protests against the common view which makes Jesus the Founder of Christianity. Nothing was further from Jesus' mind, who was and remained "a perfect Jew", and who "shared the belief of his coreligionists in God as Father".

We are told with great emphasis that the significance of Jesus lies in bringing the Essene ideal of love and fellowship to supreme perfection. Jesus, therefore, ought not to be compared either with Hillel the Elder, nor with Philo of Alexandria. He is a unique phenomenon in the history of religion.

The teaching of Jesus about purity of heart and thought, his condemnation of all superficial and ritualistic practices reveal him a prophet and fearless reformer. But strictly speaking he is neither. He is not a prophet in the accepted sense, because his emphasis upon his own "I" disqualifies him to be ranked with the Prophets of Israel. Those Jewish scholars who try to place Jesus with the Prophets overlook this important fact. Nevertheless,
Kohler assures us, that though Jesus claimed to be the Son of God in a unique sense, he was far from "ascribing to himself a divine character".

Jesus was also no social reformer, nor was he an "universalist". He cherished apocalyptic dreams and favoured ascetism. His aim was to establish a worldly Kingdom over against the Kingdom of Satan, which was Rome. His outstanding quality was his great sympathy with the outcast and despised. This "made him a redeemer of men and an uplifter of womanhood without parallel in history". Kohler can rise to great rhetorical heights in his appreciation of Jesus, as his speech before the Congress of 1893 clearly shows. One passage deserves special mention: "It cannot and ought not to be denied", he says, "that the ideal of a human life held up by the Church is of matchless grandeur; behind all the dogmatic and mystic cobwebs of theology there is the fascinating model of human kindness and love, a sweeter and loftier one than this was never presented to the veneration of man. All the traits of the Greek sage and the Jewish saints are harmoniously blended in the man of Golgotha. No ethical system or religious catechism, however broad and pure, could equal the efficacy of this great personality, standing, unlike any other, midway between heaven and earth, equally near to God and to man...Jesus, the helper of the poor, the friend of the sinner, the brother of every fellow-sufferer, the comforter of every sorrow-laden, the healer of the sick, the uplifter of the fallen, the lover of man, the redeemer of woman, won the heart of mankind by storm...Jesus, the meekest of men, the most despised of the despised race of the Jews mounted the world's throne to be the earth's Great King..." Kohler explains, that Jesus' victory, is in fact, the vindication "of the humanity and philan-
In one important point Kohler differs from Montefiore, i.e. in the estimation of the practical value of Jesus' teaching. Already in 1893, Kohler expressed the view that "while Judaism fails to offer a perfect human model of individual greatness, it presents a far safer basis of social ethics than the Church does. The Decalogue is a better foundation to build on than the Sermon on the Mount. Society cannot be reared on mere love, an element which is altogether too pliable and yielding. Justice and law are the pillars of God's throne". In his last book, Kohler again touches upon the same subject. He points out that Jesus "an idealist of the highest type" cared nothing for the requirements of civilization, such as industry, science and art. This, naturally diminishes his importance for every day life. Nevertheless, to Kohler, Jesus remains the great Martyr in the cause of righteousness, love and brotherhood.

To complete the picture, we will now turn to another prominent Liberal Jew, Israel Abrahams, the late reader of Rabbinics in Cambridge (1858-1925).

Like Kaufmann Kohler, Abrahams was originally an orthodox Jew, who afterwards became a leading figure in the Liberal movement. His Studies in Pharisaism and the Gospels, intended by the author as an Appendix of notes to Montefiore's Commentary on the Synoptic Gospels, contain most of his views on our subject.

Abrahams holds that one of the problems in connection with the study of the Synoptic Gospels is how to keep the balance between the teaching of Jesus on the one hand, and the teaching of Judaism on the other. This remark in itself reveals the author's main purpose. His intention is to maintain the balance. For this reason, he is forced into the much-trodden path of Jewish criticism: he is out to show Jesus' dependence upon Judaism. But there is still another purpose Abrahams has in mind. He wants to help Christian readers to understand the two sides of the teaching of Jesus, namely, his "prophetic-apocalyptic visions of the Kingdom, and his prophetic-priestly concern in the moral and even ritual life of his day, in which he wished to see the Law maintained in so far as it could be applied to existing circumstances". These two contradictory dispositions represent a real difficulty to the Christian, but "the Jew sees nothing inconsistent in these two aspects". The issue of the discussion largely depends upon our picture of Pharisaism at that time. The author, therefore, wants to remove certain misconceptions and replace the negative picture painted by Christian theologians by a more positive one deduced from the evidence of Jewish sources.

Abrahams begins by pointing out that Jesus was given all freedom to teach in the Synagogues; the only difference between him and other teachers was that he was entirely independent of any particular Rabbinical school. Jesus never appealed to any mediate authority in support of his doctrine. Abrahams coins a peculiar phrase to describe the nature of Jesus' teaching, he was an "original eclectic". This explains why it is so difficult to place Jesus in any particular school. He had something of each, he was a mixture of them all. He thus created the impression of being his own authority. In this he differed from his contemporaries, whose custom it was to quote the authority upon which they based their views. Again, Abrahams bids us remember that in many cases the controversy between Jesus and his opponents was only of a local character and of no particular significance. But in one important point, Jesus differed fundamentally from all Pharisees, i.e. in his attitude to the Sabbath. "He asserted a general right to to abrogate the Sabbath-law for man's ordinary convenience, while the Rabbis limited the licence to cases of danger of life. In fact, Jesus went so far as to assert that no act of mercy should be postponed, whether it interfered with the Sabbath or not.

Another fundamental difference between Jesus and the Pharisees, appears to lie in their teaching with regard to the human access to God. While Pharisaism on the whole, though not throughout, maintained the universality of access, Jesus, as represented by the Synoptic Gospels, often disputed it. "The contrast of sheep and goats, of wheat and tares...the declaration that those who refuse to receive Jesus or his apostles are in a worse case than the men of Sodom and Gomorrah, the invariable intolerance and lack of sympathy when addressing opponents...make it hard to accept current judgement as to the universality of all the Gospel teaching in reference to the divine forgiveness."

Abrahams admires in Jesus the strong, unique sense of his own relationship and unbroken intercourse with God. But he adds: "this sense of nearness is weakened for all other men when the intercourse with God is broken by the intrusion between them and God of the person of Jesus."

Against this, Abrahams points to "the inherent universalism of Rabbinism", which shows itself in the Alenu prayer of the Jewish liturgy, in the saying that the righteous of all nations have a share in the world to come, and in the view that the Gentiles find repentance easier than even Israel does.

Abrahams contrasts the absoluteness of the claim as found in the Gospels with the lenient and the broad-minded views of the Rabbis who promise forgiveness to everyone who repents, and who strive to make repentance easy. His sympathy is naturally with the Rabbis who are radically opposed to the Pauline theory of grace. "The world is judged by Grace (ספירה), yet all is according to the amount of work". - "This antinomy is the ultimate doctrine of Pharisaism".162

Abrahams does not regard Jesus as the originator of the method of teaching by parables, at the same time, he admits that some of Jesus' parables point to a "strong personality". Jesus was not outside the Jewish camp and he could count upon the sympathy of the best representatives of Judaism. His criticism of the bad Pharisees, his zeal for the purity of the Temple, his fight against empty ritualism could only meet with their approval. Jesus often stood upon Pharisaic ground as represented by its best exponents.
On the question of forgiving ones enemies, of love to man, of devotion to God, there could be no difference between him and the Rabbis. Again, in his attitude to divorce, Jesus "appears to have been a Shammaite"; in many other points he shared the views and methods of other leading personalities of his own or earlier times. Abrahams compares Ecclesiasticus 28, 3-5 with Matthew 6, 12, 14f, and draws the conclusion that "this teaching of Jesus, son of Sirach, is absolutely identical with that of Jesus of Nazareth." Abrahams traces a straight line of development running through Proverbs, Sirach, the Twelve Patriarchs and the Synoptists. Jesus, thus, belongs to the spiritual history of Israel. He stands within the boundaries of the Synagogue; "when Jesus overturned the money-changers and ejected the sellers of doves from the Temple, he did a service to Judaism..." The reason that this is not understood by Christian writers, lies in their misconception of Pharisaism which is being judged by its misuses and not by its merits. Abrahams bids us remember that the money-changers and dove-sellers were not the only people who visited the Temple.
Pharisaism, like Christianity ought to be judged by its saints and not by its sinners, by the great characters it produced and not by the false servants who misrepresented it.164
Abrahams, though not blind to the weak points in the Synoptic teaching, fully appreciates the traits of originality and the lofty idealism of Jesus of Nazareth. On the whole he adds little to the discussion.

In summing up the controversy, it becomes clear that there is a strange affinity between orthodox and liberal Judaism in their attitude to Jesus' Christ; they both tend with slight variations, to the same conclusions. What Buber says about Jesus is in essence the same as Kohler says about him. Judaism rejects, and rejects categorically the specific Christology of the Church which removes the man of Nazareth from his natural environment and from the causality of history. While there is a growing conviction amongst Jews that there ought to be assigned a place of prominence to Jesus in their spiritual history, all are agreed that "there can be no place for Jesus in the religion of Israel". In this Paul Goodman, an orthodox Jew, and Claude Montefiore, a Liberal, stand united.

3. The Jewish Leben-Jesu-Forschung.

The first Jewish monograph dealing with the life and teaching of Jesus was written by Joseph Salvador in 1838. Since that time Jewish investigation has grown to considerable proportions. Though Jewish scholars have added but little originality to the general discussion and have sometimes tended to rely upon the work of others, they show features in this field of study which make it possible to speak of a specific Jewish Leben-Jesu-Forschung. The motives, which have led Jewish scholars to such enterprise are varied. In some instances, it is purely historical and scientific interest, as in the case with Robert Eisler; in other cases, it is the need for a definition as to the nature and character of Jesus' teaching and his attitude to Judaism and the Jews. Correlated to this is the urgent need for a clear statement concerning the Jewish attitude to Christianity on the one hand, and to Jesus of Nazareth on the other.

The variety of views concerning Jesus and the mass of material which has accumulated has been sifted and co-ordinated in a masterly fashion by Gösta Lindeskog. For our purpose, we have to exclude the work of a purely scientific nature and devote our attention to those scholars whose views are representative of the opinions of Jewry, and whose underlying motive betrays personal and spiritual interest. But even so, we can pay attention only to a few outstanding names.

a. Jesus and Christianity.

The first feature of the Jewish approach to the historical Jesus is characterized by an effort to detach him from the dogmatic conception of the Church. Jewish scholars are not interested in the Christ of Christianity, but in Jesus the Jew. Most of them assume that Jesus of Nazareth had no direct influence upon the creation of the Christian Church. Kaufmann Kohler ascribes the existence of Christianity neither to the life nor the teaching of Jesus, but to "his followers' vision of his resurrection". Others make him only indirectly responsible for Christianity, indicating that its creation would have never met with the Master's approval. Jesus stood firmly upon Jewish soil. "Not only did Jesus accept the fundamental religious ideas of his people, but he shared their superstitions, their mistakes, and their ignorances". Jesus firmly held to the particularism of the Jewish people. Nothing was therefore further from his mind than to break with Judaism and to establish another religion. All he wanted was "to reform and to purify the religion of his fellow Hebrews". It was only "after his death" that "his disagreements with contemporary Judaism were magnified in the interests of Gentile propaganda". This is a commonly held view. It is pointed out that Judaism in its purity was not able to gain adherence amongst the heathen, thus it had to be modified, it had to assume a new name and new forms. The teaching of Jesus has not reached the Gentile world in its purity, but "in einer Verzweiung", foreign to his original message. The role of mediation fell to Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles.

b. Jesus and Paul.

Paul is assigned a singular position by Jewish scholars. On the one hand, he is spoken of with admiration, Enelow calls him "an intellectual giant"; on the other hand, he is looked upon as the greatest enemy of Judaism. But all are agreed that without him, Christianity would have never come into existence, at any rate, not in its present form. Graetz says: "Christianity might have died a noiseless death, if Saul of Tarsus had not appeared, giving it new life and vigour". Paul is therefore looked upon as "the real founder of the Christian Church". Kohler goes so far as to place Paul entirely outside Rabbinic tradition. He thinks that only Christian writers who are unfamiliar with Rabbinic theology, can find traces of Rabbinic thought in Paul's writings. He denies that Paul could have ever sat at the feet of Gamaliel. Kohler warns against stressing Paul's phrase "a Hebrew of the Hebrews" too much. He is even inclined to doubt the veracity of his being of the tribe of Benjamin, on the grounds that "we find nowhere that genealogical lists were kept in those days". He holds, with other Jewish and Gentile scholars, that Paul owes his strange ideas to his Hellenistic upbringing. Paul was imbued with Philonic conceptions, but was probably more familiar with the Apocryphal Book of Wisdom and other apocalyptic writings than with Greek literature. Though it is difficult to measure the extent of pagan influence upon Paul, the author is certain that his "Monotheism was not as sublime and absolute as that of the prophets". I. M. Wise goes so far as to claim that the whole story of the crucifixion was a mere invention by Paul, "who made use of everything useful". It was Paul's influence which transformed the heroic death of Jesus into a vicarious sacrifice, with the result that "Jesus, the proclaimed Messiah, was turned into a son of David for Jews, and a son of God for Gentiles". With few exceptions, Jewish writers make Paul solely responsible for the creation of the Christian Church. They point to the gap separating Jesus from Paul, representing two worlds which do not meet. Paul "superimposed" says Reinach, upon the mild ethics of primitive Christianity, "the harsh doctrine of original sin, redemption and grace, which gave birth to eighteen centuries of arid disputation and still weighs like a nightmare on humanity".

Prof. Klausner, in his recent book on Paul, has tried to place the Apostle of the Gentiles in the context of the religious struggle of his age. This important study of the teaching and life of Paul sums up the most authoritative Jewish view on the problem of the relationship between Jesus and Paul.

Klausner says of the Apostle that he "consciously opposed paganism and brought over the pagans to Judaism in the new Christian form which he had created: but he was unconsciously influenced by paganism and took over from it most of its sacred practices (sacraments) in so far as he could find for them a precedent in Judaism, or, he unintentionally coloured Jewish customs with a pagan-mystery colour". But with all that, Klausner, contrary to the opinions already quoted, recognizes Paul's important connections with Judaism. He does not think there is any warrant to doubt Paul's repeated assertions that, prior to his conversion, he was a strict and faithful Jew, of the Pharisaic sect. There is also no reason to deny Paul's claim to have been a pupil of Gamaliel; in fact Klausner finds evidence in the Talmud in support of this claim. Klausner, thus, significantly concludes: "there is almost no doubt in mind that "that pupil" means Paul, "who sat at the feet of Gamaliel". But in spite of this, Paul was not a Jew in the proper sense: "His soul was torn between Palestinian Pharisaism, the teachings of which he learned particularly in Jerusalem, (although he was a 'Pharisee, a son of a Pharisee' and thus a Pharisee by family descent), and Jewish Hellenism - and in a certain measure also pagan Hellenism, in the midst of which he was born and educated in his childhood in pagan and half-Hellenistic Tarsus". The result of this strange mixture of influences was that Paul "was not completely at home either in his first religion or in his second, after his conversion". The difference between Paul and Jesus was the difference of environment; Jesus a Palestinian Jew, Paul a Hellenistic Jew. Paul's inherited Hellenism explains his tendency towards denationalization and division of soul. Such difference was of far-reaching consequence. But Klausner departs from the generally accepted line of Jewish argument; he says of himself: "Intensive research over many years has brought the writer of the present book to a deep conviction that there is nothing in the teaching of Paul - not even the most mystical elements in it - that did not come to him from authentic Judaism. For all the theories and hypotheses that Paul drew his opinions directly from Greek philosophical literature or the mystery religions of his time have no sufficient foundation. But it is a fact that most of the elements in his teaching which came from Judaism received unconsciously at his hands a non-Jewish colouring from the influence of the Hellenistic Jewish and pagan atmosphere with which Paul of Tarsus was surrounded during nearly all his life, except for the few years which he spent in Jerusalem. This important acknowledgement of the Jewishness of Paul, by as great and esteemed a scholar as Joseph Klausner, marks a new departure in the study of Pauline theology not only in respect to Jewish, but to scholarship in general.

Klausner, in a chapter, Jesus and Paul, makes it clear, that Paul's function in the development of Christianity was decisive. He thinks it is permissible to say - "of course with certain reservations - that it was not Jesus who created (or more correctly, founded) Christianity, but Paul. Jesus is the source and root of Christianity its religious ideal", but Paul is its actual founder. It was he who gave Christianity its sacraments, its mysticism, its organization and its peculiar colouring. There is also another point of great importance: in spite of all the tension between him and the religious authorities, Jesus remained faithful to Judaism, "he did not intend to found a new religion or a new Church, he only strove to bring about among his people Israel the Kingdom of Heaven, and to do this as a Messiah preaching the repentance and good works which would result in the politico-spiritual redemption of his people, and through them, of all mankind". But the case with Paul was different. Paul "was prepared to found a new Church consciously and intentionally". The Nazarenes would have remained a religious sect within Judaism and would have probably been reunited to the Synagogue after a time, but for Paul. Klausner therefore concludes: "Thus it can be said with finality: without Jesus, no Paul and no Nazarenes, but without Paul, no world Christianity. And in this sense, Jesus was not the founder of Christianity as it was spread among the Gentiles, but Paul 'the apostle of the Gentiles', in spite of the fact that Paul based himself on Jesus, and in spite of all that Paul received from the primitive church in Jerusalem'.

c. Jesus the Jew.

L. Neufeld admirably expressed the main tendency of Jewish criticism concerning Jesus when he said: "Das moderne Judentum, oder wenigstens die geistige Elite des Judentums, sieht in Jesus nicht den Abtrünnigen oder den Irrlehrer, den die Rabbinen früherer Jahrhunderte in ihm erblickten, sondern den wohl größten Mann, den das jüdische Volk je hervorgebracht hat". The emphasis upon the Jewishness of Jesus is common to most modern Jewish writers. In fact, the extent of his dependence upon Jewish heritage is often over-emphasized to the exclusion of any signs of originality on the part of Jesus. Jesus is in everything and always, a Jew.

The emphasis upon the Jewishness of Jesus is a natural reaction against the Christian tendency to underrate Judaism; but also against the traditional method of the Synagogue to underestimate the importance of Jesus. Thus, even orthodox writers, have been emphatic to stress this point. We have seen how Paul Goodman, an orthodox Jew, has stressed that: "the roots of the life and thought of Jesus lie entirely in Jewish soil". To prove this, Jewish scholars have devoted much time to a detailed examination of the teaching of Jesus. They have carefully scrutinized the Gospel narratives with a view to finding parallel teaching in Rabbinic literature. Their main purpose was to show that Jesus taught not only in conformity with Jewish tradition, but that all his life he remained faithful to the tenets of Judaism. Even Moriz Friedländer, so often in opposition to Jewish opinion, says of Jesus: "Nicht einmal ein Neuerer will er sein, nur fortsetzen will er das Werk Mosis und der Propheten; er gehört zu ihnen und will die Kontinuität mit ihnen durchaus nicht unterbrochen wissen. All that he did was to give "new expression of what the religious leaders of Israel and particularly the Prophets had sought to teach." He was a Jew, faithful to the Law even to the traditional dress: "He wore on his garments the fringes ordered by the Law and belonged so thoroughly to Judaism that he shared the narrow views held by the Judaens of that period, and thoroughly despised the heathen world. The prevailing view among Jewish scholars, is that Jesus in most things followed the Pharisaic mode of life, and sometimes showed himself a disciple of Hillel. Though Klausner points to some important differences between them, yet none are of a fundamental nature. Cecil Roth well summarizes the Jewish view of the historical Jesus in the following words: "In his wanderings throughout the country, he had urged the people to amend their manner of life. He taught the Fatherhood of God and human brotherhood, the infinite capacity of true repentance to secure forgiveness of sin, the possibility of holiness even for the humblest and most unlearned, the certainty of life everlasting for those whose faith was complete and unquestioning, the equality of powerful and lowly before the Divine throne. His doctrines were not perhaps conspicuously original. He copied and elaborated the teaching of contemporary Rabbis, as he had heard them repeated from earliest youth in the Synagogue of his native place. He presented them, however, in a new fashion untrammeled by the shackles of ceremonial law, and enlivened by continuous parables of haunting beauty. It was in the spirit of the ancient prophets of Israel that he inveighed against the exploitation of the poor by the rich, and at the strangle-hold which formalism seemed in his eyes to be establishing on religion."
The prophetic strain in Jesus is an important point in the Jewish conception. Moriz Friedländer says in this connection that Jesus "fühlte sich also berufen ein zweiter Jesaia, ein befreier seines Volkes aus geistiger Nacht zu werden. Die Blinden wollte er sehend, die Gefesselten frei machen, die Armen und Elen- den aufrichten". In this, his prophetic activity, Jesus, like the Prophets of old, met with opposition, his was the fate "that every serious reformer encounters from the ranks of organized religion". "The idealist must be ready to pay the price of his ideals".

Snelow calls Jesus "the arch-idealist". This feature in Jesus' character finds a recurring note in Jewish criticism. Sometimes it is made out that it constitutes a weakness which made him exaggerate the ethics of Judaism (Klausner), but in most cases, it is looked upon as a sign of perfection. Thus, Danziger speaks of Jesus as "full of human charm and sweetness...whose sublime principles might have united all men, Jew and Gentile alike, under the banner of his Messiahship, had it not been for the errors and crimes of those who mistook his word and work and mission, and even in his name were guilty of deeds at which humanity revolts". The ideals which Jesus taught and practised are not something new and strange to ethical conceptions of Judaism. They are Jewish ideals. The whole controversy concerning the originality of Jesus turns round this point.

Moriz Friedländer has gone furthest in acknowledging the originality and genius of Jesus. But he occupies an isolated position amongst Jewish scholars. Some think that Jesus held no original views whatsoever; others, that his originality lay not in what he taught, but how he taught. Rabbi I. M. Wise who speaks for the first group, challenges orthodox Christianity "to produce from the gospels any sound, humane, and universal doctrine not contained in our 'Judaism'\textsuperscript{216}. He claims that "nobody has ever been able to discover anything new and original in the gospels"\textsuperscript{217}. But this is an extreme view. The general trend among Jewish scholars is to acknowledge a certain degree of independence on the part of Jesus. His significance, it is held, lay not in the novelty of the doctrine he taught, but in the peculiar emphasis upon certain truths already familiar to the Jewish people. Enelow, who speaks for the latter group, points out that the whole controversy rests upon a misunderstanding of the meaning of originality. He accepts Hazlitt's definition, to the effect that originality does not consist in showing what has never been, but in pointing out what is before our eyes. Applying this to Jesus, Enelow says: "he gave a fresh interpretation of the laws governing the spiritual life, a fresh message concerning the meaning and purpose of religion, a new illumination of the sense and the object of the old law and of the old prophetic utterances. Here lay his genius and originality"\textsuperscript{218}. We have seen how Montefiore contended against the pedantry of some scholars whose main objective consists in finding parallels between Jesus and the Rabbis. The originality of Jesus, according to Montefiore, lay in his "trenchantness", his "eager insistency", in the fire, passion and intensity which characterize some of his sayings\textsuperscript{219}. It seems to us, however, that Enelow goes beyond Montefiore, when he says: "Supreme personality is greatest originality"\textsuperscript{220}. But neither as a teacher nor as an original thinker, does Jesus stand outside the circle of Jewish life, as Klausner puts it: "Jesus is the most Jewish of Jews, more Jewish than Simeon ben Shetach, more even than Hillel"\textsuperscript{221}. The Jewish people has a right to claim the Man of Nazareth as its own. Not only does Jesus belong to Judaism, but the whole Christian movement, "as long as its followers belonged to the Jewish people\textsuperscript{222}, is a part of Jewish history\textsuperscript{222}. Whatever ways primitive Christianity chose to pursue, there can be no doubt about Jesus, to quote Klausner once more: "Jesus himself did not deliver a single word with the intent to found a new religion or a new religious community".\textsuperscript{223} Christianity was the work of Paul, but Jesus was, and remained, a Jew, not only in the national, but also in the religious sense.

d. The nature of Jesus' activity.

We have already made mention that some Jewish scholars connect Jesus with the Essenes in one way or another. Foremost amongst those who hold this view is Graetz. He says: "Although it cannot be proved that Jesus was admitted into the order of the Essenes, much of his life and work can only be explained by the supposition that he had adopted their fundamental principles".\textsuperscript{124} This view in a modified form Klausner accepts: "in a certain measure, Jesus had points of resemblance with Essenis\textsuperscript{m}".\textsuperscript{125} But there are also important differences between Jesus and John on the one hand, and the Essenes on the other hand.\textsuperscript{226} Some, therefore, deny any connection between Jesus and the Essenes altogether.\textsuperscript{227} The problem which Jewish scholars had to face was as to the nature of his activity. What did Jesus aim at? or as Lindeskog phrased it: Wer wollte Jesus sein?\textsuperscript{115}

Most Jewish scholars are agreed that Jesus thought himself the promised Messiah. Upon this assumption was built up Salvador's view concerning the nature of Jesus' activity.\textsuperscript{229} Geiger, Graetz, Montefiore and Klausner, are all agreed on this point. The main question is, what is to be associated with this title. Jewish scholars are convinced that whatever else Messiahship implied, it could not have meant what Paul makes it out to be. To quote Herford, who though a Gentile, closely approximates to the Jewish view: "The Jewish Messiah portrayed in the earlier Gospels, the purely human being... was replaced in the mind of Paul by an ideal figure scarcely to be called human, though Paul would have shrunk from calling it divine". This view would meet with Prof. Klausner's full approval. According to Klausner, Paul, though a typical Jewish Rabbi, and a Pharisee, unconsciously yielded to foreign influence and thus presented the historical Jesus in terms acceptable to the pagan world.

It is clear to Prof. Klausner, that there is an important difference "between the stories about the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus and the stories of the pagans about the death and resurrection of their gods". There can be no doubt, however, that these stories helped to make "a Jewish Messiah" into the "Christian Son of God". But the vital question which has to be answered is: What kind of Messiah was Jesus; or what kind of Messiah did he want to be?

Robert Eisler has attempted to prove that Jesus was first and foremost an ecstatic revolutionary with a definite political purpose. To Eisler, Jesus is the ringleader of a revolutionary movement of a religious-nationalist character. This movement was directed against the Temple hierarchy and its Roman masters. Eisler's theory is related to that of Moriz Friedländer, to whom, Jesus was the leader of a popular party consisting of amme ha-arez. As such, Jesus stood in fierce opposition to the Pharisees. This struggle against the Pharisees became in the end a struggle against the ceremonial laws (Gesetzesbuchstaben). But Friedländer explains, that Jesus did not mean to abrogate the law, he remained faithful to it, only that his attitude was that of a non-Pharisee: "ein Leben im Geiste, aber nicht im Buchstaben des Gesetzes". Such was also the attitude of all educated non-Pharisaic circles in Palestine and the Diaspora, and of the Wisdom and apocalyptic literature. It was this fight against the Pharisaic interpretation of the law and its mode of life which brought Jesus to the full consciousness of his Messiahship. But in reality, Jesus, to Friedländer, is not a revolutionary in the usual sense of the word but rather "ein Religionsstifter". His significance lies in his emphasis upon the importance of the individual. Friedländer notices in the Gospels an all pervading tendency to bring the individual to his own right, whom Jesus regarded "als den wahren Träger des religiösen Lebens". This becomes specially clear in Mark 3,28f (the sin against the Holy Ghost) upon which Friedländer comments: "Nicht Gott noch sein Messias ist der Religion Selbstzweck, sondern der einzelne Mensch, der sich zu Gott und seinem Messias erheben soll". He concludes with the words: "Und diesem Werke der Erlösung des Menschen lebte und opferte sich Jesus".

The purely apocalyptic nature of Jesus' message and Messiahship is brought out by E. R. Trattner.

Trattner takes over from Abba Hillel Silver the theory that Jesus, like John the Baptist, and many other Jews at the time, believed the fifth millennium coming to an end ("the time is fulfilled", Mark 1,15), and that the sixth millennium ("the Kingdom of God") was at hand. "With this thought uppermost in his mind, Jesus felt a terrific inward compulsion to preach". But though he "drew heavily upon the prophetic heritage of his people", he was actually "more of an apocalyptic mystic than a prophet". "The Kingdom of God" which Jesus was preaching he understood in a national sense; he believed that God in a supernatural way would intervene on behalf of His people. But "only a very few shared with Jesus the conviction that the Kingdom of God was not to be established by the sword". In every other way, Jesus remained a faithful Jew and his attacks were not deliberately directed against contemporary Judaism, though some of his teaching contained the germs which were later developed in the "harsh anti-Pharisaic attitude of the Gospels". Though some of his claims were unusual "it would be extremely difficult to imagine Jesus, even in his most sublime moods, feeling that his relationship to the Heavenly Father was based upon some sort of physical pro-creation or to believe that the words "Son of God" were meant to be literal". 243

Jesus was a mystic, an apocalyptic, a millenerian, a man of little erudition, but of "profound insight", who was preparing his people for the coming of the Kingdom of God, which, in his mind, was imminent. His aim was to "reform and purify the religion of his fellow Hebrews", he thus knew himself to have come, not to annul, but to fulfil the Law. 245

Nevertheless, the Sadducean priests who delivered Jesus into the hands of the Roman Governor acted in the interests of the whole nation, for "Jesus' teaching about himself as a messiah constituted an alarming menace fraught with the greatest jeopardy to the entire Jewish nation". 246

Against the purely apocalyptic picture of Jesus, Enelow presents a more moderate, spiritual portrait.

H. G. Enelow explains that Jesus had soon to face the two most vital questions connected with his ministry: 1) What was the nature of the Kingdom he preached? 2) What was his own relation to that Kingdom? These two questions created the greatest crisis in Jesus' life. 247 How did Jesus answer these questions? After some inward struggle, Jesus reached a decision which became the "ruling thought of his life": "The Kingdom of God, he decided was not political, it was not of this world: it was spiritual". And because it was spiritual, it was already present: "The King-
The Kingdom of God is already here". This was his answer to the first question. The second question he answered in the same spirit: "he decided, if to realize inwardly the Kingdom of God meant to be the Messiah, the Anointed of God, God's Son, he was the Messiah."

What did this Messianic consciousness of Jesus imply? An answer to this question lies in Enelow's treatment of Jesus' attitude to the Law. Like most Jewish writers, Enelow is convinced "that it was not the purpose of Jesus to overthrow the Jewish religion, or the old law, and to find a new one". He did not come to destroy but to fulfill the Law. The author explains that this fulfilling of the Law meant to Jesus: "an absorption and application of its spirit, an inward apprehension of its content and the unfolding of its purpose in actual life". In other words, Jesus taught that, "Mechanical conformity was not enough. The Law demanded spiritual discernment and realization". Such a conception of the requirements of the Law was not a peculiarity of Jesus, but represents the opinion of the best teachers in Judaism at all times. The difference between Jesus and the Rabbis was not a difference of conceptions, but "a change of emphasis, and the change was toward the accentuation of the personal element, Jesus' own personal interfusion with his teaching". While the Jewish teachers "were interested in principles, in doctrines, in ideals", Jesus was interested in the individual. They "taught impersonally... Jesus taught personally". We have already seen that Moriz Friedländer made a similar distinction, but Enelow gives to Jesus' activity a purely spiritual interpretation. His view is best described by Montefiore's phrase: Jesus was the "prophet of inwardness". Hence the conflict between him and his contemporaries. To him, Messiahship meant one thing, and to them another thing. This involved Jesus "in the most tragic misunderstanding of his career", for which he had in the end to pay with his life. 251

Halfway between Eisler and Enelow stands Joseph Klausner.

To Klausner, Eisler's view with its characteristic emphasis upon the political aspect of Jesus' activity is unacceptable. Klausner denies that Jesus was a purely political Messiah, but he admits: "there was in the messiahship of Jesus also a political side, even if this side was not so fundamental in it as Robert Eisler, for example, thinks". 252 Klausner, who characteristically enough, opposes H. von Soden's view which makes the Acts of the Apostles out to be a kind of apology before the Roman Government, holds that it actually reflects definite historical events. He thus bases his view concerning the political aspect of Jesus' activity upon Acts 1,4–8. Klausner makes the following comment on this passage: "There is here a clear indication that shortly after the crucifixion the disciples of Jesus decided to give up the politico-national Messianic conception of the Jews, which involved a certain danger to the Roman Empire on account of its revolutionary implications, and to devote themselves solely to the propagation of the primitive Christian Messianic idea, which was abstract, mystical, and entirely spiritual - first in Palestine and afterwards in all the world". 253 But this change of policy is a later development, entirely dictated by circumstances, it does not represent Jesus' view. "Even Jesus gave consideration to the emancipation of the Jewish nation from subjection to earthly kingdoms by means of repentance and good works, by the establishment of the Kingdom 'not made with hands' through the agency of a supernatural power which God would give to the ethico-spiritual Messiah". For how otherwise can we account for the view expressed in Acts 1,6? Klausner observes that the hope expressed in this verse "seems strange as the beginning of the story of A similar approach we find expressed in Klausner's earlier work, Jesus of Nazareth, His Life, Times and Teaching. Here the author declares: "There is no reason to suppose that, like contemporary false Messiahs, he (Jesus) wished to arouse a revolt against Rome. Had such been the case, he would have met the same fate as they, and with his execution by the Romans, his ideal would have perished." No, Jesus' first objective was a spiritual revival. For this purpose he has chosen the holy city and the Day of Redemption (Passover) "when Jewish pilgrims from all the corners of the earth flocked to Jerusalem", in order to proclaim himself Messiah with the call to repentance and good works. The result of such a spiritual revival would be God's direct intervention, the overthrow of Rome, and the establishment of the Kingdom.

We see thus that Klausner chose the via media in determining the nature of Jesus' activity. He combines the several elements into one whole: here are the three aspects woven together: the political, the mystical, (apocalyptic), and the spiritual. Jesus calls to repentance, he expects as a result of it the inauguration of the New Age, which involves the defeat of Rome and national freedom. All this is implied in Jesus' claim to Messiahship.

e. The significance of Jesus.

We have seen that Jewish interest in the person of Jesus is entirely dissociated from all religious implications. Jesus is discussed by Jewish scholars, not in the context of Christian doctrine, but in the context of Jewish history. Jewish writers are not concerned with the Second Person of the Holy Trinity, but with Jesus of Nazareth, the man and the Jew. What then is the significance of the historical Jesus to the Jews?
There was a time when Jesus had no significance whatsoever to Jews. His life and teaching were of no consequence in the positive sense. Later, when the spiritual benefits of Christianity became evident, he was given a place in the plan of Divine Providence as a "preparer of the way for the King-Messiah", amongst the Gentiles. The question as to Jesus' significance for the Jews themselves is of recent origin. It was only thanks to the new circumstances in which the Jewish people found itself, that such a question was raised and an answer attempted. The closer contact between Judaism and Christianity necessitated by modern life, made it impossible to ignore the Man, under whose influence history took shape and whose moral power has endured for centuries. The fact that this Man was also a Jew, is the most outstanding element in the Jewish discussion. "No sensible Jew", says Enelow, "can be indifferent to the fact that a Jew should have had such a tremendous part in the religious education and direction of the human race". This knowledge is almost staggering to the Jewish mind. Trattner, in the foreword to his book, makes the following remark: "...it is estimated that more than sixty thousand volumes have been written about him (Jesus). Eight hundred languages and dialects tell his story". He continues: "To me - because I am a Jew - this is an amazing thing, for nothing quite like it has ever happened on so large a scale in the annals of man".

What then, is the significance of Jesus to the Jew?

Klausner has tried to answer this question in the last paragraph of his book: These are his words: "To the Jewish nation he can be neither God nor the Son of God, in the sense conveyed by belief in the Trinity...Neither can they regard him as a Prophet; he lacks the Prophet's political perception and the Prophet's spirit of national consolation in the political-national sense...neither can they regard him as a law-giver or the founder of a new religion: he did not even desire to be such. Neither is he a "Tanna" or Pharisaic rabbi: he nearly always ranged himself in opposition to the Pharisees...But Jesus is, for the Jewish nation, a great teacher of morality and an artist in parable.

Klausner's view well expresses general Jewish opinion. With few exceptions, there is a genuine desire to appreciate the person of Jesus and to acknowledge his significance for mankind. It is repeatedly stressed that his main value lies in the sphere of ethics, and that, not only in what he preached, but how he lived: Jesus is the supreme example of great human character. Graetz, remarking on the apparent deficiency in the education of Jesus, says: "His deficiency in knowledge, however, was fully compensated for by his intensely sympathetic character. High-minded earnestness and spotless moral purity were his undeniable attributes; they stand out in all the authentic accounts of his life that reached us." His great human sympathy with the suffering and the lowly is often emphasized by Jewish writers. Thus, Kaufmann Kohler is prepared to "admit that Jesus' great sympathy with the outcast and despised, which was his outstanding characteristic, made him a redeemer of men and an uplifter of womanhood without parallel in history." There is also an awareness amongst some Jewish authors that Jesus' activity marks a new epoch in the history of spiritual development. Trattner with great emphasis declares: "No Jewish prophet before Jesus ever searched out the miserable, the sick, the weak and the downtrodden in order to pour forth love and compassionate service. He went out of his way to redeem the lowly by a touch of human sympathy that is altogether unique in Jewish history."

Rabbi Hyman Gerson Enelow, devoted the last chapter of his book to the question of the Modern Jewish attitude to Jesus. He regards it "a subject of absorbing interest". He first calls attention to the fact that "there is no official attitude of modern Jews to Jesus. Neither the Jewish people, nor any considerable part of it, has made any formal declaration on the subject". But many prominent leaders of Judaism, though speaking as individuals have expressed their opinion. What then is their attitude?

1) Jews of all shades of opinions "whether modern or ancient, Reform or Orthodox, do not acknowledge the divinity of Jesus..." "Jews could not do that and still remain Jews". 2) Jews cannot acknowledge in Jesus the Messiah: "for the reason that the ideas associated in the Jewish mind with the Messiah not only were left unrealized by Jesus, but have remained unfulfilled to this day". The age "of human perfection, of human happiness, of justice and peace, as drawn by Isaiah and other Prophets" is not yet. Jews thus still hope for the Messianic age. 3) "The modern Jew deplores the tragic death of Jesus". He would rather that it had not occurred. But he died the death of a true idealist, "and who knows whether it was not by this very death that Jesus gained his immortality?..." 4) The modern Jew cannot "fail to glory in what Jesus has done for the growth of the ethical and spiritual life of humanity"; the fact that Jesus was a Jew, that he can be only understood in connection with his Jewish environment, adds special significance to his case. 5) "The modern Jew realizes the ethical power and spiritual beauty of Jesus"; he therefore "cannot fail to appreciate Jesus as a religious and ethical teacher". On these grounds, Eneelow assigns to Jesus the place due to him "among the noble teachers of morality and heroes of faith Israel has produced".

Looking back upon the sincere endeavour of Jewish scholarship to find the truth concerning the Man of Nazareth, a few outstanding facts inevitably strike the observer:

1) There exists a strange unanimity of opinion amongst Jewish scholars concerning some vital historical problems. This can be seen from the almost generally accepted view regarding the "anti-Jewish" and "pro-Roman" bias in the New Testament literature, which led Eisler to look for material concerning the historical Jesus elsewhere. There is also unanimity in the matter of Pharisaism and its relationship to Jesus; in the matter of Jesus' attitude to the Law and to Judaism; in the matter of his Messian-ship and its implications, etc.

2) The preoccupation with the teaching of Jesus to the neglect of a closer study of his personality, its innermost motives and self-consciousness.

3) The constant emphasis upon the Jewishness of Jesus which invariably leads to an analytical study of his teaching with reference to Rabbinic literature and minimisation of his originality.

4) The endeavour to separate Jesus from Pauline and Johannine theology, and thus from the Church. It is an effort to recover Jesus from the entanglements of Christian doctrine in order to make him presentable to the Jewish mind.

5) The effort to relate Jesus to the religious life of his time in order to assign to him a place within the development of Judaism.

6) The marked change in the general outlook concerning Jesus, expressing itself in sincere appreciation of his teaching, character and influence.

7) The awareness of his profound significance for humanity which expresses itself in a desire to correlate Jesus in one way or another to modern Jewish life.
It must, however, be borne in mind that the discussion concerning Jesus which began with Joseph Salvador after 18 centuries of silence, is still in its initial stages. It has not yet reached maturity. So far, only individual Jews have spoken, but Judaism has not yet raised its voice. The effect of Jewish study resulted rather in the breaking down of prejudice than in the building up of positive conceptions. The last word concerning Jesus of Nazareth still belongs to a future age.
CHAPTER V.

PRIMITIVE HEBREW CHRISTIANITY.

So far, we have dealt with some of the features characteristic of the Jewish attitude to Jesus Christ. It is throughout a negative picture. But there is still another side which has remained unnoticed even by the most penetrating students. We are referring to the fact that throughout the ages, there were numbers of Jews who submitted to the claims which Jesus made and acknowledged his Messiahship. This is important, for it is almost universally held on both sides that the Jews have rejected and the Gentiles accepted Jesus of Nazareth. This grave mistake is due to the fact that Christianity, which originally began as a movement of individuals and remained such for several centuries, subsequently became a state-patronized religion. Herein is the irony of history, that while the early triumphs of Christianity were due to the breaking down of all national ties, these very triumphs led it back into the bondage of nationalism. The main issue between the early Church and the mother religion was concerning the national prerogatives of Israel. But eventually Christianity became nationalized, for only as such could it come to terms with the State. To-day, we speak of "Christian" nations and non-Christian nations without even suspecting the contradiction. We have become accustomed to speaking in collective terms about a movement which by its very nature concerns only individuals. If there ever were "Christian" nations, the Jewish people never was one. But if amongst the nations of the world there were many Christians, it is our purpose to show, that the same can be said about the Jews.
1. Jesus' popularity.

There is reason to assume that Jesus' ministry extended over a period of three years or thereabouts. The essence of his message was a familiar feature of Jewish piety. He called men to הָווֹשֶׁה. Yet there was an important difference between his message and that of the Prophets. Their "יְיָיָא, usually a future Day of Judgement, was proclaimed by him as a Day of Salvation close at hand. This was also John the Baptist's message. But while John appeared to be retiring and unassuming, keeping himself in the background, Jesus was constantly amongst the people, and his message was strangely related to his own person. He knew himself uniquely connected with the Kingdom he preached. It reveals a good sense for realism on the part of Jewish scholars that they invariably admit the Messianic consciousness of Jesus.

But Jesus of Nazareth was not only a preacher, he was a man of action. He was constantly on the high-road, moving from place to place "healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people". A distinct feature in Jesus' activity was his chief concern with the needy and the outcasts. He knew himself sent to the sick: "אֱלֹהִים שלׁוֹ אֵלָה יִשְׂרָאֵלים אֲשֶׁר יִתְּנֶהָלְךָ וְתֹאֲכֵל בָּהֶם". His vocation was to seek the lost: "יְלַזֶּה גַּרְגַּר אֵלֶּה תָּמוּנֶת תָּמִים וְתֹאֲכֵל בָּהֶם". His main mission was to preach the Gospel to the poor. He ate with publicans and sinners. This naturally made for the popularity of Jesus amongst the simple folk. As time went by, his popularity increased. The Johannine tradition records a genuine fact when we read of the Pharisees saying amongst themselves: "וְזֶה אוֹלְמָה אָפְּיָא אֵלֶּה אֲפַלַּא". Enelow correctly assumes that Jesus' popularity was till the very end of his life on the increase.

2. Jesus' unpopularity.

The fact that Jesus found a large adherence from among the multitudes in whom he saw a flock of scattered and fainting sheep without a shepherd, was one reason for the tension between him and the authorities, though not a decisive one. There was more than mere jealousy which in the end led to his Crucifixion. But his unpopularity with the spiritual and religious leaders of the people is only one side of the picture. He was also unpopular with many in the crowd. The masses of the people were drawn and repelled at the same time. Jewish scholars have repeatedly pointed to the double strain in the character of our Lord. We have seen how Moriz Friedländer tried to explain this disturbing duality by attributing it to the conflicting ideas regarding the Messiah prevalent at that time. We would suggest another explanation. The two sides in the character of Jesus are only an apparent disharmony to the outside observer. The apparent inconsistency is not to be sought in the character of Jesus, but in the nature of his message. A similar case is presented by the Prophet Jeremiah. His message, as it were, runs against his natural disposition. He wants to speak comfort to his people, but it is his prophetic duty to proclaim judgement. Herein lies the deep tragedy of the prophetic vocation. The case with Jesus is similar. His heart goes out to the people. He is moved with compassion at the sight of their need and frustration. He invites them to come, he brings to them the promise of the Kingdom. He says his yoke is easy and his burden light. But this is only one aspect of his message. There is another aspect of stern demand and great sacrifice. The path Jesus is walking is that of self-denial. The way of the disciple is a narrow way (τεθ.) μεμένη ἡ θλίψις; θλίψις = squeeze, press); salvation leads through a "strait gate" (διὰ τῆς στενῆς πύλης). Discipleship entails renunciation to the highest degree: a complete break, not only with wealth, but with all family ties for the sake of a higher purpose. It is interesting to note the context of Luke 15, 26f: Great multitudes went with him and he turned and said unto them: if anyone come to me and hate not his father, and mother and wife and children...yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple*.

He required absolute loyalty and steadfastness: he who puts his hand to the plough and looks back is not fit for the Kingdom of God. Such a message could not have been popular, and it was not. It is not for nothing that the verb ἀνασταλέω so often occurs in the Gospels. Jesus was a two-fold offence to those who came in contact with him: 1) He offended people by the extreme demands of his teaching; 2) he offended by the unique emphasis upon the importance of his own person - "for my sake"! The right to forgive sin, his strange attitude to the law, must have been a constant irritant to his hearers. It was not only the Pharisees who took offence. Whatever the cause of the sudden change may have been, John records historical fact when he says: many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him. Thus, Jesus was popular and unpopular at the same time. His power of personality, his beauty of speech, his lofty teaching, his care for the simple and lowly were an attraction. But only the small group round the Twelve and a few outsiders, men and women, formed the inner circle of discipleship. The rest remained outside; they were only able to hear about the mysteries of the Kingdom of God in parables. Indeed, the words of Matthew 20, 16 express the personal experience of the Master:
Many be called, but few chosen. Only those who had ears were able to hear; the others were offended.

3. The Resurrection—Faith and its effects.

The death of Jesus created a crisis in the small circle of faithful disciples. The movement which centred round the Master's person came to a sudden end. The mood amongst his followers is reflected in the story of the two disciples on the way to Emmaus (Luke 24, 13ff). But such was the intention of Jesus' enemies; they rightly assumed that the shameful death by crucifixion would not only remove a dangerous foe, but would also deliver the final blow to the movement which he started. Yet, it was to be otherwise. Graetz well remarks of Jesus: "He is the only mortal of whom one can say without exaggeration that his death was more effective than his life. Golgotha, the place of skulls, became to the civilised world a new Sinai." How did this come about?

The problem how the crucified Jesus came to be the triumphant and risen Christ, is the most crucial issue in the reconstruction of events. It has occupied many minds and has created a vast literature. The most perplexing fact to scholars is that Christianity is not so much the result of the teaching of Jesus, as of faith in His Resurrection. The Church staked her existence upon that faith; upon it rests its whole structure.

It is universally admitted that faith in the Resurrection of Jesus was not invented by Paul, but was already a peculiarity of the Jerusalem Church prior to the Apostle's conversion. On this "epilogue", as Klausner calls it, hangs the Messiahship of Jesus. How did the disciples come to such a faith? To answer this question is to answer all other questions related to the problem of the birth of the Christian Church. How did Jesus, the preacher of the Kingdom of God, become himself the object of Christian preaching? Or, as Arnold Meyer puts it: “wie ist Jesus, Subjekt und Träger eines Glaubens, zum Gegenstand des Glaubens geworden”? It has been felt that the only man to answer this question was Paul. The customary method was to place the Apostle to the Gentiles between Jesus and the subsequent Church. Steck has pointed out that Paul gradually removed himself from Hebrew-Christian influence until he became its bitter opponent. He traces the line of growing opposition from Romans to Corinthians until it reaches its height in Galatians. Paul’s theology, it was said, springs from a double source—Philonism (Jewish Hellenism) and Stoicism (pagan Hellenism), (so Bauer, Steck and others). These two worlds, it is explained, became in the mind of Paul, a synthetic whole: “nur der konnte den Juden ein Jude werden und den Griechen, ein Grieche, der von beiden etwas in sich trug”.

A similar synthesis has been assumed by Klausner, in his recent book, From Jesus to Paul. But the importance of Klausner’s work lies in the strong emphasis upon the Jewish elements in Pauline thought. Klausner is thus driven back to Harnack’s stand-point, who saw in Paul a true representative of Hebrew-Christianity closely related spiritually to Pharisaism: “Der Pharisaismus hat seine Aufgabe in der Welt erfüllt, als er diesen Phariseer in die Welt gesandt hatte”. Paul’s deeply rooted connections with Judaism have forced Klausner to assume not a direct, conscious assimilation of foreign elements, but an indirect, unconscious appropriation of conceptions from alien sources. Klausner holds that it was inevitable that Paul should be influenced by the ”general atmosphere” which prevailed at that time. But there is one difficulty which Klausner has left unexplained, namely how Paul, the keen thinker, in all his sharp reasoning, failed to notice the precariousness of his position? The accommodating attitude which Paul adopted towards the Gentile world, had its limits for him as for all Jews. The demarcation line was the principle of the absolute unity of God. Did not Paul realize that he was encroaching upon Jewish monotheism when he exalted Jesus Christ his Lord? Some scholars have therefore held that Paul made a definite and conscious departure from Judaism. But Meyer rightly remarks: "Wie der Mann von Tarsus sich auf einmal in einen der freifsten Geister verwandeln konnte, das erklärt uns niemand." This is an important point. There are no signs in the Pauline Epistles of an intentional break with Judaism. Faith in the Messiah, to Paul, did not imply a renunciation of the past, but its fulfilment. There is thus no satisfactory explanation either way: it is difficult to hold with Klausner that Paul yielded to pagan influence to the extent of endangering Monotheism; it is also impossible to accept the radical view which assumes a conscious break with Judaism. The answer to the puzzle lies in the novum which entered the Apostle's consciousness at his conversion: The Resurrection of Jesus. Where did Paul get that knowledge?

The link between Paul and the historical Jesus was formed by the Church in Jerusalem. The importance of the primitive Church in the shaping of Pauline theology is now increasingly recognized. Klausner regards the Jewish Church, even prior to Paul's conversion, as a decisive factor in the development of Christianity, especially singling out the person of Peter. Paul received from the apostolic Church the cardinal tenets that Jesus was the Messiah, that he was crucified, and that He rose from the dead. We are thus led back from Paul to the first disciples. The main question is, how did those witnesses of the crucifixion attain to the resurrection-faith? To this, Prof. Meyer gives the following answer: "Dass das Ärgernis des Kreuzes überwunden wurde, dass die Jünger es vermochten, den Mann der Schmerzen, den sie in Gethsemane zittern und zagen sahen, dennoch für den Messias zu halten, dass sie, Juden, die niemand anbeten mochten als den allein wahren Gott, dennoch den Namen dieses Menschen nach seinem Tode an allen Orten anriefen unverrückt, dass kann man nur erklären dem gewaltigen, das ganze Herz erfassenden Eindruck seiner Persönlichkeit...Das Getragen - und Ergriffensein von diesem Eindruck ist das Urchristentum". But the force of this psychological argument is weakened by the admission that the crucifixion of Jesus was a catastrophe terrible enough to counteract the spell of any personality, no matter how great. There is thus a gap between the experience of the disciples on Good-Friday, and that of Easter-Sunday. It is here that the story of the Resurrection comes into full play.

Klausner, who attaches considerable importance to the faith in the Resurrection of Jesus amongst the disciples, lessens its significance, however, by pointing to the universality of such a belief in those days. But there is an all important difference between the commonly accepted faith in יהוה יהוּדָה which was to take place at some distant time, and the actual resurrection of the Messiah which the disciples believed to have personally experienced. It was this that transformed in the eyes of the early disciples the crucified Jesus into the triumphant Messiah. Not Paul, therefore, but the Jewish believers in Palestine, had already assigned an unique position to their Master which lifted him out of the limitations of mere human existence. "To be sure", says Klausner, "the beginning of the exaltation of Jesus to his high estate ("Saviour of the world", "Lord", etc), was made by the Twelve". All that Paul did was to take these conceptions "from the first disciples and from the primitive Jerusalem community", and develop, broaden and deepen Such an admission by so scrupulous a scholar like Klausner is of greatest importance. It connects Gentile Christianity once again with Jewish Palestine.

The Resurrection of the Crucified Master was the turning point in the fate of the Messianic movement. It became the corner stone upon which the faith in the Messiahship of Jesus was built. Paul's whole theology centres round this fact. It is not the Cross, but the Resurrection which is the starting-point of Pauline thought. It was also the Resurrection which became the κύστις of the primitive church. That Christ was risen from the dead was their εὐαγγέλιον. Hitherto, a fainthearted and shy group of men, they became bold witnesses to their risen Lord. The amazing news of the triumph of the Messiah spread with great rapidity throughout Palestine and found ready acceptance among thousands of Jews. On one particular day, about 3,000 people were added to the ἔκκλησία, at another time, we hear of 5,000 who believed. During the life-time of the Master, the circle of disciples consisted of but a small group, after his Crucifixion, it rose to considerable proportions, to the extent of causing apprehension amongst the leaders of the people.

4. Church and Synagogue: the reason for the breach.

Those who accepted the faith in the crucified and risen Messiah were faithful and pious Jews. Not for one moment did they intend to separate themselves from the rest of the people. They participated in the services of the Temple, and together with the "unbelieving" Jews, worshipped in the Synagogues. They naturally kept the Law of Moses and looked upon the High priestly office-bearer as the highest spiritual authority. Graetz gives a false impression when he says that "the picture of Jesus nailed to the cross, crowned with thorns, the blood streaming from his wounds, was ever present to his followers, filling their hearts with bitter thoughts of revenge. There is nothing in the whole New Testament literature to justify such a view. On the contrary, the impression we receive from Peter's speeches in Acts, and Paul's Epistles, is the earnest striving of the believing Jews to heal the breach which must inevitably follow Israel's rejection of his Messiah. Nevertheless, Weizäcker is justified in assuming a deep-seated antagonism between the believers and the non-believers. Between them stood the person of Jesus. The cross and all that was connected with it drew a dividing line between the two groups.

The essential difference between the believers and non-believers was, that the first saw in Jesus the Messiah in whom all promises were fulfilled, and the others were still waiting for the Messiah. To the outsider, such a difference might have appeared of little consequence, but in actual fact, it was of momentous import. For Messiahship as conceived in those days implied more than Judaism has later conceived. What did it imply?

Klausner's early work, Die Messianischen Vorstellungen des jüdischen Volkes, goes to show that in the Tannaitic period, the Messiah was looked upon as a political hero whose Kingdom was entirely of this world. Klausner remarks on the words: My Kingdom is not of this world - "dieser Spruch ist im Munde des jüdischen Messias undenkbar. Nicht einmal der vergeistigte Messias der 'Ψελμὸν ποιμήν ὅταν' würde ihn geäußert haben." From this study, it would appear that there were almost no features in the Tannaitic period to correspond to the New Testament view of the Messiah, his significance and his work. On the main issue as to the suffering of the Messiah, Klausner emphatically declares: "In der ganzen messianischen Literatur des tannaitischen Zeitalters ist keine Spur vom 'leidenden Messias zu finden". The author, therefore joins issue with scholars like Weber, Dalman, Wünsche, Schürer and Bousset, who purport to find points of contact between the New Testament Messianism and that of early Rabbinic teaching. It may be that Klausner has proved too much, but there is certainly a conspicuous difference of outlook between the early Rabbis and the New Testament. The conclusion, however, that because of this difference, the sources for the New Testament outlook are to be sought outside Judaism, has proved to be fallacious. It was based upon the view that the controversy with Christianity began at a later period and left Judaism unaffected. But this is not so. We have already seen that the struggle between the followers of Jesus and their opponents began at the earliest period. We will have occasion to show that the controversy with Christianity affected Judaism considerably. It forced the Rabbis to change their emphasis and in some instances to alter their views. That the Tannaim are conscious of Christian opposition, Klausner himself admits. The Talmud is therefore a reliable source for the question as to the Messianic views at the time of Jesus Christ. But neither are the Apocalyptic writings an infallible guide. This has been admitted by Bousset and others. The only source is the New Testament itself. There is an all-important difference between Apocalyptic Judaism and the New Testament outlook regarding the Messiah. Bousset emphatically says: "Die Gestalt des Messias gehört nicht zum eisernen Be- stand der eschatologischen Hoffnung Israels und des Judentums". But for the New Testament, the Messiah is fundamental and central. The difference is not to be explained, however, by external influence as Bousset would have it, but by the change of circumstances. It arose from the difference between hope and fulfillment. The followers of Jesus have not only taken over apocalyptic conceptions, but have also adapted them to the events which have taken place, events which have determined their lives and outlook. This consideration forms the starting-point to an understanding of early Jewish-Christian relationship.

Jewish scholars have stressed that the Synagogue admitted a large measure of freedom: "It is a mistake to think", says Eilenberg "that all Jews had the same idea on the subject (i.e. regarding the Messiah). Uniformity was never an intellectual or spiritual characteristic of the Jews". This is certainly true of Judaism, as far as side-issues are concerned. But on questions of principle, the Synagogue knew no toleration. "Difference of opinion was not a sin in the eyes of the Pharisees, unless they were convinced that this difference was contrary to the fundamental principles of the Torah", says Klausner. Bousset has shown that there existed two Messianic conceptions side by side, the politico-national and the apocalyptic eschatological: "Zwischen diesen Polen der Auffassung schwankt die jüdische messianische Erwartung, so dass fast nirgends das eine oder andre Messiasbild ganz rein heraustritt". Both views were based upon Jewish tradition and were to some degree harmonisad with one another. Bousset's contention is that, owing to the tragic death of the Messiah, the apocalyptic view was given the preeminence: "Der Messiasgläube der Urgemeinde konnte sich nach dem Tode Jesu in gar keiner anderen Form gestalten als in der des transzendenten Messiasideals". However, 'even this emphasis upon the transcendent Son of Man was still within the purview of Jewish thought and could not have been the deciding factor in the schism. It has been maintained that Hebrew Christianity in its earliest form was a tolerated sect and only its extreme Hellenistic branch as represented by Stephen was liable to persecution: "To Stephen and his party, Jerusalem is hostile; as soon as they come into public view, their leader is killed and his friends dispersed.
At the other end is James the Just, the Brother of the Lord...No popular outbreak against the Nazarenes seems to touch him...Between these extremes comes Peter: he had been unaffected by the persecution of Stephen, but later on he is singled out, because the would-be orthodox King Herod thinks he will be a popular victim". But Prof. Burkitt is well aware of the fact that it was not only Stephen, but also James who died the death of a martyr. What occasion could there have been for a man of his integrity to give offence to the priestly hierarchy? Eisler's fantastic hypothesis that James was set up as a rival to the High-priest by an extreme nationalist party cannot be taken seriously. It flatly contradicts the whole spirit and tradition of the Messianic movement. Prof. Burkitt makes an interesting suggestion which, when substantiated, may well lead to a satisfactory answer. "I venture to suggest", says Prof. Burkitt, "that the abstinence of St. James was not exclusively directed to the mortification of the flesh. He may indeed have been a Nazarite from the beginning, like Samson of old, as Hegesippus implies, but he does not say that he was a vegetarian from the beginning". Burkitt means to say that James's strict ascetism was due to an effort to avoid a difficult situation. This was the only way left to a non-Pauline Christian. Indeed, there seems to have been an inevitable conflict between faith that the Messiah has come on the one hand, and the demands of the Law on the other. It is of great significance that Prof. Klausner admits that the abrogation of the Law was in one way or another connected with the Days of the Messiah. It may well be that Rab. Joseph's remark in Niddah 61b, "The ceremonial laws shall be abrogated in the world to come", where אַלּוּ הַכּוֹנָה is given the meaning of the world (or time) after death, is a re-interpretation of an earlier view. This may be borne out by the fact that in earlier times, the words אָוֹן הָעֵבֶר and מַעַת הַמַעַשָּׁה were not so sharply differentiated as they were by the Rabbis in a later period. Strack-Billerbeck carefully explain that the גוֹלָה מַהְשָׁם which, in the view of the Rabbis, was connected with the coming of the Messiah must not be understood in the sense that "diese neue Torah die alte Torah Moses verdrängen oder durch Zusätze erweitern sollte". But they admit that though the new Torah, the תּוֹרָה שֶׁל יְשׁוֹעַ, is still the old Torah of Moses, it was expected to receive a new and deeper interpretation. They also cite instances, which seem to go beyond their own words. It would appear that in at least a few cases, the Rabbis expected an abrogation or alteration of some Mosaic laws. It ought to be borne in mind, that the early Christian attitude to the Law was not much different. The "Old" and the "New" Law, the Law of Moses and the Law of the Messiah were essentially the same. Even Paul's famous τέλος Ἰάκωβος νόμον Χριστός (Rom. 10, 4) does not necessarily imply the "end" of the Law, but its completion.

It is only natural to assume that the same conflict which the Master had to face regarding the Law and its validity was inherited by his disciples. Under immediate suspicion were, of course, the Hellenistic Jews, this explains why Stephen was the first victim. But as time went on, it became clear to the Jewish leaders that even men like Peter and James were blameworthy as far as the Law was concerned. Wagenmann's view, therefore, that the first disciples remained absolutely loyal to the Law, and only their claim to be the true Israelites created the rift with the rest of the community, must be rejected. Only a fundamental issue, such as the validity of the Law, could have created the schism. If Jacob of Kefar Sekanya, of whom we read in the Talmud, may be identified with James the Brother of our Lord, a possibility which Klausner does not exclude, then it would appear that his orthodoxy was, to say the least, questionable. Grundmann's arguments, which are based on the assumption of a sharp discord between the Hellenistic party, centring round Stephen, whom he associates with Peter, and the Judaizing party in Jerusalem, have no real foundation. There was, perhaps, a greater outspokenness on the part of Stephen, but no fundamental difference of view between him and the rest of the disciples. The theory that only Stephen understood the meaning of the message which Jesus preached, has no support from the evidence we possess. If, as Prof. Grundmann thinks, Jesus' message was directed against the Temple and the sacrifices, it is difficult to see why only the Hellenistic and Galilean Jews should have understood its significance. The artificial distinction he draws between Galilee and Judea cannot be proved, but by the racial theory of Nationalist Germany.

We may, therefore, with good reason, assume a general agreement on fundamental issues, and an early discord with Judaism. The main problem was the question of the Law. The question at issue was not the validity or sanctity of the Law, nobody had any doubts about that. The problem was, whether the Messianic Age, the נוֹמַן הָיוֹם inaugurated by Jesus of Nazareth, can be brought into harmony with the institutions which were hitherto binding. The maintaining of both was a logical contradiction, as they virtually excluded each other: either the Messiah has come and fulfilled the Law, or the Law is still pointing towards him, in which case the but then, Messiah has not yet come.
5. The Schism.

It must be conceded that the views concerning the deeper implications connected with the were not universally accepted. Indeed, there was no uniformity of outlook concerning the person and function of the Messiah. On this subject, Rabbinic statements are confused and contradictory; they were so probably not only after, but also before the Destruction. The question which immediately arises is: What were the unifying factors which made for an early Hebrew Christian view?

Naturally, a unified Christology came only slowly into existence. There is a measure of truth in Köhler's presentation that the "early Church distinguished itself little from the Synagogue. Its members, who are called Judaeo-Christians, continued to observe the Jewish law, and changed their attitude to it only gradually". Not only were ideas still in the melting-pot, but an adequate terminology was lacking. Prof. Burkitt says rightly that the disciples "were not at once provided...with an appropriate nomenclature for their mysterious Master". But whatever other influences moulded the specific Christian outlook regarding the Messiah, two factors were of fundamental importance: the teaching of Jesus and the teaching of the Old Testament Prophets. It is surprising how little attention scholars have paid to these two powerful influences in the formation of a specific Christology in the early Church. We venture to say that the influence of the Old Testament upon the Messianic movement by far outweighs all other considerations. It is a striking fact that while the Pharisees and the Rabbis stand nearer to the Law, Jesus and his early followers, stand closer to the Prophets. There is no evidence to prove a definite connection between the Essenes and the Messianic movement (against Graetz, Kohler and others), but there is enough internal and external evidence to show an affinity between early Christianity and the Prophetic outlook.

It is an established fact that the Old Testament presents a double strain: the prophetic and the priestly view. These two tendencies often contradict and sometimes oppose each other. nowhere is this more evident than in the case of the sacrifices. While in the priestly opinion, the sacrifices and the Temple cult are the highest form of service, the prophets, with strange unanimity, make light of such a view. Prof. Volz, whose judgement may well be trusted says: "Von Amos bis Jeremias tritt ein Prophet nach dem anderen als Gegner des öffentlichen Gottesdienstes auf; 'Gehorsam ist besser denn Opfer', 'Jahwe will sittliches Leben, nicht Tempelkult und Opfer', erklären sie 1 Sam.15,22; Am.5,21ff; Hos.6,6; Jes.1,11ff; Mi.6,6-8. Sie wollen also nicht gereinigten Kult, sondern anderes als Kultus. Auch sagen die Propheten deutlich, dass sie damit nichts Neues bringen, vielmehr nur die seit Jahrhunderten verschüttete Quelle Moses wieder aufdecken wollen. Sie haben recht; das Prinzip der alttestamentlichen Religion ist die sittliche Verehrung des geistlichen Gottes..." It is difficult to believe that this far-reaching tendency, which Volz calls the "Wendepunkt in der religiösen Geschichte", should have disappeared from the spiritual horizon, especially after the Prophetic message had, through the Canon, entered the Jewish consciousness. The הָדַע and the פִּיצָן of Is.57,15 like the anawim of the post-exilic period, are singularly close to the circles from which Jesus and his followers came and to those to whom the Master's message was directed.

In some respects, Pharisaism was also a reaction against the supremacy of the priesthood. Bousset has called attention to this fact. He says: "Diese Frömmigkeit des Tempels und des Kultes ist im Zeitalter des Spätjudentums allmählich von einer zwar der Art nach verwandten, aber doch in ihrer ganzen Struktur wesentlich verschiedenem Frömmigkeit abgelöst: von der eigent-
l ich gesetzlichen Frömmigkeit oder der Frommigkeit der Observanz, die schon vorher zumeist als Unterströmung vorhanden, nun in der Folgezeit an die Oberfläche drängt. He points out that on the surface, it may appear that the Temple-cult was still at the time of Jesus of extraordinary importance, but in reality, this was not so. There was an ever growing independence on the part of the lay-people from the priestly form of worship. But there was a profound difference between the Prophetic view, with its characteristic insistence upon the deeper motives of the Law, and the Pharisaic submission to its letter.

In the Tannaitic period, when the splendour of the Temple was associated with national independence, the restoration of the Temple-service was paramount to the restoration of Israel. The Messianic Age, therefore, does not, according to the Rabbis, dispense with the Temple cult. But this is obviously not the view of the New Testament. The best evidence we have is the Epistle to the Hebrews. Prof. Burkitt shows remarkable insight when he says: "I do not suppose that the idea of 'Christ our Passover was exclusively Pauline". It certainly was not. The prophetic leaven has slowly worked its way into the religious consciousness. Since the days of the Prophets, there was latent the tendency to disclaim the absolute efficacy of the Temple-cult. The Messiah, who was to fulfil the deepest hopes, was associated with the pure and the spiritual worship of God, which would supersede the crude Temple sacrifices. The ὄλνος πνεύματος built of living stones for a holy priesthood offering spiritual sacrifices, is the finest fruit of Prophetic teaching.
But the other more immediate influence is of equal importance. Bousset, after hinting at the characteristic feature of Jesus' message which was directed against the outward show of piety, observes: "Gegen Übertreibungen und übermäßige Wertschätzung des Opferkults hat er verhältnismässig selten polemisiert". But though references to the Temple are scarce, they are not entirely absent.

It is first to be noted that Jesus was deeply concerned with the purity of the Temple. It is to him the House of God. The record of the cleansing of the Temple is not only contained in all the Synoptic accounts, but also in John. It surely belongs to genuine Christian tradition. The story about the cleansed leper, recorded by all the Synoptics, with curious unanimity, ends with the advice that he go and show himself to the priest and offer the gift which Moses commanded. In this case, a conclusion as to Jesus' attitude is made difficult by the addition: εἰς μαρτυρίαν αὐτῶν, which suggests that the object of the thankoffering is the reinstatement to community life. A more positive attitude, however, we find in the Matthaean tradition, which, though unsupported by the other Synoptics, is nevertheless genuine, as it only reiterates a view already expressed in connection with the cleansing of the Temple. Matthew 23, 21, we read: καὶ δὲ ὁμόθανος ἐν τῷ ναῷ ὢμενεὶ ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ ἐν τῷ κατοικίαν αὐτῶν. But even in this, no definite conclusions can be made. In the related passage in the Sermon on the Mount, the same sanctity is ascribed to the whole of Jerusalem: ὁτι πόλις ὑπὸ τοῦ Ἰσραήλ ἐστιν (Matthew 5, 35). On the negative side the evidence is much more conclusive. First, there stands the great word of the Prophet: וַהֲיֵּה נֵס צוה (Hos. 6, 6), which occurs twice in the Matthaean tradition; (Mt. 9, 12; 12, 7), though the verse is not quoted by the other Synoptics." In Matthew 5,24, we are told that reconciliation with the brother goes before the offering of a sacrifice, but it is also added: καὶ τῷ ἔλθων πρόσφερε τῷ Δωρῷ Κου. An interesting passage is Matthew 12,6: λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν ὅτι τοῦ ἑσόν μείζον ἐστὶν ἢ τοῦ. Some MSS read instead of μείζον, μείζων. This verse again is peculiar to Matthew. A remarkable passage is Mark 12,32f, where, not Jesus, but a Scribe approvingly remarks that love towards God and one's neighbour: περιβολής ἑσόν ἐστιν πάντων τῶν διοικητῶν καὶ τῶν θυσίαν. Small wonder that the Master told him, he was not far from the Kingdom of God. Both, the Scribe's remark and Jesus' answer are an eloquent example how the Law was understood in certain circles. Our main evidence, however, comes from the accusation which was made against Jesus. It may seem odd that we should accept the witness of people who are described by the evangelist as ψευδομαθησία, but there is a strange persistence in Christian tradition which lends to their testimony the mark of authenticity. They were "false witnesses", not because of what they said, but of how they said it, and their intention in saying it. An echo of the accusation is contained in John 2,15: "Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up". It is quite in keeping with the behaviour of false witnesses that Matthew and Mark substantially differ in the wording of the accusation. While in Matthew 26,61, they give witness that Jesus said: "I am able to destroy the temple of God and build it in three days"; in Mark 14,58, they say: "We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days will I build another made without hands". Strangely enough, later in the crucifixion-story, when the passers-by mock at Jesus, Matthew and Mark almost verbally agree: "Thou that destroyest the Temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself!' (Mt. 27,40; Mk. 15,29). It is of singular interest that the accusation against Stephen is similar. Stephen is accused of uttering: σήματα βλασφημα eis Mωϋ-γήν και τον θεόν (Acts 6,11). These words of blasphemy against Moses and God, are presented by the "false witnesses" as blasphemous words "against the holy place and the law", (v.13). Stephen is credited with having said: "This Jesus the Nazarene will destroy this place and change the institutions which Moses gave us". That the accusation was not entirely devoid of truth, is best borne out by the speech which follows. Whatever authenticity we ascribe to it, it is a fine example of early Christian apologia. The veiled attack upon the whole sacrificial system by quoting Amos 5,25b (LXX; cp. Acts 7,42) and the remark following the mention of Solomon's temple: "However the most High dwelleth not in hand-made (temples)" (Acts 7,48), sufficiently substantiate the accusation made against the first martyr of the Church. Prof. Burkitt has drawn attention to an interesting point. According to Ebionite tradition, Jesus is supposed to have said: "I came to destroy the sacrifices". To this Burkitt remarks: "this may be taken as unexceptionable evidence that some, at least, of the Jewish Christian schools of thought had a difficulty in combining the old sacrificial worship with their new belief that Jesus was the chosen of God". This, of course, evokes the problem, as to the interpretation by the early disciples of the death of the Messiah. That an adequate interpretation of the crucifixion was an absolute necessity, is obvious, if we are to assume that Christian preaching began soon afterwards. How did the first believers explain the death of their Master? Von Weizsäcker, whose judgement is still to be counted with, says: "There was on the whole no difference of opinion between Paul and his predecessors as to the meaning of Christ’s death.

We know, and not only from 1 Cor. XV, 3, that he traced his doctrine that Christ died for our sins to the tradition that had been handed down to him. But it is also evident that it was his most important line of proof, when he desired to rest his argument on a proposition contested by no one, and accepted even by his opponents. Paul’s statement concerning the death of Christ, Rom. 3, 25, was undisputed; it was only his inference from it that served to refute his opponents... The preaching of the Cross was everywhere recognised as the preaching of the Gospel (1 Cor. 1, 18). It is obvious that the tradition to which Paul appeals does not simply go back to that of Antioch, but to Jerusalem itself. "For the Jewish Christians", says Weizsäcker, "the suffering Messiah formed the transition to the crucified". The witness to the Messiahship of Jesus was only possible if his death was given a religious meaning, if it was explained as part of the scheme of salvation. This was not entirely alien to Jewish thought. To quote Weizsäcker once more: "So far as our knowledge of the contemporary Jews goes, even they were not all indisposed to the belief that the Messiah should pass through sufferings, although it met with opposition on the part of a section of them". It is, nevertheless, remarkable how little evidence there is from Rabbinic sources to show any such belief in the period under discussion. The isolated references to a suffering Messiah seem to belong to a later date. Strack-Billerbeck, however, remark: "Die Ablehnung eines leidenden Messias hat etwas Auf­fallendes, wenn man die hohe Bedeutung erwägt, die die alte Synagoge gerade den Leiden beigelegt hat". It may well be that this extraordinary silence concerning a view which, as it would appear from the New Testament is almost taken for granted, is a result of the feud which arose between the disciples of Jesus and the Synagogue. We may therefore assume that there were two opposing views concerning the Messiah: a popular view, which has survived to this time in certain quarters, and which makes the Messiah a national hero, whose main mission is the aggrandizement of Israel. Along with this, there was another view, shared only by a small group and closely akin to the prophetic idea concerning the "נְדוּי הָלָה". Between the two stood the Jewish apocalyptic, offering a synthesis of the two conceptions. Its main influence, however, was confined to Hellenistic Judaism; it only affected the prophetic group to a limited extent and was therefore unable to bridge the cleavage. We are thus driven to the conclusion that there existed in Palestine, to use Prof. Burkitt's phrase, "two Judaisms": a Pharisaic and a Prophetic Judaism. The latter was to some extent related to the Hellenistic Synagogue, in many important features differing from both. The prophetic outlook has been deposited in books, like the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistle of James, and the Didache. A unique example is the Matthaean Gospel, which Moore describes as "the most conservatively Jewish of the Gospels, and the most violently anti-Pharisaic". The Gospel was evidently edited at a time when one could still be both.

The process of separation began immediately after the death of Jesus, and was necessitated by an inner logic which made a compromise impossible; between the two diametrically opposed groups stood the crucified Messiah. The inevitable persecution which thus arose, hastened the process. The main issue turned round the Sacrifices. If Jesus was the Messiah, then his death was of a propitiatory nature, and the sacrifices became superfluous; but if the sacrifices were still obligatory, then Jesus' death was of no efficacy, and thus he was not the Messiah. But because in the view of his followers, Jesus was the Messiah, the implications were such as made their religious existence within Judaism impossible. Had the Messianic movement fallen immediately after the Destruction, the whole situation would have been different. But as it was, a breach became inevitable. The persecution against the Church, which made an early appearance, revealed more than mere fanaticism; behind it were concentrated the forces which are born out of the tension when the Old and the New meet. History has its own logic and goes its own ways. The parting of the road became a historical necessity. Its significance lies in the fact that it began in Jerusalem and before the Destruction of the Temple. Joël is thus essentially right when he says: "Die Entfremdung hatte zunächst nicht dogmatische Differenzen im engeren Sinne als Ursache, sondern den Streit um die Verbindlichkeit oder Nichtverbindlichkeit des Gesetzes nach Erscheinen des Messias".

6. The growth of Hebrew Christianity.

We have said that the separation between the Synagogue and the Church took place in Jerusalem and before the Destruction of the Temple. But such a statement needs certain reservations. In the first instance, there was no consciously planned act on the part of the disciples which made a schism inevitable. On the contrary; the Jewish believers in the Messiah Jesus, tried for many years to maintain their position in Judaism. We have seen that this is the only explanation for the introduction of the Birkat ha-Minim before the end of the first century. Then, the small group of Jewish Christians regarded itself not only as an integral part of the people, but also the rightful heir to Israel's heritage. They were fighting their way from the beginning to the heart and the conscience of their brethren. They efforts were not without success. Their enthusiasm, their sincerity and their mode of life was a great attraction. Several factors must have worked for the success of the Messianic preaching. First, the political unrest of those days will have created a receptivity for new spiritual values, as is usually the case. Secondly, Messianic preaching had always political associations to the Jewish mind. As in the case of Jesus, at an earlier time, there will have been many who joined the new movement under a misapprehension; some were disillusioned and left, others remained. Thirdly, there was the prestige and the influence of Jesus himself. The memory of this winning personality was still fresh in many minds. Many who drifted away after the tragic Friday, began slowly to return. Faith in the risen Messiah overshadowed the fact of his Crucifixion. One more point may be added. The early Christian community consisted mostly of simple folk, peasants and fishermen. Following the example of their Master, the disciples would have paid special attention to the poor and the lowly. Their simple message was for the humble and the oppressed. Acts records the conversion of Pharisees and even of priests, but they were naturally in a minority. The good news found its way easiest to the hearts of those who were hungering and thirsting for righteousness. Thus, the most stable and tenacious elements among the people were won for the Messiah.

Owing to the hostility which the movement met, it was driven from the beginning to assume a defensive character, and a measure of independence. The formation of separate Synagogues seems to have been a feature of Jewish life in Jerusalem. Soon there was added a new Synagogue, that of the Nazarenes. Its existence will have scarcely created any sensation, though it was destined to become the nucleus of a world-wide Church. Its separate existence was not due to Peter, "the fickle one", as Klausner contemptuously calls the Apostle, but to the difficult situation in which the disciples found themselves. The fact that James the Just became the head of the community is usually interpreted as a sign of its orthodoxy, but this rests upon a misunderstanding as to the nature of James's position. Klausner naturally vouches for James's orthodoxy, who, though recognizing Jesus as the Messiah, did not regard him as the Son of God. But Klausner's position reveals an inconsistency. If James really was the strictly observing Jew, he makes him out to be, how could he have had a hand in a decree which, in Klausner's own words "yielded to the Gentiles on most of the ceremonial requirements, but not on all; and to Jews who had become believers in Jesus, it yielded nothing"? James's popularity, however, may be due to other reasons; it may simply be an indication of the esteem the Messianic movement enjoyed among the people. If Klausner's suggestion as to the meaning of the name which, according to Hegesippus, was given to James, holds good, then it would go some way to prove our point. If ωτήσις means Father of the People, then his popularity may as much be due to his position in the Messianic community as to his own personal integrity. That his esteem did not reach the upper classes is proved by his death. James was the Father of the People because the Messianic movement was essentially a movement of the People. This would to a large extent explain the ever-growing hostility on the part of the Jewish authorities.

It may well be that the martyrdom of James the Just and the flight of the Hebrew Christian community to Pella in Perea, east of the Jordan, are logically connected. According to Eusebius, this took place in obedience to a "certain oracle that was vouchsafed by way of revelation to approved men there". Epiphanius, who mentions Pella on several occasions, has nothing to say beyond the bare fact "cum Pellae discipuli omnes habitarent, a Christo de relinquenda Hierosolymorum urbe migrandoque praemoniti, quod ejus immineret obsidio". Lawlor and Oulton think that both Epiphanius and Eusebius have drawn upon a common source, probably the Memoirs of Hegesippus. But the fact itself cannot be easily called in question. It rests upon authentic Christian tradition. The motives which lay behind such a step are difficult to ascertain, and to some extent depend upon the date when the exodus took place. From Eusebius' account, it would appear that it took place before the beginning of the war. The war against Rome began in the year 66 A.D., following the disturbances in Jerusalem under Florus. The Martyrdom of James, if we credit Josephus' account, falls in the year 62 A.D. The migration to Pella must, therefore, have taken place between 62-66. But the reasons for such a desperate step at such an early date are entirely lacking. Weizsäcker rightly conjectures that the Christian community would have not lightheartedly abandoned the city, unless absolutely compelled by circumstances. Such a situation, Weizsäcker holds, arose in 67 A.D., after the Jewish victory over Cestius, when nationalist sentiments set in, showing intolerance to those of more moderate views. Harnack assumes an even later date. He says: "Im Anfang der ersten Belagerung Jerusalems verließ die Christen die Stadt", i.e., in the year 68 A.D. But it is difficult to see how the Christians were allowed to leave the city once the siege had started. Even Weizsäcker's date raises difficulties. For Perea itself was at that time a war-threatened country. Again, there is no evidence for the theory that the primitive Church was in any way politically committed, unless we accept Eisler's point of view. But then, it is difficult to see why a nationalist movement of Eisler's description would be forced to quit Jerusalem. But Schürer does not exclude the possibility of an earlier departure. We would venture to suggest that it took place not long after the martyrdom of James. The reason for such a step was probably an outbreak of persecution which did not stop with the death of James, but affected the whole community. The migration to a foreign country was not a voluntary act, for Jerusalem occupied too important a place in Jewish-Christian thought. Jewish Christians left the city when life became impossible there; it was entirely a measure of self-protection.

The persecution was instigated by the authorities. Its aim was to deprive the community of its venerable leader and to scatter its members. This is actually borne out by the evidence we find in Eusebius. There seems to be more than a literary connection between the death of James, the banishment of the Apostles from the land of Judaea, and the migration of the church to Pella. If our conjectures are right, the flight to Pella would, therefore, be another sign of the early success of Christianity upon Judaean soil. Persecution is usually an indication of success on the part of those persecuted.

The departure of the more prominent members of the Christian community, the rapid deterioration of the political situation in Palestine, and the terrible struggle which followed, brought the Messianic movement to a temporary standstill. The situation changed, however, after the Fall of Jerusalem.

The year 70 A.D. marks a turning-point, not only in the history of Judaism, but also of Christianity. The military defeat which ended in the Destruction of the Temple, affected the young Jewish Church in several ways:

1) The fact that the war against Rome took place without Christian participation widened the breach between the nationalistically minded Jews and the believers in Jesus Christ.

2) The Destruction of the Temple tipped the scales in favor of the antinomian elements of Jewish Christianity and it also solved the perplexing problem concerning Christian participation in the Temple cult.

3) It detached the Jewish Church from Jerusalem as a religious centre, and thus allowed a greater measure of freedom and independance.

4) It provided the Messianic movement with a new and powerful weapon for propaganda purposes. It is on this last point that we will now concentrate our attention.

Soon after the Destruction of the Temple, we find evidence of an increase in Jewish-Christian influence. There are two outstanding facts which point in this direction: 1) the introduction of the Birkat ha-Minim; 2) the new frequent disputes between the Minim, in most cases, Jewish Christians, and the leading rabbis. The first point we have elaborated in another place. In support of the second point, we should like to quote the unquestionable authority of George Foot Moore. Prof. Moore says: "The vehemence with which the leading rabbis of the first generation of the second century express their hostility to the gospel, and other books of the heretics, and to their conventicles is the best evidence that they were growing in numbers and influence: some even among the teachers of the Law were suspected of leaning toward the new doctrine". This lends support to the view that Hebrew-Christianity experienced a sudden revival after the Destruction and that its influence made itself felt to an extent as to alarm the Jewish authorities. What was the cause of its sudden rise? This question evokes a four-fold answer.

1) The Destruction of the Temple was naturally interpreted by the Church as an act of judgement. It was looked upon as a punishment for the rejection of the Messiah. Thus, Justin says to Trypho: "even when your city is captured and your land ravaged, you do not repent..." The δίκος ἔγγος which undoubtedly refers to the Destruction of the Temple is already in the oldest Christian tradition connected with the rejection of the Messiah.

That the Destruction was an important point in the polemic between the Church and the Synagogue may be supported from Talmudic evidence. In Jr. Sab. 119b and Yoma 9b, an effort is made to provide an answer for the cause of the Destruction. In the first passage, eight reasons are enumerated which have brought about the calamity: in the second passage, three main sins are mentioned: idolatry, fornication and the shedding of blood.

Schoeps accepts Marmorstein’s view that the Rabbis thus intended to contradict the Christian contention which made the Destruction a punishment for the rejection of Jesus.

2) The death of Jesus, after the Destruction of the Temple, appeared in a new light. The whole Epistle to the Hebrews is built up upon the thought, that the Temple-sacrifices were only an adumbratio or a praefiguratio of the perfect sacrifice of the perfect Highpriest. Whatever date we assign to the Epistle, there can be little doubt that it was composed before the end of the first century. Even if we accept von Soden’s view that the recipients of Hebrews were Gentile Christians in Italy, the writer himself must have definitely been a Jew, even though an Alexandrian Jew.

Strangely enough, though Justin, in his Dialogue, in several instances closely approximates the point of view of the Epistle to the Hebrews, he never refers to it. But what Harnack says about Paul may be easily applied to Hebrews also. Justin did not know the New Testament in our present composition. All he knew were some apostolic traditions ("Errinnerungen der Apostel") and some apocalyptic fragments.
Justin's argument concerning the passover lamb, is typical of the Christian point of view: "God does not permit the lamb of the passover to be sacrificed in any other place than where His name was named; knowing that the days will come, after the suffering of Christ, when even the place in Jerusalem shall be given over to your enemies, and all the offerings, in short, shall cease; and that lamb which was commanded to be wholly roasted was a symbol of the suffering of the cross which Christ would undergo". The same point of view we meet in the Agnus Dei motif, and in the allusion to the spiritual worship of God in the Johannine Gospel. Paul's reference to Christ as our passover sacrificed for us (1 Cor. 5, 7) was probably a well known thought in Hebrew Christian circles as its associations with the Lord's Supper and the paschal meal were only too obvious. But the whole force of the argument could only be made use of once the Temple was destroyed. Evidence that Messiah's sacrifice was acceptable in the sight of God and that all other sacrifices became unnecessary was seen in the fact that God allowed the Destruction. This is the meaning of the synoptic reference to the rent veil of the Temple.

3) The prophetic utterances of Jesus concerning the Temple: Mark 13, 1f records an utterance of Jesus which occurs in the other Synoptics, but which has every mark of authenticity. As Jesus was leaving the Temple in the company of his disciples, one of them draws the Master's attention to the magnificence of the building (σωματικόν τῶν ναῶν Ἱερουσαλήμ) to which Jesus replies: οὐκ ἔχεις ἱππος ἐπὶ λίθον, ὅσον ζωήν παραλύησαι. Klostermann comments upon this apocalyptic word of Jesus: "Das braucht um so weniger ein vaticinium ex eventu zu sein, als ein Ähnliches durch 14, 58 usw. verbürgt ist". He draws attention to similar prophetic utterances, like Mi.3,12; Jer.33,6,18; and the prophecy of Jesus the son of Amanos in Jos. Bell. VI,53. Such an oracle belonged to the prophetic function of the Messiah and was in keeping with accredited tradition.\(^{137}\) Strangely enough, both Josephus and the Talmud know of similar premonitions attended by miraculous signs.\(^{138}\) But whatever authenticity we are prepared to ascribe to Mark 13,1f, it undoubtedly belongs to the oldest Christian tradition and served as an important proof of the Messiahship of Jesus.

4) The psychological effect of the Destruction was an important factor in the reaction to the Gospel preaching. The burden of the Messianic message was an invitation to those who were fainting with weariness and were heavily burdened (οὶ κοπιῶντες καὶ πέφοβτομένοι Mk.11,28). Jesus himself had a special word of comfort for those who mourn (Mt. 5,4; Lk.4,16-20). For a people which has been bereaved of all its national hopes; which has been left like sheep without a shepherd, humiliated by a bitter and ruthless enemy, the message of the love of God, the hope for the heavenly Jerusalem, and the triumph over death through the risen Messiah, was indeed, εὐαγγελίον in the deepest sense of the word. It offered spiritual consolation at a time of great national defeat.\(^{139}\) This psychological moment helped to create an unique situation never paralleled in the history of Judaism. The period between the Destruction of Jerusalem and the war under Hadrian saw the rise of an indigenous Jewish Christianity which, if not similar, was yet closely related to the Christianity of the Gentile Church.

If the list of Jewish bishops as enumerated by Eusebius is genuine, the 13 "bishops" or elders who are interposed between the years 107-135 A.D. would go to show how widely spread were the Jewish communities in Palestine. This may be another proof of the existence of a large number of Jewish Christians all over
7. Judaic Christianity and Judaistic Christianity.

Prof. Harnack, who with his usual thoroughness, has subjected Justin's Dialogue to close examination, has recognized the great importance of this document for our knowledge of Hebrew Christianity in the middle of the second century. Justin reveals a remarkable knowledge of the Jewish arguments against Christianity, and the Jewish-Christian position; Harnack, therefore, rightly stresses the fact that Justin's home was Samaria. He knew of Jewish Christianity from his own personal experience. At that time, says Harnack, "erscheint das Judenchristentum noch nicht als Rudiment und geschichtliche Curiosität, sondern steht noch vor Justins Augen als ein lebendiger und verbindender Faktor zwischen den beiden Parteien des Judentums und der grossen Kirche".

Justin, addressing himself to Trypho, comments on the wickedness of the Jews, which is the cause of God's withholding from them "The ability to discern the wisdom of his Scriptures; yet (therefore) some exceptions, to whom, according to the grace of His long-suffering, as Isaiah said, He has left a seed for salvation, lest your race be utterly destroyed like Sodom and Gomorrah" (ch. 55). At another place, Justin explains that God spares the Jews now, as he spared them in the days of Elijah, because of the seven thousand who have not bowed their knees to Baal; and he continues: "even so He has now neither yet inflicted judgment, nor does inflict it, knowing that daily some (of you) are becoming disciples in the name of Christ and quitting the path of error", (ch. 39).

To Trypho's inquiry as to Justin's attitude to those Jews who both believe in Jesus and keep the Law, (ch. 46), he receives the following answer: "In my opinion, Trypho, such an one will..." be saved, if he does not strive in every way to persuade other men, I mean those Gentiles who have been circumcised from error by Christ, to observe the same things as himself, telling them that they will not be saved unless they do so..." Justin explains that this is his private opinion; there are, however, Christians who think otherwise and who would not "venture to have any intercourse with or extend hospitality to such persons, but I do not agree with them". But Justin's tolerance has a definite limit. He disapproves of those Jews, who though believing in Jesus Christ, compel Gentiles who are also believers "to live in all respects according to the law given by Moses"; but even those thus persuaded to practice the Law "shall probably be saved" (ch.47).

What were the christological views of the Hebrew Christians Justin is referring to? On this, unfortunately, we have no clear statement, but only one or two hints. Thus, Justin, addressing himself to Trypho and his companions, remarks: "there are some, my friends of your race, who admit that He is Christ, while holding Him to be Man of men, with whom I do not agree..." (ch.48). Harnack asks the important question: "Dachten alle Judenchristen so?" He holds that a definite answer is not possible, but is inclined to assume that such was Hebrew-Christian opinion. However, it seems to us that Harnack's exegesis is somewhat biased. There is no need to press Justin's words too much. Harnack's conclusion is based upon a very fine distinction as to the literal meaning of Justin's words: "Justin sagt nicht 'Einige aus den Judenchristen', sondern 'Einige aus den Juden', es können also alle Judenchristen dieser Meinung gewesen sein". But apart from the fact that there is some doubt as to the reading "our race" or "your race", such a view does not tally with Justin's former statement. It is difficult to imagine that he would acknowledge as brothers those who not only keep the law, but also deny the divinity of the Messiah. Harnack himself has felt the difficulty, for in a note, he cautiously adds: "Es scheint mir sehr beachtenswert, dass Justin hier nicht schärfer wird, aber zuviel darf man daraus nicht schliessen..." If, however, Justin associated himself with the Hebrew Christians by calling them "some of our race", then Harnack's definition of Hebrew Christianity as Justin understood it needs correcting.

Harnack puts the question: who is a Hebrew Christian according to Justin? He answers: "Ein Judenchrist ist nur der Jude, der an Christus glaubt und das Gesetz beobachtet. Beobachtet er das Gesetz nicht, so ist er so wenig mehr ein Judenchrist, wie ein vom Gesetz sich emancipierender Jude noch ein Jude ist". In a footnote, Harnack adds: "Umgekehrt ist ein beschnittener Heide, der das Gesetz beobachtet, ein Vollblut Jude". But a Jew who both keeps the Law and denies the divinity of Christ, would hardly be reckoned by Justin as a member of the Church. If Justin's reference, however, was to some of Trypho's race, then, according to Harnack's definition, he is simply referring to Jews who are outside the Church, but hold Jesus to be the Messiah in a strictly heretical sense. But to such Justin is opposed.

The result of Harnack's inquiry into the Hebrew Christian position and its relationship to Gentile Christians as it appears from Justin's Dialogue, can be seen from the following list:

1) There are Jewish Christians who insist that Gentile Christians keep the Law, and who refuse communion with those who do not. These Justin refuses to regard as brothers in Christ.

2) There are Jewish Christians who keep the Law, but do not insist that Gentile Christians do likewise. Justin regards them as brothers, though other Christians do not share his opinion.
3) There are Gentile Christians who have been misled by Jewish Christians to keep the Law, but do not refuse communion with other Gentile Christians who do not keep the Law. Justin thinks that such may be saved.

4) There are Gentile Christians who, under adverse circumstances, had to deny Christ, but tried to save themselves by adherence to Judaism, in order to remain faithful to the true God. Such must return before death, otherwise they are lost.

5) There are Jews who do not regard it as essential to join the Christian Church, on the grounds that the Church admits that faithful Jews, before the coming of Christ will be saved. Justin holds that such will perish, though those who lived before Christ will be saved.

In our opinion, it is to this last group that Justin is referring in Ch. 48. They were of Trypho's race, they held Christ to be man of men and they remained within the boundaries of Judaism. This explains the utter indifference with which Justin is treating them.

But Harnack's list is not complete. The most important section of Christians of Jewish descent has been left out. Who are those Christians referred to in ch. 55, as some laudable exceptions whom God has left as a seed for salvation lest the race be utterly destroyed? Who are those seven thousand alluded to who have not bowed their knees to Baal (ch. 39)? Harnack doubts whether the "\( \ Tau\)" group, those who are daily becoming disciples, are actually Jews, but it seems to us that the whole argument rests upon that fact. What connection would there otherwise be between the Gentile converts who daily turn to Christ, and the continued persistence of the Jewish people?

The fact is, that Justin's conception of "race" is such as to include all those who are knit together by the bond of a Jews who were full members of the Catholic Church, were of the Christian "race", and their existence was taken for granted. Only those who were not within full communion of the Church, whose position had to be clarified, and concerning whom there was some difference of opinion, were the object of Justin's elucidations. We thus arrive at the following conclusion:

1) There were Jewish Christians, members of the Catholic Church: the seven thousand who have not bowed to Baal and who constituted the remnant of Israel, the holy seed (Is. 1, 9; 6, 13).

2) There were Jewish Christians who kept the Law and demanded of the Gentile Christians to do likewise. These were outside the Christian communion.

3) Between these two extremes there was a third group occupying a middle position: those who keep the Law, but did not demand of Gentile-born Christians to do likewise. Concerning such, there was difference of opinion.

4) Apart from these, there were Jews still within the Synagogue who were semi- or secret believers. Their position was ambiguous and Justin shows little interest in them. Such was the situation in the middle of the second century.

A remarkable feature of the picture thus obtained is its close similarity to what we know about the internal position of the Jewish Church from the Pauline Epistles and from the Acts of the Apostles. The deep-seated division between the Judaizing party on the one hand, and the anti-nomian party on the other, began in Jerusalem and goes back to the days of the Apostles. There is also evidence for the existence of a moderate party, standing half way between the two: a party which probably at one time enjoyed the greatest influence as it could claim for itself the authority of James and Peter. Thus, the "temporary duality" which the Church developed in its earliest days, endured for over a century. But now the situation was undergoing a change. The middle of the second century, i.e., the time when the Dialogue took place, marks a transition-period in Hebrew-Christian history. The change is effected by the new political situation.

After the failure of the Bar Kochba insurrection, and the brutal measures adopted by the Roman authorities to quell the Jewish spirit of resistance, there is a notable change of outlook. In the Jewish consciousness, nationalism and religion have always closely related. But Jewish nationalism prior to the Destruction was nurtured entirely by religious motives. For Israel to be in subjection to heathen rule was an insult to God. We know from Josephus that till the last moment, Jewish nationalists were clinging to the hope that God would miraculously interfere to save His Sanctuary. They conceived their cause to be identical with that of God. But after the Destruction and the final defeat under Hadrian, religion became subservient to the national cause. It became the means to an end, and that end was the preservation of Jewish identity. In the changed circumstances, the problem concerning the Law was lifted from its religio-theological connotation into the sphere of national emergency. "Jewish nationalism", says Klausner, "in so far as it is connected with religion, is bound up with the ceremonial laws", for "they are a defence against assimilation by the heathen peoples which surrounded the Jews on every side". But what is a defence is also a barrier. Thus, Judaistic Christianity, which tenaciously adhered to the Law for the sake of the people, became isolated from the rest of the Church. A part of it drifted back to Judaism from which it was separated more by tradition than actual difference of belief. The rest was swallowed up by the strong gnostic currents, until it entirely lost its Jewish-Christian connections.
"Judaic" Christianity, following the signification given by F. J. A. Hort,157 we identify with that section of the Jerusalem Church, which, from the beginning, held a liberal outlook concerning the Law. It inclined to the Pauline view with regard to the Gentiles; it found itself in opposition to the Jewish authorities; it was compelled to take refuge in Pella, and in the Diaspora, it united with the main body of the Catholic Church. These Jewish Christians soon lost their identity through intermarriage, as there were no barriers to separate them from the Gentile Church.158

8. The Minim.

Moritz Friedländer has tried to show that the Minim, whom we meet so often in the Talmudic literature, were originally not Christians, but Jewish heretics of pre-Christian times. Their antiquity is avouched by the fact that the meaning of the word itself has been lost, as is also the case with the names Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes: "was uns lehrt, dass ihre Enstehung in so frühe Zeit fällt, dass die Ältesten Berichterstatter selbst die Etymologie dieser Namen nicht mehr kannten". Another proof for his theory Friedländer adduces from the fact that already in the first Christian century, there was in existence "eine stark angefeindete, von den pharisiischen Schriftgelehrten mit dem Anathem belegte Literatur": "Eine solche aber entsteht nicht über Nacht". Friedländer, therefore, feels justified in disassociating the Hebrew Christian movement from that of the Minim. They have nothing in common. Friedländer's conclusion is based upon the unwarranted assumption that the Minim rejected the cardinal dogma of Christianity, i.e., the resurrection.161 But Friedländer's views have found little support amongst scholars. On the contrary, it is generally held that, if not in all, then in many cases, the Minim referred to in the Talmud are Hebrew Christians. The fact that they were well acquainted with Pharisaism, that they knew the Scriptures and were trained in the principles of the Jewish religion, is no justification for turning them into Gnostic heretics, as Friedländer does.

a. The etymology of "Min".

The etymology of the word יִנְיָם has for long presented a puzzle to scholars and many suggestions have been made. We will now dwell upon it at some length as in our opinion, the meaning of the name is essential to a right understanding of Hebrew Christianity and its relationship to Judaism.

In the first place, it must be borne in mind that the word יִנְיָם has come to us from an opposing party, i.e., from an enemy source. It is, therefore, a name of derision. But as is usually the case, such nicknames are either a perversion of the real name, with an intent to giving it a malicious meaning; or else, they are an entirely new invention, expressing some peculiar feature of those thus named. In other words, the name יִנְיָם must either refer to some peculiarity of the sect under discussion, or else be a corruption of another name, or both. The purpose of a nickname is to provide the opponent with a derisive or negative appellation.

The majority of scholars are agreed that the word יִנְיָם is to be connected with Gen.1. and translated to mean "species", "kind". Thus, Strack explains: "Min ist einfach das aus Genesis 1 bekannte Wort min, jëwos , Art. Und ebenso wie göj, Volk, bes. Heidenvolk, die Bedeutung "Heide" und Jisrael, Israel, die Bedeutung "Israelit" bekam, erhielt min die Bedeutung; der (im Unterschiede von der Hauptmasse der Judenheit) zu einer besondern Art (Abart) Gehörige, Häretiker; der dem eignen Herzen (statt den authoritativen Worten der Gesetzeslehrer) Folgende". Herford holds the same view, but he gives a more elaborate explanation in support of this theory. He first contradicts Levy's suggestion that the word יָד is derived from the Arabic root "man", to lie, speak falsely; and the Syriac "mania", madness. He then suggests that because יָד and יָד are analogous, and because "ד in the Old Testament means unfaithfulness to the "covenant-religion with God"; יָד and יָד have been combined in such a way as to mean both "apostasy from the national religion", and also "kind", "species", "sort". Bacher, who holds a similar view to that of Strack and Herford, offers a more simple and therefore more convincing hypothesis. He explains: "יָד est le terme biblique qui dans Genèse, par exemple, est traduit par ג'אוס. Au figuré, ce mot est employé dans le sens de secte, דִּגְּבִיס; c'est particulièrement dans les cercles pharisiens qu'on parlait du מִיָּד, de la secte des Sadduceens". Bacher then points to Josephus, Antiq.XIII,10,6, where we find the expression נאֶבּוֹ דְוַוְאָנְו ג'אוס used in the sense of נאֶבּוֹ דְוַוְאָנְו דִּגְּבִיס. He then explains: "Avec le temps, יָד signifia simplement secte, et d'abord, celle des Sadduceens". This is a very plausible explanation, but for one difficulty.

It is important to notice that the very simple word יָד occurs sometimes in a varied orthography. Thus, in Sanh.37a, it reads יֵשָׁד, but in Baba bathra 25a, it reads יֵל whereas, Sifra has entirely an orthography of its own: יֵשָׁד and בָּלְבִּיד. Bacher has felt the difficulty, though he only refers to the spelling in Sifra (Torath-Kohanim). But he explains it as an isolated case of no further significance, due to the hand of a writer, whose intention was to give to the word a distorted meaning of his own: "il semble que l'auteur de cette orthographie individuelle, qui ne se trouve pas ailleurs, a inséré de propos délibéré le ק dans le mot בָּלְבִּיד pour déformer et lui donner un sens détestable: \( \text{p'y\text{a}n\text{y}m} \text{ ou } \text{p'yn\text{y}m} \) serait le pluriel de \( \text{p'yn} \) (Ex.7,14; 9,2; 10,4), ou bien de \( \text{p'yn} \), comme dans Jér.13,10.\(^{69}\)

But the verb \( \text{p'yn} \), which means to "refuse" or "disobey" neither deforms the meaning nor makes it specially detestable.\(^{70}\) At best we can regard it as an attempt to give some meaning to a difficult word. Had this been the only orthography, such an explanation could have been acceptable. But we have already seen that there are other modes of spelling it. Bacher's explanation is, therefore, not satisfactory.

On the other hand, a few important scholars have held that the word \( \text{p'y\text{a}n\text{y}m} \) is a corruption of \( \text{p'yn\text{a}n\text{y}m} \). This explanation has the advantage, not only of restoring a reasonable meaning to a difficult word, but also of relating it to the life of those thus named. Joël rightly observes that such names are to be explained not only "mit Hilfe der Linguistik, sondern zugleich aus dem Leben und der gesetzlichen Praxis (Halachah) heraus..."\(^{71}\)

In a footnote, Joël adds: "Es ist eigentlich überflüssig, die wesenhaftere und darum auch namengebende Bedeutung der \( \text{p'yn\text{a}n\text{y}m} \) im Neuen Testament nachzuweisen."\(^{72}\) It is also possible that Derenbourgh's theory, which explains \( \text{p'y\text{a}n\text{y}m} \) as a contraction of the initials \( \text{p'yn\text{a}n\text{y}m} \) or \( \text{p'yn\text{a}n\text{y}m} \) of \( \text{p'yn\text{a}n\text{y}m} \) is by no means too far fetched, especially when we remember how fond the Rabbis were of making puns and juggling with words.\(^{73}\) It seems to us that Herford dismisses such a suggestion too light-heartedy.\(^{74}\)

The fact that a scholar like George Foot Moore, though declaring himself in favour of the first theory, mentions without contradiction the etymology which sees in "Minim" a corruption of \( \text{p'yn\text{a}n\text{y}m} \), and even quotes Acts 5,14: πιστευόντες τῷ Κυρίῳ in support of it, is significant enough.\(^{75}\) It is also worth noting that this is not a theory of entirely modern origin, but that it has some measure of support in Jewish tradition. Joel mentions that he found Mussafia (1606?-1675) to have given a similar explanation.\(^7\)

But even if we accept "min" to be connected with \(\text{דנמ} \) there is still the question why such a corruption and no other? On the other hand, if "min" meant nothing at all, it would have been useless as a nickname. It appears to us that both contending views contain part of the truth. \(\text{דנמ} \) is to be understood in connection with Gen.1 and means \(\text{שדנמ} \). It was given a negative connotation, something like "Abart" (Strack); this happened because the \(\text{דנמ} \) called themselves \(\text{דנמ} \). Herein lay their distinction from the rest of the people; they were the believers. By some strange coincidence, the original name has preserved itself in Sifra. It is remarkable that but for one single letter, it presents the unmistakable reading of \(\text{דנמ} \). If such an interpretation stands its ground, we have made the first step towards identifying the Minim.

b. The identification of the "Minim".

It appears from R. Nahman's remark (Hul.13b), who speaks in the name of Rabba bar Abuha, that the word "Minim" is applied to Jewish, and not to non-Jewish sectaries: "among the Gentiles there are no Minim". It is generally agreed that this is the case; the word Min signifies a Jew tainted with heresy. But there occur some exceptions. Herford admits that there are instances when the term appears to be applied to Gentiles also. In the case of R. Hanina, R. Hoshaia and the Min (Pes.87b) engaged in a conversation, in which both Rabbis and also the Min make use of Scripture, the latter is obviously a Gentile, and probably a Christian.\(^7\) Who then were the Minim?

As with the etymology of the name, so with its application, opinion is mainly divided into two groups:
1) Some scholars, like D. Chwolson, H. Graetz, A. Geiger, A. Schlatter and M. Joël, hold that "Minim" are primarily Hebrew Christians.

2) Others, like H. Ewald, J. Hamburger, E. Schürer, A. Wünsche, J. Bergmann and J. Levy, regard Minim to signify Jewish heretics in general, Christian or otherwise.

It must be admitted that most modern scholars are in favour of the wider interpretation of the name. Thus, Israel Lévi, defines the term in the following words: "C'est un terme neutre, passepartout, s'appliquant indifféremment à toutes les hérésies, ici aux judéo-chrétiens, tantôt aux chrétiens (considérés comme formant une secte juive), souvent aux gnostiques chrétiens".

And again, more emphatically: "Mais, encore une fois, jamais ce mot par lui-même ne dénonce une hérésie déterminée; il signifie tout simplement; hérésie..." It cannot be denied that the word Min has acquired a meaning for which there is enough evidence to support Israel Lévi's wide interpretation. But even those scholars who hold a similar view are constrained to admit a special connection between Minuth and Hebrew-Christanity. Thus, Strack observes that whenever the Synagogue was speaking of Minim, it had primarily in mind Hebrew Christians." Bacher says: "de ḫ' on forma l'abstrait ḫ' , qui, dans un sens plus particulier, désigne le christianisme". Büchler, whose one aim is to show that Minim are non-Jewish heretics with no reference whatsoever either to Jesus or to Christianity, feels constrained to make the following observation: "Damit soll nicht in Abrede gestellt werden, dass in einer ganzen Reihe von Talmudstellen Min sich auf Juden mit hütetischen Ansichten bezieht; aber alle diese Nachrichten betreffen Meinungen und Zustände vor dem Jahre 135 und zwar in Judäa". This is an important admission on the part of Büchler. The question which immediately arises is: what kind of heretics were those people whose Jewish connections Böchler reluctantly admits? His reservation, though not completely justified, that those Jewish minim belong to the period prior to 135 A.D., and that their place of abode is Judea, is an important clue to the solution of our problem. The height of success was reached by the Hebrew Christian movement in the period between the Destruction of the Temple and the Bar Cochba insurrection, i.e., between 70 and 135 A.D. In the middle of these 65 years, in the year 90 A.D., or thereabouts, the Birkat ha-Minim was introduced. The Synagogue was striving to apply counter-measures in order to check the heresy. The division became more and more pronounced. An important factor was the steady growth of Gentile Christianity, which compromised the Jewish Christians in the eyes of the Rabbis. The crisis came to a head at the outbreak of the insurrection. Bar Cochba's authority rested upon a Messianic claim, a claim which Hebrew Christians could not accept. Public opinion turned against them, and they were subjected to severe persecution. This completed the process of separation. The Jewish Christians now realized that a compromise was impossible; there was no room for them amongst their people. Before them were three alternatives: 1) back to the Synagogue, 2) membership in the Gentile Church, or 3) a separate existence. No doubt, some made one choice, others made another. That there still survived Hebrew Christian communities, leading a separate life, we know from Jerome, who called them "semijudaei" and "semichristiani", which well described their difficult position. This is in complete agreement with Moore's statement as to the effect of Hadrian's war upon Hebrew Christianity in its relationship to the Jews. But it must not be assumed, as Moore does, that after the war, every contact with the Jewish people was broken. Prof. Moore states: "The Christianity which the rabbis had to do with after (the war) was Greek, and the controversy with catholic doctrine". As in the case of Büchler, this statement is based on the assumption that there were no Hebrew-Christians within the catholic Church, or approaching the view of orthodox Christianity. We will have occasion to see that there actually were such Jews. But if Moore is right, then we have to assume that the discussions with Minim of a later date refer either to Jewish Gnostics, or to Gentile Christians. But Herford has shown that in most cases, the controversy involved Christian doctrine. His conclusion with regard to the Minim is, that they are neither Gentile Christians nor Jewish Christians, but a certain type of Jewish Christians who tried to keep up their connection with Judaism, and whose theology was related to that of Hebrews. These two contradictory statements make it abundantly clear that the word Minim has been gradually widened to include both Jews and Gentiles. But the fact that Gentiles were included within the category of Minuth, leads us again back to Hebrew-Christianity. For how otherwise could Gentiles be heretics, unless their heresy was associated with Judaism?

Harnack makes the following observation: "Der Name 'Christen' ist ein Titel der Heidenchristen; Judenchristen sind zunächst und wahrscheinlich lange Zeit hindurch mit diesem Namen niemals genannt worden". In a footnote, he explains that, to his knowledge, there is no old Christian document where Jews are called "Christians". This was entirely a Gentile designation: "Jeder konnte die Juden für die Christen den Namen Christen aufbringen, noch konnten Heiden darauf verfallen, von "Christen" zu sprechen, so lange die Bewegung eine rein innerjudische war..." But it appears to us that even the Hebrew equivalent of would have been an impossible appellation, as faith in the Messiah was not only a Christian, but also a Jewish characteristic. The only difference between them was that the first believed he had come, while the others still looked for his coming. The 'Christians' were thus the believers, the יורדים. This self-designation has been derisively corrupted by their opponents into יניע and יניעו. When the Gentiles accepted faith in the Messiah, and claimed to believe in the God of Israel; esteemed the Scriptures and looked for the Resurrection, but otherwise walked in the way of the Minim, they were naturally, in Jewish eyes, also Minim.

The Minim were thus Christians: first Jewish Christians, then also Gentile Christians; later, when Christianity removed itself from the Jewish horizon, the appellation was given to any Jews of dissenting views. It became a terminus technicus to describe apostasy from God.

c) The Minim and Judaism.

Chwolson draws attention to an interesting sentence in connection with the case of R. Eliezer ben Dama, the nephew of R. Ishmael, who was bitten by a serpent and who died because his uncle prevented his being healed by Jacob of Kefar Sama (Sekanya) in the name of Yeshu ben Pandera. To the implied question, why R. Ishmael intervened in a case of emergency, in which case there is no prohibition, the following explanation is given: שניהם, יניע או יניעו, למקרא דאחת ירמיהו which Chwolson translates: 'bei Minut (Judenchristentum) ist es etwas Anderes, weil es verlockend ist und man konnte sich von ihnen (den Judenchristen) angelockt fühlen'. That Minuth had an enticing quality against which a Jew was to guard himself we know from other instances.

Eliezer ben Hyrcanus, who was arrested for Minuth by the Roman authorities, on R. Akiba's suggestion, suddenly remembered that he once walked along the street (upper market) of Sepphoris, where he met Jacob of Kefar Sekanya, who quoted a saying of Jesus which pleased him. The Rabbi thus interpreted his arrest for Minuth as a punishment for taking pleasure in a Scriptural interpretation which had Jesus as its author. The actual exposition concerning the hire of a harlot (Deut. 23,19) strangely contrasts with the sayings of Jesus we meet in the Gospels. Klausner remarks: "at first sight, this exposition... does not accord with the character of Jesus' teachings..." but he holds that "Pharisaic methods of exposition are by no means foreign to him." Klausner therefore accepts the tradition as genuine. Strangely enough, R. Eliezer ben Hyrcanos, was himself under grave suspicion of heresy. It is remarkable that he does not refute the change, but makes, as Herford says, "a skilful evasion". There is also the fact of his excommunication by the Sanhedrin at Jabneh. It is therefore possible that behind his confession to have taken pleasure in a certain exposition coming from a heretical source, is more than would appear on the surface. But however the case may be, the fact is that the Minim were a snare to one of the greatest Rabbis at the end of the 1st century A.D.

R. Eliezer ben Hyrcanos is by no means an isolated case. An even more interesting person is the much discussed Elisha ben Abuyah, often referred to as Aher ("the other"). Elisha, who flourished at the end of the first and the beginning of the second century, was a famous Tannai and the teacher of R. Meir. The references concerning him are obscure and sometimes contradictory. The opinion amongst scholars as to the nature of his heresy is diverse. Some scholars hold that he became a Gnostic, others that he became a follower of the Philonian philosophy. Louis Ginsberg holds that he was simply a Sadducee. Only this, he thinks, can explain R. Meir's continued friendship with his former teacher. But Ginsberg's interpretation meets with a great difficulty. There is the fact that Elisha was credited with having broken the Sabbath in the most unseemly manner. Was this characteristic of Sadducean behaviour? However, it is impossible to decide what his views were. But we do know that he was suspected of hiding in his clothes "sifre minim", while he was still functioning as a teacher in the schoolhouse. Herford points out that Elisha, whom he calls the "arch-Gnostic of the Talmud", is never referred to as being a Min himself; "the most that is said of him is that he used to read books of Minuth". Nevertheless, though there is no evidence for his adherence to Christianity, this may show that he took some interest in it. Curiously enough, the story about Hananiah, the nephew of R. Yoshua, ben Hananiah, in one feature resembles the case of Elisha ben Abuyah.

Midrash Rabbah tells the following story: Hanina, the son of R. Yoshua's brother, came to Capernaum, and the Minim worked a spell on him and set him riding on an ass on the Sabbath. He went to his uncle Yoshua, who anointed him with oil and he recovered. (R. Yoshua) said to him, "since the ass of that wicked person has brayed at you, you are not able to stay in the land of Israel". So he went from thence to Babylon and he died in peace.

Herford says: "That the Minim here denote Christians, there can be no possible doubt". "The ass of the wicked one", he interprets as a reference to Jesus. But he has some doubts as to the authenticity of the incident on the grounds that Hanina, a well-known Babylonian authority, was in a dispute with the patriarch R. Shimeon ben Gamaliel, and the incident here recorded intends to depreciate an opponent. The story is only recorded in the Midrash, and there is no reference to it in the Talmuds. However, Herford sees reason to believe that it goes back to old tradition.
There certainly are no sufficient grounds to discredit it. As it stands, the narrative gives the impression of veiled hints, and the whole incident seems to be wrapped in mystery. But several facts stand out clearly: the story refers to a famous rabbi, whose uncle enjoyed a great reputation. It seems to us that the mere quarrel with the patriarch is not sufficient ground to throw suspicion upon an important personage, as the passage unquestionably does. It is also evident that the Minim here are Christians, and that there is a reference to Jesus. The incident takes place in Capernaum, and the rabbi is presented as a breaker of the Sabbath law; very much like Elisha ben Abuyah. Herford says: "The story represents Haninah as having been the victim of magic". The spell upon the Rabbi which his uncle so effectively removed, was the result of the "braying of the ass of the wicked one". The real nature of the incident is revealed by the fact that Hanina had to leave Palestine. The spell of the Minim spoilt his reputation.

Justin presents Trypho as having said: "I am aware that your precepts in the so-called Gospels are so wonderful and so great, that I suspect no one can keep them; for I have carefully read them". (ch. X). This is an interesting admission, which undoubtedly goes back to an authentic remark of Justin's opponent; especially as the praise of the lofty Gospel-teaching is combined with genuine Jewish criticism, which is strangely reminiscent of modern writers. Whether Trypho can be identified with R. Tarphon or not, he was a distinguished Jew, who knew the Scriptures and had read the Gospels. On his own admission, he had studied them carefully. There may be a grain of irony in his words, but it is nevertheless an admission that the Gospels are both wonderful and great. Significantly enough, the controversy between Trypho and Justin does not turn round the teaching, but the person of Jesus Christ and the Christian attitude to the Law. Trypho's knowledge of the Gospels reveals their popularity and the fact that they were read, not only by Christians, but also by Jews. It is therefore natural to conclude that they presented an attraction. It is with this fact in the background, that Talmudic and Midrashic evidence concerning Hebrew Christianity must be viewed. The sources at our disposal are hostile, and their aim is to misrepresent a hated opponent. To take all they say literally is to misunderstand their purpose. This becomes abundantly clear in the light of the following example:

In Eccles. rabbâ 1,8, following upon the story of Hanina, is the strange experience of R. Jonathan with the Minim: One of Jonathan's disciples ran away to the Minim. The Rabbi went to seek him and found him in subjection to them (or doing the cooking). The Minim invited the Rabbi to join them. Thereupon he fled, and they pursued him. After they had persuaded him to do kindness to a bride, he went and found them ravishing a girl. He said to them: "Is this the way for Jews to behave?!" They answered with a text, (Prov. 1,14). Then he fled home and shut the door in the face of his pursuers. The story ends with the Minim saying to R. Jonathan: "if thou hadst turned and looked upon us, instead of our pursuing thee, thou wouldst have pursued us". Herford holds that the Rabbi is R. Jonathan ben Eleazar, a Palestinian Amora, of the third century. He belonged to the circle of R. Hanina, was a pupil of Simeon ben Jose ben Lakonia, and teacher of Samuel bar Nahman. He lived in Sepphoris. The Minim here are, according to R. Jonathan himself, Jews. The fact that they lived either in Sepphoris or Capernaum points to their being Hebrew Christians. The rest of the story, however, is nothing else but an exhortation to keep away from the Minim. They are thus presented as practicing immorality, which characteristicly enough—they justify by quoting a text from Scripture. This is undoubtedly a reference to the Christian habit of appealing to the Old Testament. They entice Jonathan's disciple and keep him in subjection. But above all, they even endanger the Master himself. The mere sight of a Min is sufficient to pervert a pious Jew. All rabbinic references to Christianity bear a similar character. They are therefore misleading in any attempt at construing the conduct and beliefs of their opponents. Nevertheless, there are enough hints to warrant a guess as to the main tenets of the heresy.

The fact has been noted that in the discussions between the Rabbis and the Minim, the person of Jesus is strangely avoided: "Die Erwiderungen sind meist indirekt, haben gleichnishaft Einkleidung und bewegen sich oft in kaum verständlichen Anspielungen." This fact led Herford to assume that the Minim in question were "Jewish-Christians whose Christology was developed beyond the point at which the Messiahship was the chief distinction of Jesus." It is not clear, however, what Herford means by that. To Christians, especially Hebrew-Christians, the Messiahship of Jesus was basically important. It would have certainly been the main topic of conversation with unbelieving Jews. It appears to us that the reasons for that strange caution are to be sought in the fact, first, that we have only fragmentary notes and even these are distorted, and secondly, that the Jewish sources were not interested in providing posterity with the views and argumentations of the Minim. There is also an obvious tendency to avoid the name of Jesus.

A characteristic feature in the dispute between Jews and the Minim is the constant appeal to Scripture on the part of the latter. It is usually not the Rabbis, but the Minim, who are the questioners, and the discussions seem always to turn round the interpretation of texts. In this, the Minim adopt a method similar to that of Justin. He, too, clinches his arguments by quoting Scripture.\textsuperscript{216} Now, what was the topic of their conversations? The fact that, in spite of the many references in the Talmudic and Midrashic literature, this question is not easily answered, is already significant. But, as we said, there are some hints.

The Jewish main argument against Christianity was always directed to prove its deficient view of the Godhead. It was argued that, by raising the Messiah to a position almost equal to that of God, the purity of monotheism was impaired. Some of the Rabbinic references have clearly this objection in view;\textsuperscript{217} Trypho's contention against the Christian doctrine of the Messiah points in the same direction.\textsuperscript{218} The question concerning the plurality in the Godhead is a prominent feature in the Rabbinic discussions with the Minim. Traces of it, it would appear, may already be found in the Mishnah.\textsuperscript{219} One particular passage in the Talmud well illustrates the nature of the dispute: R. Johanan said: in all the passages which the Minim have taken (as grounds) for their heresy, their refutation is found near at hand. Thus, "Let us make man in our image" (Gen. 1,26: plural), - "and God created man in His own image" (v.27; sing.); "come, let us go down and there confound their language" (Gen.11,7; plur.) - "And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower" (v.5; sing); "Because there were revealed (plur) to him God" (Gen.35,7) - "Unto God who answereth (sing.) me in the day of my distress" (v.3); "For what great nation is there that hath God so nigh (plur.) unto it, as the Lord our God is (unto us) when we call upon Him (sing., Deut.4,7): "And what one nation in the earth is like thy people, (like) Israel, whom God went (plur.) to redeem for a people unto Himself (sing., 2 Sam.7,23): "Till (thrones) were placed and (one) that was ancient did sit" (Dan. 7,9).

The Talmud, however, proceeds to ask: Why were these (plurals) necessary? R. Johanan's theory is: The Holy One, blessed be He, does nothing without consulting His heavenly Court (ץ' בה, family). The idea being that the plurals indicate the presence of the heavenly beings who stand before God. But this does not explain the plural of the last text: "Till thrones were placed."

R. Akiba's suggestion is: "One (throne) was for Himself and one for David" (i.e., the Messiah). But R. Jose protested: "Akiba, how long wilt thou profane the Shechinah?" R. Jose offers a better explanation: "One (throne) for justice, and the other for mercy". R. Eleazar ben Azariah, however, suggests: "One for His throne and one for His footstool. A throne for a seat and a footstool in support of His feet".

Akiba's remark concerning the son of David and the immediate rebuke of R. Jose, significantly enough a Galilean, in our view, throws important light upon the whole discussion. Why did R. Jose think that with his remark concerning the Messiah, the Shechinah was being profaned? Jacob Schachter answers: "By asserting that a human being sits beside Him". But did not R. Akiba notice the implication of his remark? Herford has felt the difficulty. He says: "It is remarkable that R. Aquiba, who was sufficiently alive to all danger of heresy, should not have detected the fault in his interpretation of the text". Such an assumption is impossible. It is more natural to hold that Akiba was giving expression to an ancient view. But at that time, i.e. before the Bar Kochba insurrection, such a view became unpopular. The severity of the rebuke reveals the importance R. Jose attached to the case. Herford says rightly that R. Jose's explanation is "a very forced one"; so it was. It is an explanation created by an emergency. Here we meet a case where Scripture is be-
We have previously noticed that the references to the Messiahship of Jesus are few. But that the Messiah was discussed, and that Jesus was meant, is more than a mere assumption.

R. Abahu and a Min discussed an anachronism in the psalms. The difficulty for the Min was why "the Psalm which refers to the earlier event comes after that which refers to the later one". To Abahu, this is no difficulty at all. He says to the Min: "To you who do not interpret "contexts", there is a difficulty, to us, who do interpret "contexts", there is no difficulty". But Abahu proceeds to ask: "Why then, is the Psalm concerning Absolom (Ps. 3) next to the Psalm concerning God and Magog (Ps. 2)? He explains: "So that should anybody ask thee: 'is there a slave that rebels against his master?' do thou ask him: 'Is there a son who rebels against his father?' The latter has happened, and similarly will the former happen".

The rebellion of the slave against his master, refers to the nations rising in revolt against God (Ps. 2); the son rebelling against his father, refers to Absolom's rebellion against David. So much is obvious from the text. But when we remember that R. Abahu was speaking to a Min, and that he often engaged in disputations with Christians, the conclusion that he was hinting at Jesus is near at hand. A more explicit reference to the Sonship of Jesus is contained in the Jerusalem Talmud. Commenting on the phrase "Like a Son of God" (Dan. 3, 25), Reuben ben Aristobulos (?) said: "In that hour (i.e. when Nebuchadnezzar uttered these words), an angel descended and struck that wicked one upon his mouth and said to him, 'amend thy words: hath He a son?' Bacher regards this passage as a definite rebuke against the Christian doctrine of the Son of God. This is also Herford's view. It is difficult to say whether Reuben's censure is directed towards Gentile or Jewish Christians. But the fact that he still belongs to a comparatively early period would suggest the latter.

That the Rabbis took notice of what was happening in the Gentile world can be seen by the interesting, almost modern view, expressed by R. Hanin, who said: "Israel will not require the teaching of the royal Messiah in the future, for it says: Unto him shall the nations seek (Is. 11,10) but not Israel". H. Friedman remarks: "For Israel will receive its teaching direct from God". Bacher sees in it "eine polemische Spitze gegen das Christentum u. seinen Messias". The fact that such an explanation was necessary, contradicts the view that Judaism remained indifferent to the Christian movement.

The Talmud quotes a saying which seems to have been attributed to several teachers: "The son of David will not come until the whole kingdom is converted to Minuth". A similar sentence is to be found in the Mishnah, which, though there is some doubt whether it was uttered by R. Eliezer ben Hyrkanos, belongs nevertheless to the Mishnaic period. It therefore falls in the second Century. "Malkuth" is usually interpreted to mean Rome. Herford explains the meaning of the utterance: "The conversion of the Empire to Minuth is merely a way of saying that the spread of heresy and the consequent decay of religion will be universal". But at that early stage, does it mean that the Rabbis were concerned with the "orthodoxy" of pagan Rome? There is, however, another passage about which there is some doubt as to the reading, and which Herford has therefore not included in his collection; but Bacher does not hesitate to accept the reading of instead of in the text. It reads: "When thou seest the seats (subsellia in the schools) filled with Minim, then look for the feet of the King Messiah. As it is said: "He hath spread a net for my feet, he hath turned me back". (Lam. 1, 13).

It is difficult to imagine that Abba b. Kahana, who is credited with this utterance, could have applied the quoted text to his Babylonian colleagues. The fact that Minim are invading the schools of learning points to Hebrew Christians. The Rabbi is undoubtedly exaggerating. Perhaps the reference is not to pupils, but to teachers, as the word subsellia (יָפָה) seems to suggest. We have already seen that a few of them became suspect of heresy. It reveals the alarm the Rabbis felt at the spread of the Christian heresy in their own ranks.

The Synagogue's aim was not only to separate the "sheep from the goats", but also to find suitable arguments to counter Christian propaganda.

The Midrash contains an interesting passage which deserves to be quoted in full: "Abraham said to God: 'Sovereign of the Universe! Thou madest a covenant with Noah not to exterminate his children; then I arose and accumulated meritorious acts and pious deeds, whereupon my covenant superseded his. Perhaps another will arise and accumulate even a greater store of precepts and good deeds, and then a covenant with him will supersede Thy covenant with me?' Said the Holy One, blessed be He, to him: 'From Noah I did not set up shields of the righteous, but from thee I set up shields of the righteous. Moreover, when thy children take to transgressions and evil deeds, I will see one righteous man then who will be able to say to My Attribute of Justice, "Enough!" Whereupon I will take him and make him atone for them".

Here is Bacher's comment on this unique passage: "Man kann sich des Eindruckes nicht erwehren, dass diese Agada eine polemische Spitze gegen den 'neuen Bund' enthält, welcher den 'alten Bund', der mit Abraham begann, beseitigt zu haben vorgab. Abraham erhält die Zusicherung, dass die aus Israel erstehenden Frommen die 'Schilde' ( "ם" ) des Volkes eine Gewehr für die Dauer des Bundes sind. Die Idee des grossen Mannes, den Gott zur Sühne für das ständige Volk hinwegnimmt, soll gegenüber der christlichen Idee vom stühnenden Tode Jesu als der Grundlage des neuen Bundes betonen, dass eine solche Sühne, durch einen Frommen aus Israel bewirkt, nur die Continuität des Alten Bundes mit Abraham befestigt". Now, the Midrash is of a late date, but incorporates ancient tradition. The reference to the righteous man whom God makes atone for the sin of Israel is puzzling. Bacher connects the atoning power of the death of the righteous one with the "shields of the righteous". This may be, or may not be so. It can hardly be a reference to Jesus, whom the Christians claim to have died an atoning death. On the other hand, this passage points to a time when Christian arguments were still a matter of conscience, and when adequate answers were urgently needed. The claims of Gentile Christianity left Jewish thinking largely unaffected. We are thus brought back again to Hebrew Christianity.

What then were the main points under discussion? They concerned the interpretation of Scripture, the Unity of God, the human nature of the Messiah. It has been argued that the controversy was with Gentile Christianity exclusively or else with Gnosticism. "Keinesfalls", says Bächler, "dachten die Lehrer der Mischna im zweiten Jahrhundert noch an den Sohn Gottes, denn ihr Kampf gegen diesen gehört einer viel späteren Zeit, zwischen 280 in 350, an". But even in the later period, Jewish Christians are excluded. This is a biased view, based on the conviction that all Jewish believers in Jesus were strict observers of the Law. Such an assumption is contradicted by the facts. To our mind, the most conclusive proof that the controversy was with Jewish Christians lies in the effect it had upon Judaism.

The controversy with Jewish Christianity caused the Synagogue to modify some of its views and to alter its emphasis. The unity of God, the most fundamental principle in Judaism, was upheld with renewed insistence. The ideas concerning the Messiah were modified and stripped of all metaphysical significance. The Torah was given a transcendent meaning by way of reaction. Orthodoxy became more rigid in proportion to the intolerance shown to those who dared to maintain their own point of view. The national aspect of Judaism was reaffirmed. Other, once essential tenets, were assigned only secondary importance. "Die jüdische Überlieferung hat – das lehrt der Dialog – durch den Kampf mit der Christlichen Tochterreligion eine ausserordentlich starke Veränderung und Verengung erfahren". The result was that Hebrew Christianity was pressed out of Jewish life.

9. The decline of the Hebrew-Christian Church.
   Christians of Jewish descent.
   The Nazarenes.
   The Ebionites.

Israel Abrahams has shown that the Synagogue's dealings with Minuth must be viewed as an internal affair. Its main purpose was self-defence. For that purpose, it introduced the Birkat ha-Minim; it altered its liturgy; it changed its emphasis, especially with regard to Messianic teaching; it created barriers. As the disintegration of Jewish national life coincided with the growth of Gentile Christianity, the reemphasis of Israel's election in face of the Christian claim was an important factor pressing for decision. Thus, Hebrew-Christianity found itself at the cross-roads. We have already said that some Jewish Christians must have returned to the Synagogue, perhaps secretly still uniting the Messianic hope with the person of Jesus. Many, of course, entered the life of Gentile-Christian communities where they disappeared through intermarriage. Some, though still retaining features peculiar to Jewish Christianity, stood in close relationship with the catholic Church. An interesting case is Hegesippus, the author of the Υπομνήματα Πέντε. According to Eusebius, he was of Jewish origin, a fact which is well borne out by his knowledge of Hebrew-Christian tradition. Hilgenfeld holds that Hegesippus was opposed to Pauline theology, but at that stage, he could still remain within the catholic Church. This view, however, has been disputed. There seems to be good reason to maintain his Jewish origin, and this in spite of his strange list of Jewish heretical parties. Eusebius appeals to him as an authority on Apostolic tradition, and seems to have no doubt whatsoever about his orthodoxy. Two other men may probably be claimed by Hebrew Christianity: it is possible that both Papias and Melito of Sardis were of Jewish origin. However the case may be, Hilgenfeld's description of Hebrew-Christianity as a "Grossmacht" is certainly no exaggeration for the first decades of the second century.

There is a good measure of truth in Schonfield's suggestion that the Gentile Christian attitude towards Jewish Christians, as it appears from Justin's Dialogue, had a corresponding parallel on the Hebrew-Christian side. There were those amongst the Gentiles who refused fellowship to those who kept the Law; but there were also such, like Justin himself, who did not mind, provided it was not imposed upon others. Similarly, there was a Jewish section of the Church which accepted the Virgin Birth and the Apostleship of Paul. These Hebrew-Christians were satisfied that the Gentile brethren kept only the Noahic laws as laid down in Acts. There were others, however, who demanded from the Gentiles absolute submission to the Law. But it seems to us that Schmidtke's important work has been too often overlooked by writers on the subject. Scholars sometimes use the names Ebionites, Jewish Christians and Nazarenes, as if they were synonyms, which they are not. This fortuitous use of names, not only confuses the issue, but also gives the impression that all Hebrew-Christianity was heretical as far as the Catholic Church was concerned. But this is incorrect. We will therefore attempt to give a brief outline of the Hebrew-Christian situation as it appears in the last decades of the 4th century.

a) Christians of Jewish descent.

Scholars speak of Jewish Christianity as opposed to the Catholic Church. This creates the impression that all Jews, believing in Jesus were outside the communion of Catholic Christianity. It is therefore important to emphasize that such a presentation fails to convey the whole truth. Schmidtke well asks: "Mit welchem Recht glaubt man, diese anders denn als getauftte und zur Grosskirche ubergetretene Juden beurteilen zu dürfen, wie solche Origenes, Epiphanius haer. 30, 3ff und auch Hieronymus selber comm. in Tit. zu 3, 9 (ML 26,631) als ihre Gewährsleute näher geschildert haben?" 267

Origen's reference to the Jew who became a fugitive for the sake of the faith in Christ; Epiphanius' account concerning the experiences of Joseph of Tiberias; Jerome's Hebrew teacher whom he calls "frater qui ex Hebraeis crediderat", were all Jews who became members of the Catholic Church. Schmidtke shows that Jerome clearly differentiated between Catholic Jewish Christians, and heretical Hebrew-Christianity: "Wie weit der Kirchenvater in Wirklichkeit davon entfernt war, die Begriffe Nazaréer und christgläubige Hebréer einander gleichzusetzen, veranschaulicht sein Commentar zu Jes. 8,23 - 9,5, wo er zuerst die wohl von jenem Frater stammende Erklärung von an Christus glaubenden Hebräern anführt und sogleich danach die Auslegung der Nazaréen zu eben derselben Textstelle als einen Beitrag von ganz anderer Seite folgen lässt. Unter den glaubenden Hebräern sind in jeder Hinsicht rechtgläubige Christen Hebräischer Abstammung verstanden... Hieronymus hat niemals daran gedacht, die Ebioniter und Nazaréen als die eigentlichen Vertreter der hebräischen Christen anzusehen. Schmidteke's opinion cannot be easily contradicted. The usual division of Hebrew-Christianity into two main groups, which Wagemann calls "ein vulgäres und ein synkretistisch-gnostisches Judentum", is only a distinction within heretical Hebrew-Christianity, but it does not circumscribe the whole Hebrew-Christian situation. Not only was there an important Jewish ingredient within the Catholic Church, but there was also a section of Hebrew-Christianity which, though living its own national life, was closely related to it. It stood, as it were, between Catholic Christianity and heretical Jewish Christianity. But nearer to the first than to the latter.

b) The Nazarenes.

The Nazarenes and the Ebionites are sometimes taken for the same group under different names. Brandt has argued that a differentiation between them rests upon a misunderstanding due to Epiphanius' "Freude am Spezifizieren". He holds that Justin's failure to mention either the Nazarites or Ebionites shows how quickly the Catholic Church had lost touch with Hebrew Christianity. "Tatsächlich aber hat die ganze arabische Christenheit nie aufgehört, den aus der Urgemeinde stammenden Nazaräernamen zu führen: der Talmud, gnostische Schriften, eine von den Landländern angenommene Selbstbezeichnung, schliesslich der Qu'ân und
The name Nazarenes, Brandt connects with that section of Hebrew-Christianity which spoke Aramaic; the Greek speaking Hebrew-Christians called themselves Christians. Later, under the influence of the Aramaic version of Matthew, and the Hebrew Scriptures, they began to call themselves Ebionites, for they were both the pious and the poor, especially those to the east of the Jordan. Brandt, therefore, does not distinguish between Ebionites and Nazarenes as two different sects, but rather traces the two different names back to the difference of language. While the Nazarenes were Aramaic speaking Jews, the Ebionites spoke Greek. Hilgenfeld, however, has accepted Epiphanius' authority that the Ebionites were a split from the Nazarenes, who as it were, represented the more conservative branch of the heretical sect. Their common feature was a determined antagonism to Paul. The Nazarenes, it would appear, stood nearer to the Catholic Church, the Ebionites to the syncretic Gnosticism of Elxai. Hilgenfeld sums up the Nazarene position: "In den Nazärern erhält sich im Allgemeinen, das Urapostolische Judenchristentum". But Schmidtke has shown with great ingenuity that the Nazarenes are in no way to be confounded with the Ebionites. The Nazarenes, at least those of Beroia (Beroea in Coele Syria) used a New Testament canon similar to that of the Catholic Church; they included Paul amongst the Apostles; they were anti-Pharisaic in their attitude, and though they kept certain customs prescribed by the Law, these were given a national, and not a religious significance. In view of these facts, it is difficult to accept Bousset's summary judgement: "Das nazärische Judenchristentum von Beroia mit seinem übersetzten aramäischen Matthäus, seinem kirchlichen Kanon und seiner mit der Grosskirche vollkommen übereinstimmenden Gesamthaltung
It is interesting to note that Bousset does not deny Schmidtke's findings; he only ascribes to them secondary importance. But how is it possible to believe that such an important affinity between Jewish and Gentile Christianity is the result of a mere coincidence? Bousset suggests the possibility that the Nazarenes in question represent a circle of Jewish Christians who have subsequently joined the Catholic Church. But then they would cease to be Nazarenes. Schmidtke's explanation is undoubtedly much more plausible.

Schmidtke denies a direct connection between the Nazarenes of Beroia and the primitive Church in Jerusalem. These Nazarenes were, however, brought up under the roof of the Catholic Church. They were "der späterhin abgesonderte jüdischchristliche Teil der ursprünglich gleich der Gemeinde von Antiochien (Gal. 2) aus geborenen Juden und Heiden gemischten Gemeinde von Berda. Diese Christen jüdischen Volkes waren durch die Verhältnisse dazu gedrängt worden, sich zu einem eigenen Verein zusammenzutun, in dem sie ungestört die alte nationale Sitte pflegen konnten. They were thus, no heretics in the accepted sense; their attitude to the Law, to Paul and to the Gentile Church was such that they could be regarded as a branch of Catholic Christianity. Justin Martyr would look upon them as weak brethren, but nevertheless brethren. The name itself is very old and probably goes back to the first Christian community in Jerusalem.

c) The Ebionites.

Hilgenfeld has worked upon the principle that, to Justin, a Hebrew-Christian heresy is still an unknown thing. He points out that even those Hebrew-Christians who would force upon the Gentiles the keeping of the Law, meet only with disapproval, and not with condemnation on the part of Justin. But it seems to us that the moderation in Justin's language must not be relied upon too much. The fact that he was speaking to a Jew whom he tried to win, or at least to interest in the Christian faith, deserves due consideration. However, while Justin knows, or appears to know but little about Jewish Christian heresy, Irenaeus is the first to mention the existence of the Ebionites. Hippolytus seems to connect the with a certain Ebion whom he associates with Cerinthus. But it is Epiphanius who appears to know most details about Ebion: He lived at Kochaba, travelled to Ephesus and Rome. He amalgamated all heresies in his own person: from Jews he received his name, from the Samaritans the abomination, from the Essenes, Nazorites and Nazarites his mind, from the Carpocratians his wickedness and from the Christians he usurped his second name. Some of the other Church Fathers seem to accept the theory that a man of such a name existed, and that he was the founder of the sect. A few scholars have thus held to the existence of Ebion as historical fact. J. Lightfoot has drawn attention to Joma 4,5, where a somewhat similar name occurs. Hilgenfeld has pointed to Baba Kama 117a, where we are told that R. Huna bar Judah came to a place of the Ebionites ( ). He accepts the testimony of the Church Fathers as authentic on the grounds that nobody had any doubt in the old Church as to the existence of such a personage. This is also Dalman's view. On the other hand, it has been noted that the statements of the Church Fathers concerning the Ebionites are confused, and sometimes contradictory. Epiphanius himself, who seems to know most details about Ebion, awakens suspicion. At one time, he connects the name of the Ebionites with Ebion, at another time, he explains it from the poverty of the Hebrew-Christians, who sold their possessions at the time of the Apostles.\textsuperscript{195} It has also been noticed that Epiphanius ascribes the same or similar customs to both Ebion and Elchasai, interchanging and mixing up the two heresies freely.\textsuperscript{196} To this may be added the fact that neither Justin nor Hegesippus, ever mention Ebion. The same is true of Irenaeus, Origen and Eusebius.\textsuperscript{197} Hoennicke has thus concluded on good grounds that a man of the name of Ebion never existed.\textsuperscript{198} This is also Schmidtke's view.\textsuperscript{199}

Who were the Ebionites?

Two parties are usually distinguished within this group:

1) Ebionites of a purely Judaistic type, emphasising the humanity of Jesus, the importance of the Law, and rejecting the Apostolic authority of Paul. This would cover what 'Wagenmann choses to call "vulgäres Judenchristentum" which he regards to be a genuine continuation of the original Judaistic movement.\textsuperscript{300} They have been well described as Ebionites of a Pharisaic type.\textsuperscript{301} The nature of their christology and their attitude to the catholic Church is difficult to define. Schmidtke has shown the extent to which the Church Fathers have mixed them up with various other heresies, and the odium they attached to the name of the Ebionites.\textsuperscript{302} Moreover, the Ebionites have frequently been confused with the Elchasites, with whom they shared certain points of doctrine.\textsuperscript{303} But there were important differences which divided the two sects. The Ebionites rejected the Virgin Birth, they seem to have paid special homage to John the Baptist, whom they copied as their example as a vegetarian, and whom they revered as a preacher of repentance, the Baptiser of Jesus and the descendent of Aaron. As to their name, Schmidtke makes the following suggestion: "Ich vermute, dass es auch das Bewusstsein um den Zusammenhang mit der Urgemeinde war, dass den ersten Anstoss zur Annahme des Wunders
Ebionitēr gegeben hat. Denn Rom. 15,26 und Gal. 2,10, liess sich leicht dahin missverstehen, die Gläubigen zu Jerusalem seien schon in dem apostolischen Zeitalter als 'die Armen' ausgezeich- 305 net worden. The name itself appeared at a later period and probably in the Diaspora. Hoennicke makes the suggestion that it is connected with the material position in which the Hebrew Christians found themselves after their flight from Jerusalem. 306 This is, however, improbable. It is more likely that the name goes back to certain Old Testament texts, where the humble, the poor and the righteous appear to be synonyms. 307 Schmidtke finds reason to assume that the Ebionites consisted mostly of Greek-speaking, Hellenistic Jews. This creates a difficulty, as a Hebrew name presupposes a Hebrew or Aramaic-speaking community. But there is no need to suppose that Greek-speaking Jews had no knowledge of Hebrew, or that the terminology of the Hebrew Old Testament was unfamiliar to them. There may, however, be another reason for their name. We have already noticed that the Ebionites held in high esteem the person of John the Baptist, and that they were vegetarians. There is therefore a definite Essene element in their teaching. It may well be that a certain emphasis upon poverty was part of their doctrine. It is difficult to assume, as Hoennicke and Schmidtke do, that the name Ebionites was a self-chosen appellation. It is more natural to suppose that it was in the first instance a nickname which, gradually hallowed by tradition, became an "Ehrentitel". 308 If this be the case, we may account for the double tradition, or the fusing of traditions in Ebionism; the Nazarene tradition, leading back to the Jerusalem Church, and an Essene tradition, with a tendency towards gnosticism.

Though it is not possible to draw a clear line of distinction between Pharisaic and Gnostic Ebionism, we may say with a measure of safety, that in the more conservative (i.e. Pharisaic) circles, the Judaic elements, while in the more progressive (i.e. Gnostic) circles, the syncretistic-speculative elements, prevailed. But on the whole, it seems to us, the line of division is not so much to be sought in the sphere of theology or Christology, but in the sphere of national emphasis. While the Pharisaic group stressed the national importance of Israel, the religio-national significance of Jerusalem and the Law, Gnostic Ebionism had, by its very nature, assumed a more universalistic outlook. In the form of Elkesaitism, it even made an appeal to the Gentile world. That both groups shared in a definite Gnostic outlook is proved by the fact that even Pharisaic Ebionism had points in common with Cerinthus.

2) Syncretistic-Gnostic Ebionism falls into many groups and is difficult to describe. Our chief authority is again Epiphanius, and we have already seen how confused his ideas are. The Gnostic Ebionites are distinguished by certain non-Jewish features from the more conservative group. However, Wagenmann asserts: "Ihnen allen ist die Anerkennung des Gesetzes und, seiner zere-moniellen u. ritualen Forderungen selbstverständlich auch eigen". They laid great emphasis upon the Pentateuch, or certain parts of it, but seem to have rejected the books of the prophets. Their canon, however, included the historical and hagiographical books of the Old Testament. They practised circumcision, kept the sabbath (perhaps also Sunday?), denounced St. Paul, repudiated the Virgin Birth, in some instances they associated Adam with the Messiah. Jesus they held to be a mere man of great virtue. To him was united the spiritual Messiah, an eternal Being, who suffered upon the cross, rose from the dead and ascended into Heaven. They led a severely ascetic life: they were vegetarians and drank no wine. They strongly repudiated the sacrifices. We have already remarked that they had affinities with the Elkesaites. But while Schmidtke has shown the important points where the two systems diverge, Beveridge holds, "that the differences between the Essene Ebionites and the Elkesaites were small, practically the only point of divergence being the new doctrine of forgiveness". 315 Beveridge, therefore, definitely associates the Gnostic believers with the Book of Elkesai and the pseudo-Clementine literature, while Schmidtke holds the Elkesaites and the Ebionites separate. But it appears to us that the difference of opinion is due to a too rigid delimitation of both groups.

On the whole, we may say, that Gnostic Ebionism was marked by a more highly speculative Christology: by a more rigid form of ascetism and a less pronounced nationalism. While to the Pharisaic group, the Messiah's significance lay in his perfect fulfilling of the Law, to the Gnostic group, he was given greater metaphysical importance. To both, however, Jesus himself was only a man of great virtue, a teacher and a prophet. The ascetism of the Gnostic group is chiefly of Essene origin, which expresses itself, not only in a strict vegetarianism, but also in the repudiation of the sacrificial system and the practice of daily lustrations.

But it is doubtful whether there is justification to speak of distinct groups within heretical Hebrew-Christianity. Hoennicke's observation: "Dass es unter den Judenchristen zu abgeschlossenen Sehiten gekommen ist, ist geschichtlich nicht wahrscheinlich", deserves our fullest attention; it is a warning against a too clear cut systematisation of Ebionism.
10. The end of Hebrew-Christianity.

Jewish Christianity, as it presents itself to us in the first 3 or 4 centuries of the Christian era, reveals the following picture:

1) A proportion of the Hebrew Church, even prior to the Destruction of Jerusalem, was swallowed up by Catholic Christianity. This Jewish element was steadily reinforced by means of conversion and intermarriage, especially after the Fall of Jerusalem. It is usually held that the Jewish element within the Catholic Church was numerically insignificant. But this is difficult to ascertain. Their influence, however, upon the Gentile Church was of the greatest possible importance. Gentile Christianity owes to those Jewish Christians the handing on of the primitive tradition, the emphasis upon the moral aspect of religion, the exegetical understanding of the Old Testament; but above all, the Old Testament itself. It is doubtful whether the Gentiles, without the insistence of Hebrew Christians, would have retained the Old Testament canon. The importance of this cannot be overestimated.

2) Apart from Jewish Christians, who lived in full communion within the Gentile Church, there was the Nazarene group, which closely approximated the Catholic view. The distinction between the Nazarenes and the Gentile Christians was fundamentally of a national and not of a theological nature. They attached national significance to the observance of certain customs, but did not require of the Gentile believers the keeping of the Law. Even Graetz admits their Christology to be akin to that of the Gentile Church. To what extent they submitted to Pharisaic principles is difficult to say. Graetz speaks of Jewish Christians who "went yet further than the Nazarenes and gave up the law, either in part or altogether”. We are inclined to assume that this was actually the case with the Nazarenes themselves. If we accept Schmidtke’s arguments, and there are no good reasons to oppose them, the Nazarenes were pro-Pauline and anti-Pharisaic. Their separate existence was due to their national loyalty and to a sense of duty towards their own people. Hoennicke well remarks: "Es war für viele Juden ein folgenschwerer Schritt, wenn sie infolge der Annahme des Evangeliums aus dem Volks- und Synagogenverbande ausscheiden mussten". The separate existence of the Nazarenes was the vain effort to maintain the connection, if not with the Synagogue, then at least with the Jewish people.

3) Ebionism in its various forms was the right wing of the Nazarene section of the Church. The Ebionites were closer to Judaism than to Christianity. Beveridge has defined it as "the residuum of the struggles and heart-burnings of the age when the religion of Jesus Christ shook off the trammels of Judaism". It was an effort to combine faith in Jesus Christ with the traditional tenets of Judaism. As always, the national motive was an important factor. Though Graetz is mistaken in identifying the Ebionites with primitive Hebrew-Christianity in its purest form, he is right in emphasizing their strong national leanings.

If W. Singer is right, the writer of the Book of Jubilees, is an Ebionite Christian, who is pleading against the abrogation of the Law.

However, there was no room, even for Ebionism, in the Jewish Synagogue. It was this fact that drove the Ebionites ever closer to a Gnostic non-Jewish outlook.

Thus, Judaistic Christianity, the historical episode which depicts the attempt to graft upon the essentially different Synagogue, faith in Jesus Christ, found its slow and tragic death.
Hemmed in between the Catholic Church and Catholic Judaism, Jewish Christianity slowly dwindled away. Between Justin (Dia. c. 47) and Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 42, where Ebionites are already an obscure sect) lies the last phase of Hebrew-Christian existence, as far as the Church was concerned. For the Synagogue, Hebrew Christianity proper ends with the Bar Kochba insurrection, when the final act of separation was completed. Its actual existence reached to the 4th and 5th centuries, especially in Syria. But it exerted no important influence either upon the Synagogue or the Church.

Hoennicke suggests a few valuable points which contributed towards the disappearance of the Judaistic party:

1) The universalism of the Christian message.
2) The abatement of Pauline influence within the Catholic Church: "Mit dem Zurücktreten der paulinischen Predigt musste die judaistische Bewegung ihre Schärfe, ihre eigentliche Pointe verlieren".
3) The Destruction of Jerusalem.
4) The hostility which Jewish Christians met with from their Jewish brethren.

Of these the most important is the Destruction of Jerusalem. Hebrew-Christianity detached from its native soil, had only two alternatives - back to the Synagogue, which entailed denial of Jesus the Messiah, or fellowship with the Gentile Church, which meant denial of the Jewish national heritage. The dilemma was a specifically Jewish one, the Gentiles were in a different position. For them, the choice was entirely within the sphere of religious life, for the Jews, it was both a national and a religious problem. Ebionism reveals an effort to find a compromise or to evade the issue. It went half-way in both directions, but history has proved that its path ended in sui de sec.
CHAPTER VI.

CONTEMPORARY HEBREW CHRISTIANITY.

According to a strange Jewish tradition, to the Apostle Peter is ascribed the authorship of the prayer לַשׁוּתַת הַנּוֹפֵל for the Day of Atonement נְפֶל and some other Pijjutim. The origin of such a legend is difficult to explain, but it may bear evidence to the fact that a vague memory of the Synagogue's connection with Christianity has never left the Jewish consciousness. Not only has the Synagogue felt herself challenged by the existence of the Church, but Jews in all centuries have been both attracted and repelled by Christianity. The main fascination for the enquiring Jew was the person of Jesus Christ. To use Rabbi Enelow's words: "as a matter of fact, the interest of Jews in Jesus was never dead", but only "suppressed or misdirected". It was inevitable that some Jews should come in closer touch with Christianity and yield to its message. However impenetrable the fence the Synagogue erected to separate the Jews from the Gentiles, the fact that the outside world was to a large extent Christian, was of no little significance to Judaism. The missionary impulse of Christianity, its non-national features, its lofty spirituality and its affinity with Judaism on some vital points of doctrine, but above all, the social pressure exerted upon the Jewish population, made it an ever present danger to the Synagogue. There was never a time when there were no Jewish Christians in the Church.

To the Synagogue, naturally, every Jewish conversion to Christianity, was a major calamity. It broke the closed ranks of Jewry and jeopardised Jewish existence. To this must be added the fact that some of the converts, especially in the Middle Ages, showed a fanatic hatred to Jewry and were the cause of great tribulation. Every convert was thus regarded both as a traitor and a mischief-maker. To this day, neshummad is the most contemptible appellation a Jew can conceive. It implies apostasy, faithlessness and opportunism in one. Seldom do Jewish writers admit the sincerity of a Jewish convert to Christianity. All baptised Jews are suspected of mixed motives. The possibility of conviction is almost unanimously denied. While Jews have never had any doubts as to the sincerity of Gentiles who became Jewish proselytes, some of whom were outstanding men and abandoned high positions and wealth for the sake of Judaism, they heap scorn upon every Jew converted to Christianity. Such behaviour, however, is not only the result of intolerance on the part of a minority struggling for self-preservation. While the Gentile, by becoming a Jew, joined a despised and persecuted religion, the Jew, by becoming a Christian, found himself at an obvious advantage. To this must be added the fact that the Church was sometimes guilty of employing unworthy methods, such as bribery, social pressure, etc. in order to win converts.

Furthermore, Jews are deeply convinced that Christianity is inferior compared with Judaism. Conversion, therefore, born out of personal conviction is ruled out as an impossibility.

From the Jewish point of view, religion is not a matter left to the decision of the individual. At any rate, as far as the Jew is concerned, it is not his choice or conviction, but the fact of his birth which is decisive. For the Jew, there is no escape from Judaism, it is part of his destiny, if he likes it or not. Every effort at independence is equal to treason. While for the Gentile proselyte his choice is purely a religious matter, for the Jew who leaves Judaism, it is both religious and national. To leave the Synagogue means to leave the people at the same time. Here lies the main reason why Judaism, while gladly admitting proselytes, calumniates every Jewish convert to Christianity.

That a great number of Jews who accepted baptism did so for other than religious motives, is an undeniable fact. The social, economic and other advantages of joining the majority are so obvious, that even in the case of sincere conversion, there is always the suspicion of opportunism. For this reason, many Jewish believers in Jesus Christ have never joined the Christian Church. On the other hand, to deny sincerity of conviction to all Jewish converts amongst whom were many saintly men and women, is a grave injustice. It springs out of the conscious, or unconscious, assumption that the difference between Jew and Gentile is such, that the psychological and spiritual laws operating in the one are not applicable to the other. That such an assumption has no foundation is amply proved by the fact of Hebrew-Christianity. That there is no essential psychological difference between the Jew and Gentile goes without saying. The accident of birth must not, and cannot be the determining factor in the human quest for truth. If our definition of the difference between Judaism and Christianity in terms of inward disposition rather than outward adherence, holds good, then, neither tradition nor history are decisive factors. The characteristically Jewish attitude is not confined to Israel and the characteristically Christian attitude to the Gentiles. Before God, man stands in his fallen humanity, and he stands alone, in all his poverty. His national traditions, his loyalty to the past, his claim upon prerogatives, provide no refuge before the Judge of mankind. Man either surrenders in his helplessness, pleading no merit save God's grace; or else he asserts himself before God, falling back, if not upon his own, then upon his peoples' virtues. Faith in Jesus Christ, as the Church understands it, implies surrender. The underlying principle of Judaism is opposed to such an attitude, for it is based upon the fundamental Jewish assertion, that man can hold his own before God.\(^{11}\)

There are many Jews in the Synagogue, who, though never challenged by the Christian message, have been led to acknowledge their utter helplessness falling back upon God's grace; in this their inward disposition, they are potentially Christians.\(^2\) On the other hand, there are many Christians in the Church who faithfully adhere to traditional Christianity, but who in their self-sufficiency have assumed an attitude of independence vis à vis to God: in this their inward attitude, they are Jews.\(^3\) To the first Jesus Christ says: He that is not against us is for us (Mk. 9,40); to the latter he says: The last shall be first and the first last (Mtt. 20,16). It is from this position of inwardness that the demarcation line between Church and Synagogue becomes fluid. The real test lies not in the rigid adherence to tradition, but in the inward attitude of the individual believer.\(^4\) To deny this fact is to deny not only a vital Christian truth, but the basic principle of true religion.

There is, however, one more point which must be borne in mind. In the Christian view, that characteristic attitude of surrender, which is only the reverse side of humble acceptance of salvation from the hands of God is not due to human humility, but to God's grace. Man cannot save himself, he must be saved. Even man's acceptance of salvation is due to God, and not to man. This is the meaning of "prevenient grace". The source of faith itself is God and not man.\(^5\) Conversion, therefore, is always a miracle of God's grace. Man does not convert himself, he is converted by the Spirit of God. That conversions can and do happen is not only upheld by the missionary experience of the Church, but by the miracle of her own existence. It is the fact of conversion which holds the secret of the continual renewal of Christianity. Franz Rosenzweig has clearly recognised conversion as an important characteristic of the Christian Church. Missionary enterprise is thus an integral part of the Christian faith. Its life depends upon it. The Church began its existence by calling individual men into fellowship with Jesus Christ and it still addresses itself primarily to the individual. In her missionary vision, the Church knows of no geographical or racial limitations. In her claim and profession she is still the ecclesia catholica. If not in practice, in theory at any rate, her missionary work amongst Jews and Gentiles has never ceased. Jewish converts are thus the result of the missionary effort of the Church which knows herself called to preach to all men. What appears to the Synagogue as interference is for the Church an expression of her loyalty and faith. To leave out the Jew from the missionary obligation is to the Church not religious tolerance, but betrayal of her cause and denial of her faith. Without the Jews, the Church is incomplete.

Thanks to the missionary impulse of the Church, Hebrew-Christianity has really never totally disappeared. At no time was the Church entirely without converts from Judaism. There is, however, an important difference between Hebrew-Christianity prior to 135 A.D. and after that date. While Hebrew-Christianity till the Bar Cochba Insurrection was a phenomenon taking place within the life of the Jewish people, after the Bar Cochba incident, it first lived in separation, and later in estrangement and even in hostility to the Jews. The revival of modern Hebrew Christianity is marked by the attempt on the part of Jesus-believing Jews to regain entrance into Jewish society.
1. The missionary approach.

The missionary approach to the Jewish people is as old as the Church itself. Its beginnings go beyond the opening chapters of the Acts. Johannes Weiss has shown that traces of the missionary activity immediately after the death of Jesus, are still recognizable in the Gospels. In one sense, the first and greatest missionary to the Jews was Jesus himself, who addressed his message primarily to the Jewish people. The disciples followed their Master's example, limiting their missionary effort to their own kinsmen. Even Paul, the "Apostle to the Gentiles" seems to have carefully followed the rule "to the Jew first". Only by degrees were the Gentiles included; St. Paul's Apostleship to the Gentiles was the result of circumstances rather than design. It was under pressure that he turned to non-Jews with his Gospel: and though Paul was not the first to approach the Gentile world with the message, the main attention of the early church was fixed upon Israel.

a) The Old Testament.

The burden of the missionary message was the Messiahship of Jesus. This was supported by Old Testament texts. Christian interpretation of the Old Testament was, from the beginning, an important factor in the missionary witness of the Church. In the case of the two disciples of Emmaus, it was Jesus himself, who "beginning from Moses and from all the Prophets" interpreted to them the Scriptures concerning his own person (1 Cor. 15, 3, 4), was an important phrase in the vocabulary of early Christianity. The appeal to the authority of the Canon was a powerful weapon especially as far as the Jews were concerned. It is for this reason that the controversy with the Synagogue was primarily exegetical in character. The knowledge of the important proof-texts and their right interpretation formed the basic education of the Christian missionary. As there were, however, no professional missionaries in our modern sense, the knowledge of Messianic passages was a universal acquirement in the Christian community. Everyone was expected to be able to give an answer concerning the Hope cherished by the believers (1 Pt. 3,15). It was for this purpose that manuals containing selected texts, the so-called Books of Testimonies, came into existence. The method of finding the Messiah predicted in the Old Testament is not a Christian invention. It belongs to the ancient tradition of the Synagogue. The Rabbis held that "All the prophets prophesied only of the days of the Messiah". The identification, however, of Jesus with the Messiah was the distinctly Christian interpretation of Scripture. For this purpose, incidents in the life of the Messiah were made to tally with Old Testament prophecies and vice versa, prophetic utterances were applied to the Person of Jesus as the promised Messiah. A classical instance is Philip's interpretation of Is. 53 to the Ethiopian eunuch. The connection between the suffering Servant of God and the crucified Messiah was only too obvious. But here again, it was not Philip's ingenuity that created the parallel. Is. 53 has undoubtedly had important Messianic significance for the Synagogue, though it is not possible to ascertain how early this chapter was interpreted as referring to the Messiah. and the various other references to the fulfilment of Scripture belong to the genuine tradition of the primitive Church and undoubtedly go back to Jesus himself. It is for this reason that we have to repudiate Lee Woolf's assertion that the Messiahship of Jesus was only of local significance. Without the background of the Old Testament and the deeply-rooted Messianic tradition of 'the Synagogue, Jesus' claims would have had no foundation whatsoever.

The Old Testament, therefore, was of the greatest possible assistance to Christian preaching. All missionary preaching, especially to the Jews, was substantiated by an appeal to Scripture. The speeches in Acts, attributed to Peter, Stephen and Paul, all make reference to the Old Testament. Apollos, who was "mighty in the Scriptures", showed by the same that Jesus was the Christ. The importance attached to the Old Testament appeal can be judged from the dialogue between Justin and Trypho. Here, every claim Justin makes for Jesus, he tries to prove by Scripture, even to the name of the Messiah, which he identifies in some curious way with the name of God (ch. LXXV). He also accuses the Jews of having removed passages from Esdras and Jeremiah. He alleges that from Ps. 96, 10, they have removed the phrase "from the Tree", which, in Justin's opinion, contained a reference to the Cross (ch. LXXIII). Another exegetical curiosity is the famous passage in the Epistle of Barnabas, where it is made out, first, that Abraham circumcised 318 men of his household, and secondly, that this number contains the initials of the name of Jesus (IH) and a reference to the Cross (T). But such ingenious exposition was by no means foreign to the methods with which the Synagogue was acquainted. The Church Fathers soon learned from the Rabbis how to make use of the text for their own purposes. Evidence of the ingenuity of both is amply provided by the Talmud, the Midrash and the Patristic literature. The reason why the Church Fathers in some instances appear to outbid the Rabbis lies in the fact that in most cases they entirly relied upon the Greek text. But however forced the exegetical methods may appear to our modern mind, the importance of the appeal to the Old Testament in discussions with Jews cannot be overestimated. It gave the Christian missionary the first point of contact, it created a mutual platform and made it possible to point to the essential unity between the Old and the New Testaments. The allegorical method of spiritualising the ceremonial law and the sacrifices which we meet throughout the patristic literature, e.g. in the Epistle of Barnabas, was practised, though with greater restraint, in certain Jewish circles, especially in the diaspora. In one form or another, it was known and used by the Rabbis in Palestine itself. To a large extent, it was this method of allegorical or typological interpretation, which dominated the missionary approach of the Church. It is still widely used with a certain measure of success.

Dr. Hertz, in a note on the "alleged Christological references in Scripture", makes out that some passages traditionally held by the Church as referring to the Messiah, like Gen.49,10 (Shiloh), Ps.2,12 ("Kiss the Son") Is.7,14 ("a virgin shall conceive") and Is.53 (the Suffering Servant) have become untenable under the pressure of modern scholarship. He therefore holds that only illiterate Jews, ignorant of Scripture, can be impressed by the argumentations of Christian missionaries. But the fact is, that in many instances, not the ignorant, illiterate Jews, as the Chief Rabbi alleges, but men of great learning, have accepted the Christian interpretation of the Messianic texts contained in the Old Testament, and have acknowledged Jesus to be the promised Messiah. It was with this fact in mind that the late Prof. Franz Delitzsch wrote his famous missionary tract, Ernste Fragen an die Gebildeten jüdischer Religion. Christian missionaries to the Jews have always paid special attention to the educated representatives of Judaism. It was with them that an adequate discussion concerning the Christian claims was possible. These claims, were for the most part based upon the Old Testament. It was here that the Church found its supreme witness to the truth, as she knew it in Christ Jesus. It was handed down to her by Jewish hands. They were Jews who first connected the Messianic passages in the Old Testament with Jesus the Messiah, and throughout the centuries, the appeal to the Hebrew Scriptures remained the most convincing argument for the Messiahship of Jesus. Saul, the converted Pharisee, was "proving" to the Jews of Damascus that Jesus was the Christ; J. Lichtenstein, the old Rabbi of Tapio Szele, Hungary, was "proving" to his brethren, since the days of his conversion, that Jesus was the promised Messiah. Both, Rabbi Saul of Tarsus in the first century, and Rabbi Lichtenstein of Tapio Szele in the 19th, were appealing for evidence to the same Old Testament.

The Hebrew Scriptures are still of fundamental importance in the proclamation of the Christian message. Without them Christianity is inexplicable. However much our exegetical methods have changed, the appeal to the Old Testament is still an essential part of Christian evidences. The discussion between Jews and Christians must of necessity centre round the interpretation of Scripture. It may be that the "New Israel" as the Christian Church calls itself, "did not precisely grow out of an 'Old Israel," to borrow a phrase from S. A. Cook, but without the one, the other would have been impossible. The embryo of Christianity is deeply embedded in the Old Testament and this not merely in the sense of a progressive understanding of spiritual truth, as is now commonly held, but in the deeper sense of promise and fulfilment.
The experience of the Dutch poet Isaac Da Costa was the experience of most sincerely converted Jews. Da Costa, in the preface to the English edition of his book, Israel en de Volken, tells us that it was through the study of the Old Testament that he was led to the New Testament and finally to Jesus Christ. Elsewhere, Da Costa confesses that he owes his conversion to the testimony of the great Dutch poet William Bilderdijk (1756-1831), who spoke to him of the Old Testament and directed his attention "to the prophecies, to the promises given to the fathers, to the portions of revealed truth, preserved even in the traditions of the Rabbis (Messiah ben David and Messiah ben Joseph, etc)."

For the religious Jew converted to Christianity, the Old Testament has been the infallible guide, leading in a straight line from Moses and the Prophets to Jesus and the Apostles. To the Hebrew Christian, the connection between the Old Testament and the New Testament is of most vital importance. Unless the two Testaments compliment and explain each other, faith in the Messiahship of Jesus becomes a purely subjective conviction without anchorage in historical revelation.

b) Mysticism.

It is unfortunate that the excess of zeal on the part of Jewish missionaries, especially converts, has led to extending the field of evidence from the Old Testament, first to the Talmud and then to Jewish mysticism. In the search for a starting point, the temptation to elaborate any affinity of ideas is very natural. Paul in Athens seized upon the inscription: Ἀνωτέρω Θεῷ, in order to make known the God who revealed himself in Jesus Christ: he even quotes a Stoic poet to give force to his argument against idolatry. But occasional reference to a familiar quotation from an alien source is one thing, and the adducement of proof that the source is only apparently alien, is Christian apologists have sometimes committed the mistake of going to Rabbinical literature for evidence in support of Christian doctrine. Pablo Christiani appears to have been one of the first to use this sort of argumentation in his famous public discussion with Nachmanides, while Raymund Martini followed the same path in his Pugio Fidei. Later, when the mystical literature of the Synagogue became more widely known amongst Christian scholars, the apparent affinity with Christianity led to the conviction that it actually contained in esoteric language the doctrines of the Church. Thus, the Zohar was held to be an important witness to the truth of the Christian faith. Some resemblance to the Christian doctrines of Atonement, Mediation, the Holy Trinity, etc, and the metaphysical speculations of the Cabala has led to the assumption of an internal harmony between Christianity and Jewish mysticism. Medieval scholasticism was specially attracted by the speculative-fanciful method of exegesis employed in the Zohar. A fascination with Jewish mysticism has survived to our days. Jehiel Zebi Lichtenstein, a Jewish-Christian missionary, has tried to prove in his book Limmude ha-Nebiim (1869) the extent of harmony between the teaching of the Cabala and that of the New Testament. Dr. P. P. Levertoff, a great exponent of Chassidic thought, has devoted his energies to working out the essential unity between Jewish (viz. Chassidic) and Christian points of view in matters of worship and doctrine. Lev Gillet, who appears to be influenced by Levertoff, has demonstrated in his recent book that there are fundamental elements in the Rabbinical tradition which are common both to the Church and the Synagogue. To Gillet, the strongest link between Judaism and Christianity, is to be found in Jewish mysticism, esp-
Christian writers have rightly found in Jewish mysticism the weakest spot in the armour of the Synagogue, ever ready to defy the missionary propaganda of the Church. But while older writers have worked on the principle that good evidence from any source may be used for missionary purposes, modern apologists work on the principle that Judaism is not a false, but only an incomplete religion: "Nothing of the true Jewish tradition", says Gillet, "needs to be altered in order to adjust itself to the Gospel: it needs only to be complemented. The Christian doctrines of the Word, the Son of God, the Messiah, the Mediator, the Holy Spirit, the Community are legitimate interpretations and extensions, not only of Scriptural, but also of rabbinical Judaism". Underlying this approach is the principle of progressiveness in religion. On this premiss there must be a way back to the source from which Judaism and Christianity sprang. From the historical point of view, such retrospect in the sphere of comparative religion is a logical possibility. Christianity explained in terms of religious growth is deeply anchored in Jewish tradition. It ought to be possible to retrace the thread to the place from which both Church and Synagogue originally started. The fact, however, that it is mainly in the mystical domain of Judaism, that any affinity of ideas can be discovered, ought to caution Christian writers. The association of Cabala with Christian theology, throws a shadow of suspicion upon the Church. Christianity is more than speculative mysticism. The mystical elements in the Christian tradition are not the main characteristics of the Church. Besides, the Cabala itself owes some debt to Christian ideas, having drawn upon a large variety of sources. Orthodox Judaism, on the whole, has looked upon its mystical speculations with suspicion. Judaism, though making room for a certain amount of mysticism, is essentially a religion of law and reason. Mystics in Judaism, as in every other religion, have always been a small minority. The affinity between Jewish and Christian mysticism is not only explained by the derivation from common sources, but also by the fact that mysticism is essentially universal, it follows the same law and strives towards the same goal. To describe the origin of Christianity as the result of suppressed mysticism is an aberration. Every religion possesses a mystical element, if we understand mysticism as the expression of inwardness. But mysticism proper is infinitely more than religious inwardness. It is rebellion against historical revelation, and as such both Judaism and Christianity are opposed to it. While there is an undeniable affinity of outlook between Jewish and Christian mysticism, Jewish mystical speculations cannot serve as a bridge leading to Christian orthodoxy. The underlying principles of Judaism and Christianity are such that they automatically exclude each other. A. Fürst has shown the precariousness of the missionary approach via Jewish mysticism. The divergence between Jewish mysticism and the Christian Faith is fundamental. Spiegel rightly says: "The Kabbala teaches nothing less than that this deliverance of God can be brought about by man and by man alone." It is here that the disparity appears in all its force.

c). Criticism.

The most common method in missionary propaganda was the direct assault upon Judaism. Christian preachers and writers have set themselves to prove the inferiority of the Jewish religion as compared with Christianity. The starting-point of this method was the attempt to show the Jews their misunderstanding of the Old Testament.
St. Paul, in an effort to explain the unbelief of his brethren, spoke of the "veil of Moses" which lies upon the heart of Israel so that they cannot see Christ. The reference to the Spirit in the context (v.17), suggests that the veil of the Law which hides Christ from the eyes of the Jewish people, is caused by their faulty understanding of Scripture. This was an ancient view in the Church; thus, Jn.5, 39 reads: ἐσενννάτε το σ γραφάς... ...ἐυεινάι εἰναι αἱ ματυροῦναι περὶ ἐμοῦ. The reason why the Jews could not see Jesus Christ in the Old Testament was because they clung to the letter which killeth, while neglecting the Spirit which giveth life. It was with this fact in view that the Epistle of Barnabas carries on its strange exegetical argumentation. Here every Old Testament ritual is made to prefigure Christ, and is given a spiritual significance. Thus, the red heifer is a type of Christ, and circumcision has only meaning when interpreted in the spiritual sense. Even the Mosaic prohibition of certain foods the author finds possible to explain in a spiritual fashion. The reason why the esoteric meaning of the Old Testament is clear to the Christians but obscure to them (i.e. the Jews) is "because they did not hear the voice of the Lord". This mode of argument is common to all ancient Christian writers.

To the old Church, Judaism was an error born out of unbelief and lack of spiritual insight. It was not and could not be the religion of the Old Testament. Between the Rabbis and Moses was a gap. Both the Law and the Prophets foretold Christ, but the Jews rejected him; they have thus disobeyed the laws. Tertullian tells us that in the dispute between a Christian and a Jewish proselyte, it was the Gentile who vindicated God's Law and not the Jew of the stock of Israel. For Israel has misunderstood the meaning of the Law and has fallen away from the faith as represented in the Old Testament. Tertullian explains elsewhere that, "in former times, the Jews enjoyed much of God's favour, when the fathers of their race were noted for their righteousness". But having trusted in their noble ancestry, and being puffed up, they have fallen away from God and become impious. As a merited punishment for their sin, they are unable to understand the Lord's first advent, still waiting for their own Messiah to come in glory, while rejecting the humble appearance of the Son of God.

The mind of the Church with regard to Judaism has been clearly put forth by Cyprian. In the first of his three books, Ad Quirinum, the noble bishop of Carthage proves from Holy Writ the utter rejection of the Jewish people, their incapability of understanding the Scriptures: the abulment of the Law; the abolishment of the priesthood; the passing away of the temple; the acceptance of the Gentiles instead of the Jews, etc. Cyprian, however, does not end in this strain: the Jews still can obtain pardon from their sins "if they wash away the blood of Christ slain in His baptism, and passing over to His Church obey His precepts". He supports this view by quoting Is.1,15ff: "Wash you, make you clean, etc." This may appear a harsh view judged objectively. But for the Church Fathers, Judaism was not adjudged on its merits or demerits, only on its attitude to Jesus Christ. The fact that it was hostile to Him whom the Church believed to be the Christ, stamped it as an error. They therefore sharply differentiated between the Synagogue and the Church of the Old dispensation. In arguments with the Jews this has been repeatedly brought up by Christian apologists. Tertullian explains that the veil which was on the face of Moses was only a figure of the veil which is still on the heart of the Jewish people: "because even now Moses is not seen by them in heart, just as he was not then seen by them in eye". An interesting attempt to reconcile Jewish unbelief in the Messiah and Israel's adherence to the Law is contained in the Clementine Homilies. The author explains that the things which belong to the Kingdom have been hidden from Israel, but the way which leads to the Kingdom "that is, the mode of life, had not been hid from them". For Moses said: Behold, I have set before you the way of life and the way of death; and the Teacher, (i.e. Jesus) when asked how one can inherit eternal life, pointed to the commandments of the law. Here the Law itself is not repudiated, but the Jewish interpretation of it. It is for this reason that the author quotes Mk.12,24, adding: "Wherefore every man who wishes to be saved must become, as the Teacher said, a judge of the books written to try us". For the Old Testament contains spurious matter which only the believer in Christ knows how to separate from what is genuine.

The argument of the Clementine Homilies is unique. The more usual line followed by Christian apologists is to show the inconsistency of Judaism. The fact that the Jews cling to the promises of the Old Testament, still expecting the coming of Messiah, while all the time rejecting Jesus in whom the prophecies were fulfilled, appeared to the Church an inconsistency which could only be explained by obduracy and which Origen held to be in keeping with human nature generally, and most specially with the character of the Jewish people.

A certain disparity between the Old Testament and Rabbinic Judaism has been noticed by Christian apologists from the beginning. It underlies all Christian arguments directed against Judaism. The frequent accusation "that the Jews understand the words of the prophets in a carnal manner and explain them falsely,..."
is already implied in the New Testament literature. The most natural step was to separate Rabbinic Judaism from the Old Testament altogether and to discredit it as an aberration. The essential difference between Judaism and Christianity was seen in the fact that while Christianity is closely linked to the Old Testament, Rabbinism is a departure from it. Writers like J. Georg Walch (1693-1775), P. J. Martin Gläserner, Paul Anton (1661-1730), H. Stuss and J. Christoph Georg Bodenschatz (1717-1797), have all worked on this principle. Martin Rudolf Noelführer, though convinced that Judaism holds much in common with Christianity, stresses that it has strayed away from Biblical truth. Writers like John Lightfoot (1602-1675), Johann Christian Wagenseil (1633-1705), Johann Christian Schöttgen (1687-1751), and many others, have held similar views. A Jewish Christian writer, Philipp Ernst Christfels (1671- ), in his book Das neue Judentum (1735/38), sharply distinguishes between the Old Testament which he proves to be closely related to Christianity, and the "new" Judaism, entirely an invention of the Rabbis. Most pronounced are the view of Johann Andreas Eisenmenger (1654-1704), the notorious enemy of the Talmud. In his Entdecktes Judentum, he declares the Talmud to be nothing else but "ein von den Rabbinen erfundenes, und in lauter Menschen-Satzungen bestehendes Werk, darinnen wider das Gebot Deutr. 4, 2 etc... ausdrücklich ist gehandelt worden". Eisenmenger explains: "Die Ursach aber, warum die Juden die heilige Schrift so seltsamer Weise auslegen und verkehren, ist ihre grosse Blindheit und Verstockung..." The fact is often obscured that Eisenmenger wrote in a missionary interest; Chapter XVIII deals with the reasons why so few Jews are converted, and he ends his book with a prayer that God would remove the veil of Moses from the Jewish heart, so that both Jews and Gentiles would become united in the Messiah.
The last great Missionary writer, whose book marks, as it were, the end of the period of the older method of approach, is Prof. Alexander McCaul. His, Old Paths, which first appeared in 60 weekly instalments beginning Jan. 15th, 1836, and has since seen several editions and translations, is based on the principle of absolute disparity between Rabbinism and Old Testament teaching. The author uses Rabbinic sources in order to show the utter inadequacy of Judaism. In his preface to the first edition, he carefully explains that it is not his purpose "to ridicule any man's superstition, but to instruct those, whom Moses and the Prophets would have declared to be in error". Eisenmenger's tone is abhorrent to the pious writer, and he expresses the hope that his readers will know how to distinguish between Judaism and the Jewish people. His controversy is thus not with the Jews, but with their religion.

Prof. McCaul explains at the beginning of the first chapter, that the opposition between Judaism and Christianity is not that of a Jewish to a Gentile religion, but of two Jewish creeds: "it must never be forgotten that the latter is as entirely Jewish as the former". Accordingly, the writer defines Christianity as the Old Testament explained by the New Testament, while Judaism is the Old Testament explained by Rabbinic law, i.e., בה שבעי ז"ח נחלות יולם (Jer. 6,16). In conclusion of this rather elaborate study (over 650 pages!), McCaul arrives at the following points: 1) Judaism is a false religion; 2) Judaism has for its authors wicked men, unworthy of credit; 3) Hence their testimony against Christianity is of no value; 4) finally, in all those points wherein the Oral law is weak, the New Testament is strong.
The last point is important, for it reveals to us the main principle upon which missionary propaganda was based, namely the exaltation of Christianity at the expense of Judaism. The result of such an approach invariably led away from the main purpose of Christian witness into the inconclusive discussion as to which "religion" is superior. Thus, McCaul says in all earnestness: "If there be one sign of true religion more satisfactory than another, it is the placing of holiness of heart and life as the first great requisite, at the same time that it does not undervalue any of God's commandments. Now this mark Christianity has, and Judaism wants". What would a Jew answer to such criticism? Isn't the moral law the very essence of the Jewish faith? McCaul appeals to his readers to compare the New Testament with the Talmud and judge for themselves. Montefiore, however, has pleaded convincingly that the counterpart to the Talmud is not the New Testament, but the Patristic literature. Furthermore, Nachmanides, in his controversy with Paulus Christiani, has already explained that nothing in the Talmud but Halaka is binding for Judaism. It is true that McCaul resorts to the Jewish Prayer Book in order to establish the authority of the Oral law from it, but his digressions are such that they seem to include every possible superstition in order to show the absurdity of Rabbinism. There is still another point which immediately strikes the impartial observer in a presentation of Christianity such as McCaul's. There is complete absence of reference to historical fact as far as the Church is concerned. In view of Church history, it almost sounds like mockery when McCaul declares that had Judaism power, it would convert the nations with the edge of the sword. A definite reaction against such one-sided and partisan presentation of Christianity marks the modern missionary approach.
Here Judaism is presented, not as an erroneous religion, devoid of all truth, separated in letter and spirit from the Old Testament but as on the same level with Christianity, yet at a less developed stage. It is stressed that "Judaism and Christianity are not so far apart as some imagine... Christianity is the completion of Judaism, not the destruction of its fundamental truths." G. H. Box, after referring to the view which holds the two creeds as "hopelessly divergent", explains that "such an attitude can only be looked upon as unhistorical". To him, Christianity is nothing more than "the flower and perfection of Judaism in its most vigorous and spiritual phase". Not only are there Christian strains in Judaism, but it is even possible to speak of a "latent Christianity" within the religious life of the Synagogue. Another author reminds us that "Judaism is of divine origin", and in his recent book, Lev Gillet urges the full use of Rabbinic theology in an attempt to translate Christianity in terms comprehensible to the Jewish mind. Even in the official document of the findings of the Budapest Conference, "the difference in the religious approach between the followers of other non-Christian religions and of Judaism" is stressed. An increasing appreciation of the value of Judaism marks modern Jewish-Christian relationship.

d) Conversion.

For the old Church, conversion meant a radical break with the convert's former religion. In the case of the Jew, owing to the fact that all national customs had religious significance, and also because of the ever-present fear of "Judaizing", he was expected to break away completely from his former traditions, even from contact with his people. Origen's answer to the Jew whom Celsus quotes as accusing converts from Judaism to Christianity, of having forsaken the law of their fathers, is somewhat ambiguous. He draws attention to the Ebionites whose very name is derived from the "poverty of the Law", and who strictly keep to the traditions of the fathers, but makes no reference to the other Jewish Christians who were within the Catholic Church. His scornful remark concerning the Law, and his explanation of the Apostles' adherence to it, show clearly that the Jewish believer was not expected to remain in subjection to the old customs. At a later stage of his argument, Origen proves to Celsus that it is not impious to do away with ancestral laws when these laws are unreasonable and harmful. In the case of the Mosaic law, it was neither unreasonable nor harmful, but superseded by the new dispensation.

The convert who left Judaism and became a Christian assumed a new loyalty to the community into which he entered. He left behind "the unbelieving and ignorant Jews", who have been disinherited by God for rejecting Christ, to become a member of God's people. The severity of the restrictions and the imposition of a solemn renunciation of the Jewish faith, as practised in the early Middle Ages, was the result of suspicion attached to the Jewish convert. The national motive was of little consequence to the Church. The Christian faith created a new brotherhood. The controversy between the Church and the Synagogue was at such a pitch that the two faiths were held to be totally incommensurate, the one entirely excluding the other.

Historical research and the comparative study of religion has effected an important change of attitude towards Judaism. Careful investigation of the Jewish religion in the New Testament period has revealed a certain association of ideas common to the Rabbis and the primitive Church. Early Rabbinic writings became an indispensable factor for a better understanding of the New Testament. The steady growth of Rabbinic knowledge amongst Christian scholars shed new light upon the faith of the Synagogue and brought Judaism and Christianity into closer contact. The decline of orthodoxy and the modern tendency towards relativism has made a more sympathetic understanding of Judaism easier. The gap which once divided the two creeds has considerably narrowed, and in some instances, has actually been bridged. The characteristic emphasis upon religious experience on the one hand, and ethics on the other, has pushed dogmatic thinking into the background. It is held in certain circles that a common platform is possible on a purely religious and moral basis. In these circumstances, the missionary effort of the Church is looked upon as antiquated. It is asserted that in the case of so highly developed a religion as Judaism, there is nothing Christianity can offer. Judaism itself has a contribution to make to the life of the Christian Church. Some scholars would even hold that Judaism is closer to Jesus and Paul than is the Gentile Church: "for Christians to wish to turn Jews into Gentiles" says Parkes, "is to ignore the facts that the religion of Jesus and of Paul was Judaism, and that neither of them envisaged the creation of a rival body...". We have already seen that in the less radical view, Christianity and Judaism meet at many important points, only that the Church supplements the Synagogue and takes it a step further. "The change from Christianity to Judaism", it is asserted, "is less a Conversion than a progress. It requires little of destructive work, but something of building on the old foundation, and the acceptation of the fulfilment of promises foretold". It is on this premise that the idea of a Christianised Synagogue is founded, a Synagogue wherein all national rites and ceremonies are retained, superadding to these "the distinctively Christian observances". "Conversion" in the sense of an absolute break with the spiritual traditions of the Synagogue and with Jewish nationalism, has thus become obsolete.

But the reapprochement of Christianity and Judaism has led to a further development. The whole idea of conversion itself has undergone a profound and significant change. Judaism knows of no conversion in the Johannine or Pauline sense. הובישה is a much-used term in the Synagogue's vocabulary, but παλαιντέβία is not. Though the term is Greek and can only with difficulty be translated into Hebrew, the notion itself must be sought in the Old Testament and the ancient Synagogue. In the New Testament the idea occurs under a variety of expressions and is closely associated with faith in Jesus Christ. In this connection, it is a characteristic peculiarity of early Christianity. The New Life, the Life from above, the Second Birth, is the consequence of faith in the Son of God. Conversion in terms of χαλκη κτίσυς (2 Cor. 5,17) is more than repentance, moral reform or renewed religious endeavour: it is an inward quickening by an act of grace. It is because this possibility does not occupy a fundamental place in Judaism that the Jew is forced to explain conversions to Christianity either by hypocrisy or opportunism. But that Christian writers should overlook a phenomenon of such vital importance to the Christian faith and to which even modern psychology has paid due attention, reveals the extent of departure from basic New Testament teaching. Lev Gillet tells us that the word conversion implies "that one is brought over from an error to a truth, either dogmatic (as in the conversion of the heretic or the unbeliever) - or moral - (as in the conversion of the sinner)". But as far as the pious Jew is concerned, neither of the two cases is applicable. Judaism is not an error, nor is the pious Jew a sinner. The word "conversion" ought therefore to be avoided.
This overlooks the fact that conversion has still another meaning, namely that of regeneration. Whatever the missionary approach of the Roman Catholic or the Greek Orthodox Church has been,132 Evangelical Missions to Jews and Gentiles were born of the conviction that conversion in the sense of regeneration is the basis of all Christian life: that it is a miracle, and a miracle wrought by God.

In the last resort, the basic principle underlying the missionary witness of the Church is not founded upon exegetical proof, nor the community of religious ideas, but solely upon faith in the miracle of conversion. The challenge which Jesus Christ presents is not answered in terms of doctrine, but of life. The Gospel message comes to the Jew as it comes to the Gentile, not merely as a call to augment his religion, but to transcend it. The Church does not regard her missionary witness as a participation in the general contest of religions in which the better wins.133 Her message is not a religious system, but Jesus Christ. Her witness is carried by the conviction that in Him is an abundance of Life which in quality and intensity transcends all religious forms (her own included), and brings men face to face with the eternal reality of God. This is certainly a subjective view which can be easily gainsaid. But all faith has the quality of subjectivity. The missionary work of the Church is the expression of her faith.

2. Missions to Jews.

We have already remarked that in one sense, missionary work amongst the Jews never really ceased. If not carried out by the Church at large, there were always individual Christians who tried to win Jews for Jesus Christ. The methods employed differed according to the spirit of the age. The motives behind the missionary attempt were, alas, not always spiritual. Impatience, greed, fanatical zeal, and religious intolerance, have often obscured the more noble impulse on the part of individual Christians. It is noteworthy that the stimulus to renewed effort frequently came from converted Jews, sometimes with results which brought more harm than good. This was one of the reasons why the converted Jew was so dreaded by the Jewish community. Most of the famous converts of the later Middle Ages were in one way or another, engaged in winning their brethren to their new faith. Abner of Burgos (1270-1348), John of Valladolid (1335), Joshua ibn Vives al-Lorqui (Geronimo de Santa Fe, 15c.), Peter Alphonsi (1062-1110), Peter Ferrus, Diego de Valencia, Juan d'Espana, Juan Alphonso de Baena, Francisco de Baena, they all sought to win the Jews to Christianity. Astruc Raimuch (=Francesco Dios Carne) is described as "an ardent proselytiser among the Jews". The greatest of them all is the famous bishop of Burgos, Paulus a Sancta Maria (Solomon ha-Levi ca. 1351-1435), who, in his Scrutinium Scripturarum, (Fürst calls it, a "Jewish-Christian More Nebuchim"), has set himself the task of removing the difficulties which stand in the way of the Jew acknowledging Jesus Christ. Even men like Donon and Pfefferkorn were, in their own crude ways, interested in the conversion of their former coreligionists.

On the Gentile side, there were numerous attempts at converting the Jews, and not always by means of coercion. The saintly Gilbert Crispin wrote a Dialogue between a Jew and himself on the Christian Faith. Nicolas de Lyra wrote to prove that the time of Christ's coming corresponds with the time prophesied in the Old Testament, and also that according to the same Scriptures, the Jewish Saviour was to be both God and Man. He also wrote a treatise to refute the allegations of a certain Jew who criticised the Gospel according to St. Matthew. Some of the Dominican Preachers, especially men like Raymund de Penafort, Raymund Martinti and Raymund Lull, have done much both as controversialists and also as inspirers of others to carry on the work. Ignatius Loyola founded in Rome the first Jews' Society with a strictly missionary purpose. But on the whole, mission work remained "spasmodic and unorganized". The systematic and organised effort to preach the Gospel to the Jews is strictly connected with Protestant Christianity, and especially with the religious revival of the 18th century in Germany and in England. The pioneer country for missions to Jews in the modern sense is Germany, but the establishment of the London Society for promoting Christianity amongst the Jews (1809; now Church Missions to Jews) made England the champion of the Jewish missionary cause.

There is an important difference between the earlier missionary enterprise of the Church and evangelical missions of our modern age. It is marked by the difference of spirit which divides the Middle Ages from our own times. Its first characteristic is the new attitude towards the Jewish people and a better understanding of Judaism. Instead of maintaining, as the old Church did, that the Jewish people is utterly rejected by God, it was now recognized that Israel had still a great future. This change was to a large extent effected by the revival of eschatological interest and the intensive, though biased, study of prophecy which accompanied the pietist movement in Germany, and the Evangelical Revival in England. One of the first champions of the prophetic view regarding the Jewish people was William Gouge. A number of tracts dealing with the Jews and their attitude to Christianity appeared in quick succession. The dispute about Jewish disabilities, and the ever growing "prophetic" outlook fixed Christian attention upon the Jewish people. A theology in which the Jews played a vital part came into existence.
The next important feature resultant from the spirit of the New Age was the abandonment of all forms of coercion. This came about only slowly, and reflects the steady advance from Medievalism to modernism. Even Edzard (1329-1703), otherwise a great friend of the Jews, was still under the influence of the medieval point of view. He kept close watch that the Jews complied with all the restrictions imposed upon them by law, which in those days were many. In Hamburg they were only admitted on sufferance and had to promise that they would build no Synagogues and refrain from practising circumcision. Edzard saw to it that these and other restrictions were strictly observed. The authorities, on the other hand, quite in accordance with medieval Christianity, deemed it proper to order Jews to attend sermons in Christian Churches. In Holland, where in the 17th century, there was an unusual interest in missionary work amongst the Jews, John Hoornbeck, though missionary-minded, was still in favour of heavy restrictions. The same may be said of Richard Kidder (1630?-1703), bishop of Bath and Wells, who is described as "more formidable against the unbelieving Jew than the credulous Romanist". Though opposed to the use of force, he advocated a method by which Jews were to be made to listen to sermons. But the spirit of the age was rapidly changing. Christians realised that the only method worthy of Christianity was that of friendly intercourse. A real step towards a warmer and more humane missionary approach was made by the staunch French Protestant, Philippe de Lornay (1549-1623). His book, De veritate religionis, which has seen many translations and editions, breathes a new spirit and forecasts the approach of a new age in the Church's dealing with the Jews. In 1698, Charles Leslie (died 1722) wrote, A Short and Easy Method with the Jews, which in approach and argument is a definite break from the crudity of less enlightened times. But the great pioneer in this direction was Philipp Jacob Spener (1635-1705), who was the first to work out a detailed missionary plan of the Christian approach to the Jews. Its main significance was the renunciation of all forms of coercion. The only methods he approved was that of prayer and the use of the Word of God. Spener himself prayed daily for the conversion of the Jews and firmly believed in their ultimate redemption. It is, however, interesting to note that even Spener only gradually arrived at the conviction that, as Roi puts it, "das gute muss auch auf eine gute Weise vollbracht werden". Spener went so far as to advocate complete freedom for the Jews in the exercise of their own religion. This was an entirely novel idea even for pietistic Germany.

The fact that modern missions to Jews were the outcome of a religious revival such as Pietism in Germany and Methodism in England, with their characteristic emphasis upon personal conviction, had profound influence upon missionary preaching. Whereas in the past, "conversion" in most cases expressed itself in conforming to the dogmas of the Church, the emphasis now was upon personal religious experience. This had immediate effect upon the quality of the converts and the methods of the missionaries. It reduced the number of hypocritical conversions; it also removed the temptation of using unworthy methods on the part of the missionaries. It shifted the Christian witness from learned controversy with the few to the common Jewish people. Mission work was not any more the specialised job of the scholar, but the duty of every professing Christian.

To this must be added another feature which distinctly marks modern missions to Jews from the medieval attempt in this direction. It is the increasing recognition on the part of the Church that Jewish converts must not be segregated from the rest of their people. This is a novel point of view inconceivable to the medieval Church. In the past, the Jewish convert was made to break all ties with his former life. Any retention of Jewish tradition would have been regarded as a lapse from the faith. A man like Paulus of Burgos could say to his son with pride: "nobis ex Levitico sanguine descendentibus", but his attitude to his Jewish brethren was nothing but hostile. He contented himself with remaining an outsider. This was taken for granted both by the Church and the Synagogue. The Church insisted upon complete separation. The recognition that the missionary effort must not aim at "Gentilising" the Jew was an entirely new development.

It has been remarked already that the modern missionary approach is distinguished by a better understanding of Judaism. The older method of ridiculing the Jewish religion has become obsolete. The search for points of contact has rather tended to obscure the deep division which separates the two faiths. The attempt to present the Gospel in terms less alien to the Jewish mind has its inevitable dangers. But however the case may be, the effort at an honest appreciation of Judaism has had a salutary effect upon the whole missionary enterprise. The repeated admonitions by eminent scholars like Franz Delitzsch, Hermann Strack, Gustaf Dalman, G. H. Box, W. O. E. Oesterley, A. Lukyn Williams, who have pressed for a closer study of Judaism, have not been in vain. The result was not only a more adequate presentation of Christianity to Judaism and Judaism to Christianity, but, what is more important, a deeper understanding of the significance of the Gospel. The juxtaposition of Judaism and Christianity has made it clear that the Christian contribution to the Synagogue is not in the sphere of religion or ethics, but in an honest presentation of Jesus Christ. The missionary message has thus become more Christocentric and less doctrinal. The keynote of missionary preaching became a call to discipleship rather than to Church membership. Herein lies the greatest difference between the mediaval and the modern presentation of the Gospel.

The last 150 years have witnessed an evergrowing effort on the part of the Protestant Churches, to evangelise the Jews. At the beginning of this century (1902), Prof. Dalman, in an address delivered in Scotland, said: "The century that has just come to a close has been emphatically one of Jewish missionary work. A great system of missionary stations has been spread over many lands, where Jews are settled. A considerable number of missionaries are at work". Israel Cohen records that at the International Missionary Conferences at Budapest and Warsaw (1927), there were represented 47 societies employing 724 missionary workers at 169 stations, adding: "but these numbers do not by any means comprise the entire of evangelists of all the various Christian denominations and do not include any at all of the Catholic Church". This organised missionary effort testifies to what has been called "the changed heart of the Church", and to the discovery that the Jew can and must be reached with the Gospel message. Thus, the missionary effort once maintained by small groups of pious Christians, is increasingly becoming the concern of the Catholic Church. The above mentioned conferences at Budapest and Warsaw have proposed the creation of a special department working in conjunction with the International Missionary Council. The proposal was discussed and accepted at the meeting of the Council at Jerusalem in 1928, with the result that there is now in existence an International Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews, enjoying the support of all Protestant Churches. This fact is of great significance for the future development in the mission-field.

3. Converts.

To the Synagogue, every Christian convert appears indiscriminately as a traitor. The possibility of conviction is almost entirely ruled out. Geiger, puzzled as to the reasons which led to the conversion of Paul (Rabbi Solomon ha-Levi) of Burgos, could only explain it by his loss of common sense. The more usual explanation, however, is the desire for material gain or social advantage. That such was the case in many instances, nobody can deny. It will be difficult to dispute Mr. Cohen's judgement: "Instances of conversion for conscience' sake may occur, for even Jewry has its mystics; but they are difficult to prove, as the acceptance of baptism is invariably accompanied by a material advantage". The nature of the case lends force to such an allegation. The fact that the converted Jew leaves a despised minority for the camp of the majority is, or appears to be, in itself, an advantage. In countries where religious discrimination prevails, the temptation to leave a persecuted religion is very great, especially in the case of Jews whose attachment to Judaism is only formal. To this must be added the fact that in the past the Jews have suffered considerably at the hands of unscrupulous converts. Rabbi Leo Jung, however, greatly exaggerates when he says: "The Jewish apostates, from Saul who became Paul, have been a source of profound trouble to Jewry. Many became informers, blackmailers, defamers of Jews and Judaism, relentless enemies, who by their machinations and falsifications caused countless massacres, burning of Jews and of Jewish books, exile and other misfortunes". It is difficult to see how Paul the Apostle can be included amongst such traitors. That some converts in the past have behaved treacherously, there is no denying. In some cases, however, enemies of Judaism have been suspected of Jewish origin, without good foundation. Thus, Alfonso de Spina, described by Newman as "one of the inveterate foes of Spanish Jewry", was of pure Spanish origin. To what extent Luther was indebted to converts for his anti-Jewish tracts, is difficult to say. The fact that he quotes Antonius Margaretha's Der ganze jüdische Glaube (1530) and that he was in touch with a few Jewish converts does not explain his sudden change towards the Jewish people. On the other hand, no less an authority than Dr. H. C. Lee, the historian of the Inquisition, observes: "From early times the hardest blows endured by Judaism had always been dealt by its apostate children, whose training had taught them the weakest points to assail, and whose necessity of self-justification led them to attack these mercilessly". Thus it was in the past. In more recent times, however, the attitude of Christian converts has radically changed. This has been frankly admitted by Kaufmann Köhler: "Most modern converts, unlike the apostates of former centuries, have retained in their heart of hearts love for the faith and the history of their nation; and in critical hours many have stepped forth in its defence". Köhler calls them, therefore, יבטים פלך in Rabbinical terminology, such as have yielded to desire, or as he interprets the term: "such as apostatized for personal motives". The fact that amongst those who defended the Jews were sincerely converted men such as Johann August Wilhelm Neander (1789-1850), the great Church historian, the famous Roman Catholic priest Johann Emanuel Veith (1788-1876), Paulus Cassel (1821-1892), Michael Salomon Alexander, (1799-1845), the first Anglican bishop in Jerusalem, who headed the list of protesting Hebrew-Christians in England against the blood libel at Damascus, and many other less prominent Hebrew-Christians, carries little weight with Jewish writers.
The Jewish policy towards Christian converts has remained substantially unchanged. Every member of the community, without regard to the degree of his own religious adherence, is expected to refrain from any form of intercourse with a converted Jew. In this respect, Jewry, though often pleading religious tolerance, is seldom prepared to yield to the same principle. This is true not only of orthodox, but also of reformed and even of Liberal Jews, to a large extent. As always in Judaism, the motives for such action are not purely religious. Baptism has proved the greatest danger to Jewish continued existence. It is the first step towards assimilation. This is borne out by the fact that in spite of the steady flow of Jewish converts to the Christian Church, there has been so far, no Hebrew-Christian tradition possible. Prof. Dalman once remarked: "if all the Jews who have embraced Christianity had remained a distinct people instead of being absorbed by the nations among whom they dwelt, their descendents would now be counted by millions". But Jewish Christians, so far, have not been able to retain their identity. The implications of the Christian faith, with its definite denationalising tendency, the social ostracism on the part of the Jews which invariably leads to intermarriage with Gentiles, and the infallible law that a minority ultimately succumbs to the majority, makes Hebrew-Christian survival a remote possibility. The several millions of "non-Aryans" victimised by the German National Socialist state bear sufficient evidence to the rapidity of the process of assimilation once the religious barriers are removed.

But while Jewry still judges Hebrew-Christianity by past experience, certain developments in the outside world have completely changed the complex of problems associated with conversion to Christianity.
1) Religious discrimination.

The most important change in the structure of social life in Europe was the progressive weakening of the religious factor. In Western Europe, discrimination on religious grounds has largely ceased. Where it exists, it is only as a subterfuge for anti-Semitism. Religious considerations only seldom decide social relations. In Russia where religious pressure upon the Jews was strongest, and where baptised Jews enjoyed special privileges, the religious factor has completely disappeared. There are few countries left where baptism constitutes an advantage.

2) The rise of racial philosophy.

The rise of nationalism in modern Europe was accompanied by a steady growth of anti-Semitism, which reached its final triumph in the race-philosophy of Nazi Germany. Its effects have extended beyond the borders of the Reich and have determined Gentile-Jewish relationship considerably. The racial outlook with its strong appeal to human selfishness, has put the baptised Jew at a definite disadvantage. He finds himself excluded from Gentile society by virtue of his race, and from the Jewish community by virtue of his religion. This is a position which removes every illusion of gain from submission to baptism.

3) The national revival.

The rebirth of Jewish nationalism has strangely affected the outlook of protestant Christianity. Long before political Zionism made its appearance, it was held in evangelical circles on the strength of Old Testament prophecies, that there will finally come a time for Israel's national restoration. The gathering in of the Scattered Nation was an important element in the eschatological scheme in these circles. The appearance of political Zionism was thus followed with keen interest. The attempt to return to Palestine was interpreted by a certain section of the Church as a definite fulfilment of prophecy. This gave a new stimulus to missionary activity and made the Church realise the national coherence of Jewish life. As this coincided with a growing national consciousness in the Gentile-Christian world, especially in Germany, the baptised Jew was not any more expected to break away from his people. On the contrary, it was insisted upon that the convert remains a loyal member of the Jewish nation. It was this new development that made modern Hebrew-Christianity possible.

4) Freedom of conscience.

The right to personal conviction is an acquirement of our modern age. Tribal loyalty militates against the private opinion of the individual. In primitive society, obedience to the religion of the clan was a supreme duty to which every member had to submit. The difference between collectivism and individualism is the difference between savagery and civilization. Owing to the peculiar political situation of Jewry, the survival of a certain tribal strain in Judaism is a fact which cannot be easily denied. Loyalty to the community takes precedence of loyalty to personal conviction. The disintegration, however, of Jewish communal life and the decline of orthodoxy brought the Jew into the stream of modernism where the assertion of the right of the individual is regarded as a sacred duty. In these new circumstances, religious conviction is increasingly becoming the private concern of the individual.

These four factors: the disappearance of religious discrimination and the substitution of racial discrimination, together with the insistence on the part of the Church upon the convert's loyalty to his people and the modern assertion of the right to personal conviction, have fundamentally changed the whole position of the Jewish convert. Whereas in the past, the acceptance of baptism offered a definite advantage, at present it does not. On the contrary, the position of the convert is socially more complex than that of the Jew. On the other hand, those Jews who desire to assimilate themselves to their surroundings and seek the opportunity of intermarriage, may do so, without the inter- mediation of the Church. In countries where civil marriages are not yet sanctioned and intermarriage necessitates the formal acceptance of Christianity, such baptised Jews sink all peculiarities and soon disappear amongst the Gentiles. They can hardly be regarded as "converts" in any real sense.

In the Jewish view, the term Hebrew-Christian is a contradictio in adjecto. One can either be a Jew or a Christian. To be both at the same time is to attempt the impossible. A Jewish writer tells us that "the term 'Jewish-Christian' challenges logic". Another writer restricts the right to existence of Jewish Christians to the time of Primitive Christianity, apart from which they constitute an anachronism. The reason for such a view is twofold: first, it is based upon the conviction that the Jewish people and Judaism form an inseparable unity; secondly: it is held that Christianity is alien to the mental and psychological make-up of the Jews. To some Jewish writers, Hebrew-Christianity suggests either a compromise or a fusion of Judaism and Christianity. Thus, S. S. Cohen tells us that "the past nineteen centuries have shown that such a fusion has been impossible". He adduces proof from Early Christianity to demonstrate that a "dual allegiance is as undesirable in religion as it is in politics".

The confusion arises from the fact that, with the exception of a few representatives of Liberal Judaism, most Jewish writers are not clear in their own mind as to the exact definition of the terms "Jew" and "Judaism". Sometimes, the word "Jew" is given a purely national (or racial) connotation and sometimes a purely religious meaning; sometimes, Judaism is taken to describe the Jewish religion, at other times it is used to describe Jewish civilization, religion included. The position of the Hebrew-Christian depends to some extent on the answer to the question whether a Jew who ceases to practice Judaism still retains his status amongst the Jewish people? In this connection an important passage from an orthodox writer deserves to be quoted: "When some of our brethren reject the authority of the Oral Law, while others refuse even to recognise the authority of the Written Law, when some set aside the Divine precepts out of convenience, and others from principle, and still others from ignorance; when some limit their Judaism to the nominal membership of the Jewish race, and others to a negation of other creeds. Are all these Jews?" Rabbi M. Friedländer replies: "Whatever the answer to this question may be from a practical, political, social and communal point of view, the fact is that they are Jews". This is a correct statement and in accordance with the Rabbinic view that the privilege of belonging to Israel is a birthright: "The Jew is born a Jew", and the fact of birth cannot be annulled. The Hebrew-Christian is thus a Jew, but an apostate Jew. By accepting another allegiance, he has put himself outside the Jewish community. For there cannot be any doubt about the fact that Judaism is a national religion: "Without Jews there would be no Judaism". It is at this point that the Jewish position, measured by Western standards becomes indefensible. Montefiore once said, though in a different connection: "If the Jews are a nation, then it must be possible for the members of that nation to include believers in many creeds, and if Judaism is more than a tribal religion, then it must be possible for the believers of that religion to include members of many nations. With regard to the second half of the quotation, we would say that de jure there is limited room for members of other nations to enter the Jewish community in the form of proselytes; but as to the first half of the sentence, we must say that, "the co-extension of nationality and religion" which Mr. Montefiore deplores of Czarist Russia, is an inherent feature of historical Judaism. The survival of this form of tribalism in the Jewish community is more the result of necessity than choice. In the peculiar political situation in which Jewry finds itself, the sacrifice of personal freedom for the sake of national survival is the only price which makes continued Jewish existence possible. It is a price which all Jews have to pay. It is only from this angle that the problem of the Hebrew-Christian can be properly understood.

Church historians refer generally to Hebrew-Christianity as to a heretical branch of the early Church. It is thus described as the Judaizing movement which sought to bring about a compromise between loyalty to Jesus and loyalty to the Synagogue. Harnack insists that the term "Hebrew-Christianity" may only be limited to those Jews who, because of religious scruples, refused communion with Gentile Christians; thus, Peter, in the second period of his activity ceases to be a Hebrew-Christian. We have already seen, however, that this is too narrow a definition, as it does not describe the whole situation of the Jewish Church. There were Jewish Christians, who, though loyal to the Catholic Church and its doctrine and in full communion with it, yet lived their separate life as the Jewish branch of that Church. Modern Hebrew-Christianity, as we understand it, is a revival of the old tradition. It is therefore necessary that we clearly define the meaning of the term "Hebrew-Christian".

A "Hebrew-Christian", to give sense to the term, must acknowledge himself both a Hebrew and a Christian. It means, that a Jew who accepts baptism with a view to losing his identity is not a Hebrew-Christian, though he may be a Christian. It also means that a Jew who accepts baptism without conviction is not a Hebrew-Christian, but a renegade. Both types are frequently associated with traditional Christianity. There are Jews who have accepted baptism out of conviction, but who refuse to associate with the Jewish people, and do everything to hide their identity. There are also Jews, who have become baptised for other than religious reasons and are obviously not Christians. Thus, the suggestion made by J. Singer that in order to solve the Jewish problem, the Jews should accept baptism, call their Synagogues Churches, their Rabbis Pastors, and themselves Christians; give up the Sabbath for the Sunday and together with it the food restrictions and the Talmud on the conditions that the spirit of pure monotheism be maintained and that these new "Christians" still maintain their national unity until such time when humanity has outgrown all national limitations, is not Hebrew-Christianity, as we understand it. The writer either purposely or out of ignorance, fails to appreciate the gulf that divides the two creeds. He also fails to understand that there is such a phenomenon as Jewish Christians in the truest sense of the word. His assertion that it can be statistically proved that there never was a case of a Jew becoming a Christian out of conviction is more than an exaggeration, it is a misrepresentation of fact.

Whether it is acknowledged by Jewry or not, it is an established fact that there are Jews who believe in Jesus Christ, and who have become members of the Christian Church out of conviction. Biographical notes of such Jews have been collected on the Roman Catholic side by Rosenthal, and on the Protestant side by De la Roi and others. The uprightness, integrity and sincerity of conviction of men like Isaac da Costa, Dr. Abraham Capadose, Prof. A. Neander, Prof. C. P. Caspari, Dr. J. H. Biesenthal, Prof. P. S. Cassel, F. C. Ewald; the great missionaries: Joseph Wolff, Aaron Adolph Saphir; the three Jewish bishops: Alexander, Hellmuth and Schereschewsky; the fine Jewish scholars, Dr. Alfred Edersheim, Isaac E. Salkinson, and a host of others, will not easily be gainsaid. It is not our purpose to provide proof of their conviction. Their lives, their books, and the influence they exerted both upon the Christian Church and the Jewish people is evidence enough. It is, however, our intention to point out that apart from the bond of blood there is a spiritual experience common to all Hebrew-Christians which is the basis of their essential unity. In the centre of this experience is the person of Jesus Christ. The nature of the experience can be described, but cannot be explained. How a Jew becomes a Christian is as much a mystery as how a heathen becomes a Christian, but the fact is that he does. There may be psychological, theological and other causes which effect conversion, but these are secondary. When Paul of Burgos said: "Paulus me ad fidem convertit", he meant that Paul helped him to see Jesus Christ; the object of his faith was not Paul but Jesus. When Rabbi J. Lichtenstein describes his strange experience on first reading the New Testament after having been in possession of the book for 33 years, he does not exalt the lofty idealism of the book, but the person who stands in its centre, namely Jesus the Messiah. A striking case is that of O. V. Aptekman, a young medical student, in the stream of the Nihilist movement in Russia, who, while trying to enlighten a nurse of peasant origin, was himself converted through her witness, and accepted baptism. Nadejda Gorodetzky tells us that he "abandoned a successful university career and went to work under a carpenter, who finally advised him to use his knowledge rather than his hands". The intermediary causes effecting conversion are varied, but the result is always the same: Jesus Christ becomes the object of faith, trust and personal devotion. Many Jews have become believers through reading the New Testament and comparing it with the Messianic predictions in the Old. Others have been led to believe by the humble and quiet witness of Christian friends. There is an instance on record of a Jewess who entered a church "in utter spiritual darkness seeking for Truth", bought a Prayer-Book, and by comparing the Athanasian Creed with the Bible, became converted. There is also the fact that some Jews, who for other than religious motives, have accepted baptism, have later become convinced believers. An interesting case is that of Christlieb von Clausberg (1689-1751), who was knighted by King Christian IV of Denmark and awarded the highest order. In a conversation with missionaries from the Institutum Judaicum, he admitted that he had been a Christian by name for 30 years, and that only now he was beginning to realise the true meaning of the Christian faith. Here must also be mentioned those who never left the synagogue, but who have been convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus. Some of them believed secretly, a few of them, like Rabbi J. Lichtenstein, expressed their views openly, though they never accepted baptism.
Caspari or Edersheim, who have become famous, not only as scholars, but as Christians, there were many humble believers of whom the world knows nothing, but who have faithfully followed their Master. There is the story of the Polish Rabbi Abraham Schwarzenberg, who, after having read some missionary literature and the New Testament became convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus. He first baptised himself and later was baptised by the great Jewish missionary of the London Jews Society, Alex. McCaul, at the age of 64. After baptism he retained his distinctive Jewish garb, "in order to prove to his brethren that no mere worldly motive had induced him to renounce Rabbinism". He gave his few possessions to his son, earning his own living by selling fruit in the streets of Warsaw. He never missed an opportunity of preaching Christ, and distributing missionary literature in the Jewish quarters of the city. Once when the Russian police were beating up a Jewish crowd for mishandling the old man, Schwarzenberg knelt down in the street and would not move until the police left off punishing his enemies. He died in 1842 at the age of 80. An even more remarkable character was the beautiful daughter of Johann Navrazky (or Naferowsky), who became a leading member of the Herrnhuter community. She is the authoress of several well-known hymns, notably the hymn: "Herr, auf den so viele Juden hoffen". Roi tells us that she is still remembered amongst the Brethren by the name of Esther. Many Hebrew-Christians were not only greatly honoured in the Churches to which they belonged, but have been held in esteem amongst their former co-religionists. Of S. S. Jacobsohn (1810-1871), a devoted missionary of the Berliner Judenmission, it is said, that even the Jews had to admit "er sei aus Überzeugung Christ geworden".

But Hebrew-Christianity to deserve its name, must not only express the religious conviction of certain Jews, but must also imply a positive attitude towards the Jewish people. It is here that the vast difference between the modern Hebrew-Christian and the baptised Jew of the Middle Ages appears. Modern Hebrew-Christianity is impelled by a desire to remain loyal to the Jewish people, so long as such loyalty does not clash with its religious convictions. It is essentially a movement towards the Jewish people and is marked by the effort to find a place in its life.

5. The Hebrew-Christian position.

The Hebrew-Christian problems are in some ways similar to those of other converts. They, too, are struggling to build up a tradition, to adapt themselves to the new circumstances, and to create for themselves an atmosphere of trust amongst those whom they have left behind and also amongst those whom they have joined. But owing to the difficult position in which the Jewish people has been destined to live, the Hebrew-Christian problem shows peculiar features of its own. While in the heathen mission field the issue between the converts and the rest of the people is mainly of a religious nature, though the tribal element is by no means absent, in the case of the Jewish convert, it is both religious and national, but mainly national. The reason for this is, first, because the religious element does not any more dominate Jewish life as it did in the past; secondly, because the Jewish people is at present witnessing a surge of nationalism; and thirdly, because the Jews, as a minority struggling for survival, react more intensely at any attempt of surrender to the opposite camp.

The second consideration in estimating the position of the Hebrew-Christian is his relationship with the Gentile world. Baptism cuts him off from the communal life of his own people.
He becomes a member of a Gentile Church. He comes to it as a stranger (and herein lies the main difference between the heathen convert's position and the Jewish convert; in the case of the heathen, it is the missionary who is the stranger and the convert the indigene), brought up against a different background, and in a different atmosphere. His first problem is that of adaptation. But the decline of religious life in the Western world, and the intensity of nationalist sentiment, so characteristic of the present age, makes the process of adaptation more than difficult. The Jewish convert finds not only a divided Church, but also an intensely nationalist Church. In such an atmosphere, the stranger feels ill at ease. To make it worse, the influence of the Church is rapidly diminishing, the vast multitude of religiously indifferent Gentiles look with suspicion upon a man who left the faith of his fathers for a religion in which they themselves have ceased to believe. To them, he is still a Jew and a bad Jew at that. To the average Gentile, therefore, the Hebrew-Christian appears as an interloper, who has trafficked with his soul in order to gain some social advantage. The natural reaction on the part of the Jewish convert is an attempt to find a way back to his own people. It is the struggle for a place in Jewish life which marks modern Hebrew-Christianity in contradistinction to the baptised Jews of the past who moved in the opposite direction.

a) The Hebrew-Christian and the Jewish people.

Schwarzenberg, the old Polish Rabbi, who accepted baptism at the advanced age of 64, by his behaviour and attitude, may be styled the Father of modern Hebrew-Christianity. To quote his own words: "The Jews often think that persons are baptised in order to escape reproach, or to live in Christian quarters of the city, or to walk in the "Saxon Garden" (from which Polish Jews were then excluded), but I will show them that none of these things move me. I am a Jew still—formerly I was an unbelieving Jew, but now I am a believing Jew, and, whatever inconvenience or reproach may result, I wish to bear it with my brethren". In order to prove his words, he refused to shave his beard, or to change his dress and continued to live in the midst of his people. On this account he was denounced before the police, being accused of "Judaising habits". He wittily defended himself before the magistrate, saying that Christ's command was not to baptise the clothes, but the heart.

But the outstanding figure in the history of Hebrew-Christianity is Joseph Rabinowitsch (1837-1899), the head of Jewish-Christian community in Kishineff (Bessarabia), called "Israelites of the New Covenant".

The importance of the movement initiated by Rabinowitsch lay in that it was Catholic, as far as Christian doctrine was concerned, and Jewish at the same time. Herein lies Rabinowitsch's greatest achievement. There were other leading men in Hebrew-Christianity, notably C. Theophil Lucky of Stanisławów, and Jechiel Zebi Lichtenstein (Herschensohn) of Leipzig, who have united faith in Jesus the Messiah with a profound love for the Jewish people. But their over-emphasis of Jewish tradition made them suspect of Judaistic tendencies. We have, however, the authority of Prof. Franz Delitzsch and Prof. G. Dalman vouching for the orthodoxy of Rabinowitsch's views.

Joseph Rabinowitsch was singularly fitted for his task. He had a winning personality, a warm heart, a deep religious disposition and a great love for his people. As a speaker, he made a singular appeal to the Jews. Roi says of him: "Seine Sprache erinnert vielfach an die Propheten, alles in derselben ist überdem original, nichts gemacht. Geist und Gemüt fühlen sich gleichmässig von ihm angezogen; er spricht in Tönen der Liebe und Freundlichkeit, die etwas Bezauberndes haben". Rabinowitsch spoke Hebrew fluently and was contributor to the Hebrew periodical Hameleitz and the Yiddish journal Kol-Mebasser, both edited by his friend Alexander Zederbaum. He joined early the haskalah movement and in the controversy which followed Jacob Prelooker's tracts advocating a drastic reform of Judaism, Rabinowitsch sided with the latter.

But while Prelooker's programme for his "Novy Israel" (New Israel), was an eclectic religion consisting of all the best elements of all existing religions, Rabinowitsch's spiritual development led him into fellowship with Christ.

Rabinowitsch was deeply concerned about the welfare of his people. Russian Jewry at that time was groaning under the oppressive hand of the Czarist régime. Many Jews realised that they needed both a social and religious reform. Rabinowitsch himself advocated in an article in the Hebrew Journal "Ha-Boker Or", a drastic reform of the Rabbinate and the Jewish return to agriculture. In Elizabethgrad the "Bible Brotherhood" (Bibleitzy) came into existence, founded by Jacob Gordin in 1879. They were recruited mainly from the working class and one item of their programme was the repudiation of the Talmud and of the Jewish ceremonial law. The movement had in view an approachement to the Greek Orthodox Church. The outburst of pogroms in Odessa in 1871 and the defeat of France in 1870 combined to disillusion those Jews who staked their hope upon the progress of humanity and the triumph of liberalism. Rabinowitsch became an ardent supporter of the early Zionist movement in Russia and went to Palestine. But even here, he found no peace, until he came to the conviction that Jesus Christ holds the key to the Jewish problem. Decisive for Rabinowitsch's future became a copy of a Hebrew New Testament handed him by his youthful friend Jechiel.
Zebi Herschensohn, the later missionary Lichtenstein. In later years, Delitzsch's translation of the New Testament became his inspiration and guide. Delitzsch said of him: "Rabinowitsch lives and moves in our Hebrew version of the New Testament". His motto became: "Jesus our Brother".

Rabinowitsch, on his return from Palestine, published his 13 theses addressed to Russian Jewry, in which he put forth his faith in the Messiahship of Jesus. He soon gained adherents in Kishineff and in other Bessarabian towns. In 1865 he published his Hebrew-Christian Creed, consisting of seven articles. Prof. Franz Delitzsch was deeply interested in the movement, and admits that the confession of Faith which Rabinowitsch has drawn up, "exhibits throughout a familiar acquaintance with and conformity to the Church's symbols". In fact, it is almost a paraphrase of the Apostolic Creed with an emphasis upon justification through faith, forgiveness of sin through baptism and the resurrection from the dead. But Rabinowitsch, though strongly repudiating the Talmud, maintained his Jewish right to national customs, and even thought it necessary to retain the rite of circumcision. He advocated the keeping of the Sabbath, giving to it no religious, but only national significance. To the end of his life, he remained a warm nationalist.

The remarkable thing about the Kishineff movement was that it originated from within Jewry itself without outside help. Rabinowitsch's influence expanded wide over the Russian Empire as far as Siberia. Seldom were such masses of Jews reached by the Gospel message. Rabinowitsch managed, Roi says: "Jesum aus der Peripherie in das eigentliche Centrum des jüdischen Lebens zu stellen". Though the Russian government refused his request to allow the establishment of a Hebrew-Christian community, such a community came actually into existence. Opposition on the part of Jewry was fierce. Rabinowitsch met with hostility on every side. After his death the movement began to disintegrate. Thus Rabinowitsch, of whom Roi says that he was a Jew "an dem jede Faser jüdisch ist und bleibt", found himself pushed out from Jewish life and his dream remained unrealised. The terrible pogrom in Kishineff, on Easter Day, 1903, must have helped considerably to undo Rabinowitsch's work.

Rabinowitsch's importance for the future missionary policy of the Church cannot be overestimated. Though it had been realised before that the Gospel ought to be brought to the Jews in more congenial terms, the issue as to the Christian approach was brought to a head by the leader of the Hebrew-Christian community in Kishineff. Rabinowitsch reserved himself the right to give to his faith his own specific Jewish expression, though affirming his membership of the Catholic Church. He naturally met with opposition and there were some who suspected the reappearance of heretical Hebrew-Christianity. But in the end he triumphed. The most enlightened section of the protestant Church stood by him. In the venerable Prof. Franz Delitzsch, Rabinowitsch found a great and sympathetic friend. The question concerning a Hebrew-Christian Church and a Hebrew-Christian liturgy, raised by G.H. Box, C. J. Ball and others, was largely due to the influence and example of this remarkable man. The subject has been repeatedly discussed ever since. Box suggested the creation of a liturgy "which should be at once both Jewish and Christian". For this purpose he proposed that a Hebrew-Christian Liturgiological Society be formed "with a view to formulating out of existing material:

a) a Hebrew-Christian Prayer-Book

b) a Hebrew-Christian Liturgy (Communion Office)"

The Bishop of Salisbury suggested the creation of a special Saturday evening Service to usher in the Lord's day, corresponding to the Friday evening service of the Synagogue. Bishop Pop-ham Blyth, in an article on the revival of the Church of the Hebrews, expressed the view that "the Jew cannot, by the Missionary distinction imposed by Christ, be incorporated into any Gentile form of Christianity." G. H. Box, one of the most enthusiastic propagators of a Hebrew-Christian branch within the Catholic Church, worked out a tentative form of Evensong "for the use of Hebrew-Christians on the Eve of the Lord's Day". Even Canon Hastings Kelk, who opposed the idea of a distinct Hebrew-Christian Church, advocated the formation of Hebrew-Christian congregations and admitted that allowances ought to be made for "Jewish idiosyncracies, manners and customs". The matter was discussed at the Budapest-Warsaw conference of 1927 and at the Atlantic City Conference of 1931, but without much result. The greatest difficulty involved is that at present, owing to Diaspora-life, the Hebrew-Christians belong to a multitude of denominations which creates the danger of a Church coming into existence with branches "as numerous and variegated as all the rest of the Church combined".

Amongst Hebrew-Christians themselves, opinions are divided.
P. P. Levertoff, Morris Zeidman of Canada, and others hold that a Hebrew-Christian Church is the only solution of the social prob lem which the Jewish Christian has to face on the Jewish and the Gentile fronts. Others, like Pastor Christlieb T. Lipshy tz, hold an opposite opinion. The reasons which Lipshy tz gives against a Hebrew-Christian Church deserve attention. They are:
1) The content of the Christian faith is independent of a distinct national consciousness; 2) The present economy is that of the (universal) Church; 3) The Jewish national consciousness is the consciousness of a people which has rejected Jesus Christ.
Many hold, and with good reason, that a Hebrew-Christian Church in the Dispersion is an utter impossibility. A native Hebrew-Christian Church can only come into existence under conditions of independent national life. This is increasingly being recognised by both Gentiles and Jews. Canon Hastings Kelk has already argued that the conditions for a Hebrew-Christian Church "are a Hebrew-Christian people, and a land in which they are the supreme authority." 153 In a recent article, Mr. H. Poms, a Hebrew-Christian, has clearly recognised that the whole Hebrew Christian movement depends upon the national reestablishment of Jewish life. Without the existence of a real Jewish nation, Hebrew-Christianity hangs in the air. 259 On the Jewish side, it is admitted that owing to the political changes taking place in Palestine "a revival of the Judeo-Christian phenomenon is not impossible." 260

As long as the state of Dispersion lasts, a Hebrew-Christian Church appears to be not only impracticable, but also undesirable. For the creation of such a Church would be the first step towards the establishment of a new denomination. The existence of a distinctive national Church is conditioned by geographical and linguistic limitations, otherwise it is a sect and not a branch of the Church Catholic. No such limitations exist in the diaspora. To create a Hebrew-Christian Church in the Dispersion would be an admission that the middle-wall of partition between Jew and Gentile still exists. There is and there must be room for the scattered Jewish Christians in the universal Church of Christ. 261 But there is a further point which calls for attention. It is sometimes argued that only the existence of a Hebrew-Christian Church will overcome Jewish suspicion and remove the accusation that baptism leads to assimilation. This is the main line of Philip Cohen's book, The Hebrew-Christian and his national Continuity. "Our contention, therefore is", says Mr. Cohen, "that if Christianity is to become a lasting and conquering power among Israel, it must lose its Gentile form and colour, and it must become as much a Hebrew religion to the Hebrews as the Protestant religion is English to the English, German to the German, etc". But so far, history has proved that no attempt on the part of the Hebrew-Christian to force his way into Jewish life has been successful. Neither Rabinowitsch, nor Salkinson, nor Levertoff, have been admitted into Jewish society. The precarious position of J. Lichtenstein was due to the fact that he had never accepted baptism. Roi says that Rabinowitsch had shown to his people: "wie gerade der Jude alles in Christo zu seinem Ziele kommen sieht, was ihm heilig, gross und teuer ist". But the fact remains that his efforts were depreciated and his name slandered. Neither Rabinowitsch's love for his people, nor Salkinson's mastery of Hebrew, nor Levertoff's admiration for Jewish mysticism, have won them a place in Jewry.

b) The Hebrew-Christian in the Gentile Church.

When Hans Herzl, the son of the great Zionist leader, after having become a Roman Catholic, committed suicide, Prof. Einstein is supposed to have remarked: "This shows the terrible danger, of cutting oneself off from the Community". Perhaps more correctly, the great scientist ought to have said "of being cut off from the Community". However, this is the first and greatest problem the Hebrew-Christian has to face the moment his baptism becomes known amongst other Jews. Together with the expulsion from community-life, arises the economic problem. The individual Jew is to such an extent dependant on the community, especially where Jews live in larger groups together; that severance from it spells economic ruin. This has been and still is the greatest deterrent to an open profession of faith. In order to remedy the situation, the Christian Church felt it its duty to offer help to those who have thus suffered for their faith. The reluctance to offer such help, Eisenmenger includes amongst the reasons why so few Jews are converted.266

The necessity of offering help to many converts is naturally a source of great danger and raises grave problems. First, it provides the Jews with the standard accusation of the use of bribery. This is a widely spread view amongst the Jewish people. There was hardly a convert who had not to face it. Even Rabbi Lichtenstein, who had formally never left the Synagogue, was constantly accused of having been bribed by the missionaries.267 Israel Cohen, following the mathematical calculations of Kaufmann Kohler, alleges that it cost the London Jews Society in 1894, between £600 and £3,000 to make a single convert.268 Secondly, it has a demoralising effect even upon sincere believers in that it makes them rely upon other people's help. Thirdly, it is apt to attract unworthy men who are willing to barter their religion for material advancement. Nothing has done greater harm to the name of Hebrew-Christian and to the missionary cause among Jews, than the presence of such individuals. Lastly, it constitutes an additional burden upon the Christian community and also tends to degrade the convert in the eyes of the Gentile Christian.

In the Middle Ages, the economic position of the Jewish convert was even more aggravated by the custom of depriving him on his baptism of all his property. The reason for this lay in the fact that Jewish property belonged to the king, who stood in danger of losing it once the Jew became a Christian.269 The establishment of the Domus Conversorum in London by Henry III in 1232, may have been an effort to compensate in some measure the material loss, but its prime purpose was to encourage those who were inclined to accept Christianity by assuring them of shelter and food. The expenses were mainly borne by the royal treasury with the help of gifts from pious Christians, though the Jewish community had to contribute towards it. In more recent times, the idea of a similar home for converts was conceived by Johann Philipp Fresenius. He was the founder of such a home in Darmstadt in 1738, which, however, had a very short history, for it discontinued after Fresenius left the place to take up a professorship at Giessen. As the missionary zeal of the Protestant Churches increased and the number of converts grew, their situation became more and more difficult. The Jewish community refused them every aid, and the Christians stood aloof. Many of these converts were wandering about with their baptismal certificates in their hands as evidence of their "conversion", begging. The Herrnhüter Brethren were amongst the first to extend help and encouragement to Jewish converts. The missionary Societies felt it their duty to remedy the situation and various plans were conceived and executed, with a view to bringing material and spiritual help to Hebrew-Christians.

Already in the early days of the London Jews Society, a weaving shop, a small printing press and other branches of industry were created in order to provide employment for Hebrew-Christians. But these were short-lived. Later other institutions were created, notably an industrial establishment in Palestine for training converts in carpentry and joinery, inaugurated in 1843. It soon developed into a Home and a workshop "in which the converts and enquirers were housed, maintained, and instructed in Christianity, during the time they were learning a trade." Similar homes for Jewish enquirers were founded by the Rev. Ridley Haim Herschell, the father of the Lord Chancellor, also by another Hebrew-Christian, Erasmus H. Simon at Campden Town. A much more ambitious plan was conceived by Adelbert Graf von der Recke-Volmerstein. It consisted of creating a seminary for Hebrew-Christians as future missionaries and a home for Jews who wanted to be baptised. This was to be the nucleus of a future Hebrew-Christian colony. A similar idea was conceived by Dr. H. Lhotzky, the assistant missionary to Pastor Fal-tin in Bessarabia. He purposed to establish an agricultural settlement, where Jewish enquirers and Hebrew-Christians could work together on the soil. He was encouraged by the fact that German farmers had already employed at various times Hebrew-Christians in farm work. Lhotzky rented a piece of ground of 200 morgen at Strembeni-Oneshti, in 1886, for the period of 12 years. Dr. Lhotzky himself, assisted by an experienced farmer, stood at the head of the establishment. Seven young Jews and two Jewish families were settled on the farm. Unfortunately, the Russian authorities intervened, as there was a law prohibiting Jewish settlement upon land. Only the baptised members of the colony were allowed to stay, the others were dragged back to the town like criminals. Finally, the project had to be given up. The establishment of an agricultural colony in Palestine was seriously contemplated by the London Jews Society, though its main purpose was to help the distressed Jews who were at that time fleeing from Russian persecution. The moving spirit behind the enterprise was a missionary of the Society, a Hebrew- Christian, Hermann Friedlander. For this purpose, in 1883, The Refugees' Aid Society was founded under the patronage of the Earl of Aberdeen, with the result that 1,250 acres of land were purchased to the south-west of Jerusalem, and a number of families settled. Unfortunately this plan, too, met with little success, for various reasons. In many other ways, the London Jews Society has tried to help Jewish converts. The "Operative Jewish Converts' Institution", an establishment for teaching converts and candidates for baptism printing and book-binding was founded in 1829 by the great friends of the society, Simeon, Marsh, Hawtrey and Sir G. H. Rose. This institution, originally established in Palestine Place, was later transferred to Hackney. It continued for a number of years and proved a great help in giving employment and shelter to many Jewish Christians. There was also in existence the Jewish Converts' Relief Fund for the purpose of helping Jewish Christians in distress.

The economic problem connected with the open profession of the Christian faith is still one which frightens many Jewish believers. On the other hand, missionary societies are unable to make themselves responsible for the upkeep of converts unless they are prepared to deteriorate into philanthropical institutions. Many believing Jews, therefore, have been refused baptism, until their economic position was secured. Thus, following the work of Pastor Paltin in Kishineff, so many Jews offered themselves for baptism, that only the unmarried could be accepted because of the impossibility of providing support for the others. This policy has been followed by other missionary societies where it is increasingly recognized that philanthropic activity is no solution of the problem.

c) The Hebrew-Christian Alliance.

The Hebrew-Christian Alliance grew out of an effort on the part of Hebrew-Christians themselves to solve some of their difficulties. It is not a union of baptised Jews, but of Jewish Christians. The rules laid down by the Hebrew-Christian Alliance of Great Britain, require therefore of its members, 1) public confession of their faith in Jesus Christ; 2) the acknowledgement of Jesus Christ as personal Saviour and Redeemer; 3) faith in the Atonement and vicarious suffering wrought upon the Cross; 4) faith in Christ's Divinity and Resurrection; 5) adherence to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the supreme rule of faith and life. Its first aim is to foster a spirit of fellowship and co-operation among Hebrew-Christians throughout the world.

The beginnings of the Hebrew-Christian Alliance go back to 1813, when the first Hebrew-Christian Association, under the name of יהודים 'ל was formed in the Jews' Chapel, London, with a membership of 41. They undertook to meet for prayer twice a week, to attend Divine Service, to visit sick members, etc.

Carl Schwartz, a Hebrew-Christian, originally from Poland, and sometime missionary of L. J. S., was the first to conceive the idea of a Hebrew-Christian Alliance on a wider scale, which he organized in 1866. But a more immediate connection with the present Hebrew-Christian Alliance is to be found in the Hebrew-Christian Prayer Union, which came into existence in 1882, largely due to the exertions and devoted service of the Rev. J. B. Barraclough, Chaplain to Palestine Place until 1891. "Its objects were the promotion of unity, piety, and brotherly feeling amongst Jewish converts, by means of mutual prayer and religious intercourse. The first president of the Union was the veteran missionary, H. A. Stern. Each member pledged himself to pray for the Union every Saturday. On the Day of Atonement, a meeting was arranged to offer prayer for the salvation of the Jewish people. In 1886, 393 Hebrew Christians belonged to the Union; later the number rose to 536, and in 1890, 600 members were on the list, amongst whom were the names of the two Jewish bishops Hellmuth and Schereschewski, and outstanding Hebrew-Christians like A. Saphir, P. Cassel, Herschell Lukcy, Margoliouth, Rabinowitsch, Schönberger, etc. Branches of the Union were formed in Germany, Norway, Roumania, Russia, Palestine and the United States.

In America there came into existence a Hebrew-Christian Alliance in 1915. Representatives of the American Alliance and the Hebrew-Christian Prayer Union in Great Britain issued a joint appeal inviting Hebrew-Christians of all countries to an International Conference, which took place at Islington, London, on Sept. 5th-12th, 1925. The outcome of this conference was the formation of an International Hebrew-Christian Alliance. A resolution carried unanimously read: "That we Hebrew-Christians from different parts of the world standing for the Evangelical Faith now met in Conference, reaffirm our living faith in the Lord Jesus as our Messiah and our oneness in Him; and do hereby declare that we now form ourselves into an International Hebrew-Christian Alliance." The late Samuel Schor was its first president, and he was followed by the late Sir Leon Levison of Edinburgh.

The spiritual and material welfare of scattered Hebrew-Christians has remained the main concern of the International Hebrew-Christian Alliance whose president is now the veteran missionary, the Rev. A. Frank, D.D., formerly of Hamburg. The official organ of the Alliance is a quarterly magazine called the Hebrew Christian.

The importance of the International Hebrew-Christian Alliance lies, not only in the valuable service it renders to individual Hebrew-Christians in need. It strives to promote the sense of unity amongst the scattered Hebrew-Christian members and to encourage their Christian witness to their own people. It presents the Hebrew-Christian cause to the Gentile Church and a united front before the Jewish people. By keeping together, Hebrew-Christians demonstrate to the Jews that they are determined, as far as in them lies, to maintain their loyalty to their own people.
The existence of the International Hebrew-Christian Alliance refutes the notion that Christianity is a purely Gentile prerogative.

d) Hebrew-Christian influence.

The Jew in the Dispersion, on becoming a Christian, naturally enters one of the existing Gentile Churches. Owing to the divisions within Christendom, the choice which denomination to join is not an easy one. Rabinowitsch was determined to become a member of the Church Catholic and not of one particular Christian denomination. On the 24th March, 1885, he was, therefore, baptised in the Bohemian Church in Berlin, by Prof. Mead of Andover, America; but that was all he could do. Most Jews, however, join the denomination either of the mission where they were converted or the National Church of the country in which they live. Many of them have assimilated themselves to a remarkable degree to the theological outlook of their particular Church. Others have only superficially accepted a denominational colouring, remaining strangers to its traditional past. In an anonymous article, an Anglican High Churchman, obviously a Gentile, complains bitterly of the "Undenominationalism" of the Hebrew-Christian Alliance and Prayer Union. The writer reasons as follows: "If a Jew is converted as a Plymouth Brother, he must remain a Plymouth Brother, if he is sincerely convinced that that form of faith be the true one; to pretend to be in communion with the Church would be hypocrisy on his part, because the Church teaches as vital truths things which a Plymouth Brother regards as utterly unnecessary; the same applies to members of each of the sects." This gives some indication of the convert's position within the Church of his choice. He is naturally expected to identify himself with the theology, tradition and mode of life of the community.
From the foregoing, it is obvious that there can be no question of a distinctive Hebrew-Christian contribution to the life of the Gentile Church. This can only be possible when there comes into existence a Hebrew-Christian branch, living its free and independent life. The important influence exerted by converts from Judaism upon the Church was only due to their remarkable ability at adaptation. Their greatness lay in the fact that in spite of their Jewish descent, they managed to attain positions of prominence. They acted not as Hebrew-Christians, but as typical representatives of each particular Church. Thus, Neander represents the orthodox Lutheran view, and Dr. Ludwig Jacoby that of a typical Methodist.

The Hebrew-Christian contribution to the life of the Church was mainly in two directions: within the sphere of theology and in the mission field.

1. Theology.

There is no Hebrew-Christian theology or school of thought, nor can there be, considering the circumstances. But individual Hebrew-Christians have made important contributions to learning, especially in the Protestant Church. It is a remarkable fact that the greatest Hebrew-Christian names are associated with a vigorous affirmation of orthodoxy. Only seldom have Jewish Christians moved in the opposite direction. This is the more noteworthy as it is frequently held that the Jews are a revolutionary element in every movement.

One of the most outstanding Hebrew-Christians was undoubtedly the great orientalist and translator of the Scriptures, Emmanuel Tremellius (1510–1580). His importance as a biblical scholar in the Reformation period cannot be overlooked. He produced a Syriac New Testament with a Latin translation, to which he added a Syriac and Chaldee grammar. He also wrote a Hebrew grammar, a "Hebrew Catechism", and a commentary on the Prophecy of Hosea. But his greatest work is the celebrated Latin translation of the Bible published in 1575 with the help of Francis Junius. The Real. Encycl. für protest. Theol. und Kirche says with good reason that Tremellius was "ein bekannter Theologe und hervorragender Kenner der Hebräischen Sprache". He is looked upon as one of the most learned scholars in oriental languages of his time.\(^{29}\)

Tremellius had an adventurous life and took an active part in the Reformation movement. He held the chair of Hebrew at various universities on the Continent and was for a short time professor of the Old Testament at Cambridge. Together with his great friend Vermilius, he came to England, following an invitation by Cranmer. He helped with the framing of the 39 Articles and the compilation of the Book of Common Prayer. It is thus of special interest that a Jew had some part in the doctrinal and liturgical constitution of the Anglican Church.

Two other Hebrew-Christians belonging to the same period deserve to be mentioned, though their importance is entirely confined to the field of Biblical scholarship. Johannes Isaac Levita Germanus (1515-77), who strangely enough, though originally baptised in the Protestant Church, became a Roman Catholic and was appointed professor of Hebrew at Cologne. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar, and edited Maimonides' work on astrology and Moses ibn Tibbon's commentary on Aristotle's physics. Matthaeus Hadriamus, the other Hebrew-Christian, a man of great scholarship was highly praised for his learning by Erasmus, Reuchlin and Luther.\(^{29}\) In the field of Biblical scholarship and the Hebrew language, converted Jews have made valuable contributions. Charles Singer points out that of the four Latin Christians in the Middle Ages who have left any written records to show their Hebrew scholarship, one was probably, and the other certainly (viz. Paul of Burgos) a converted Jew. To mention a more recent name, Christian David Ginsburg (1831-1914), is looked upon as "one of the greatest biblical scholars of his day". His massoretic studies have made an important contribution to the fixation of the Hebrew text.

Perhaps the man to whom the Protestant Church owes most was the remarkable scholar Jacob ben Chayim ibn Adonyah (died 1537), who was employed by the famous printer Daniel Bomberg and "who was mainly responsible for the editio princeps of the Rabbinic Bible, and wrote the Introduction to it". There is some reason to suppose that he became a Christian. It was the Hebrew Bible which stood in the centre of the Reformation movement and the scientific publication of the Massoretic text still in use was mainly due to the labours of this great scholar. Another Hebrew Christian who worked for Bomberg was Felix Pratensis, the editor of the Biblia Veneta (Venice, 1418).

It is unnecessary to enumerate all the Jewish Christians, many of whom were fine Hebrew scholars, and not a few of them, teachers at various European universities, but one more name deserves special mention. A man of great prominence of whom Delitzsch spoke as being an ornament to the Christian Church, was Moses de Krakovia, who, after his conversion, assumed the name of John Kemper (died 1714). He taught Judaica at the university of Upsala and is the author of some works dealing with subjects related to the Sohar. He also translated the New Testament, and wrote notes.

It is a remarkable fact that in the age of growing rationalism, some Hebrew-Christians rank as the foremost defenders of orthodoxy. On the Roman Catholic side, one of the most representative Jewish Christians, was undoubtedly, Dr. Theodor Kohn, the archbishop of the ancient see of Olmütz. Kohn was an expert on Roman law, and an energetic defender of the faith. But as an apologetic writer for positive Christianity, Don Juan Josef Heydeck is an unique phenomenon in the Roman Church. His work, Defensa de la religion Christiana, 3 vols., Madrid, 1792, is designed to refute the attacks upon Christianity by Voltaire, Rousseau and others. Both Abraham Capadose and Isaac Da Costa, have been greatly helped by this work.

On the Protestant side, there are several great Hebrew-Christian names, especially in Germany. Foremost amongst them is Prof. August Neander, who stood firmly on the ground of positive Christianity. Neander became professor at the Berlin university at the early age of 23, and for many years he exercised an amazing spiritual influence upon German youth. It was largely thanks to the example and teaching of this noble Hebrew-Christian that Germany witnessed a new spiritual revival. Roy boldly asserts, and with good reason: "Dass es in diesem Jahrhundert auf den deutschen Universitäten zu einem neuen Erwachen des Glaubenslebens kam, ist ihm (i.e. Neander) in besonderem Maasse zu verdanken".

As a thinker, Neander combined Schleiermacher's theology with the warmth of personal conviction and nobility of character. His favourite motto reveals the importance of the personal element in his theological thinking: Pectus est quod theologum facit. The Encycl. Brit. says of him: "He rested with a secure footing on the great central truths of Christianity". As a church historian, he had an amazing grasp of his subject and a good psychological understanding of the intricacies of human nature, the decisive factor in historical events. Neander has written much and on many subjects, but experts regard his great work, Die Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Religion und Kirche, 5 Vols., (the 6th vol. was edited posthumously by K. F. Th. Schneider), as of epoch-making importance.
In answer to Strauss', Leben Jesu, Neander wrote, Das Leben Jesu Christi in seinem geschichtlichen Zusammenhange u. seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung dargestellt, 1837. The finest evidence of his deep conviction is afforded by his noble behaviour with regard to Strauss' book. Answering a request by the Prussian authorities with a view to suppressing the book, Neander advised that the only way of procedure was to answer the challenge in a scientific manner. Neander was convinced that scholarly research would in the end overcome Strauss' evidence and help to confirm the Christian faith.305

Another Jewish Christian whose influence was perhaps more perceptible, but less profound, was Friedrich Julius Stahl (1802-1861), a great leader in German politics and a convinced and firm Christian.

Stahl was the founder of the German Conservative Party and its leader in the Prussian Upper House. Kohut regards him, with some justification, as the father of the German national-Christian philosophy for which he fought all his life.306 Both, as a political leader, and as professor of law at Erlangen, Würzburg, but chiefly at Berlin, he exercised immense influence upon German life. In the opinion of some, he is held to have had a more lasting influence, and to have been possessed of greater political skill than Disraeli.307 He was, perhaps, the most ardent defender of Lutheran orthodoxy of his time, and as such he opposed Hegel's philosophy, stressing the importance of Revelation above reason. There is a consistent apologetic strain in defence of orthodox Christianity in all his numerous writings. He is the author of the famous sentence: "Die Wissenschaft muss umkehren". Stahl betrays his Jewish upbringing by his characteristic insistence upon Christianity pervading the totality of human life, refusing to distinguish between Church and State.

In this connection, the names of Friedrich Adolf Philippi (1809-1882), professor of theology at Rostock; Karl Paul Caspari (1814-1892), professor of theology at Christiania; and last but not least, the Dutch poet Isaac Da Costa, deserve our mention.

Philippi was an ardent defender of the Church, and his "Glaubenslehre" (1853) became a standard work of Lutheran theology. Roi says of him: "seinem Einflusse war es besonders zu verdanken, dass dem Rationalismus im Grossherzogtum ein Ende bereitet wurde". Caspari enjoyed great esteem in Norway and is still known as an outstanding Old Testament scholar. He was held to be one of the most learned Lutheran theologians of his time. Da Costa occupies a unique position in Dutch literature, both as a poet and as a theologian. The Encycl. Brit. affirms that "da Costa ranked first among the poets of Holland after the death of Bilderdijk." But besides poetry, he has written many books on theological and missionary subjects. His outlook was definitely Calvinistic and he exerted a decisive influence upon the Reformed Church of Holland. From the day of his baptism (1822) to the end of his life, he remained a faithful champion of orthodox Christianity.

2. Mission work.

The greatest contribution Hebrew-Christians have made to the life of the Church is undoubtedly in the sphere of missionary activity, especially in the Jewish field. The remarkable array of great missionaries within the short period of scarcely a hundred years, is an unique phenomenon in the history of missions. The often asserted view that the Jewish people is specially gifted for mission work finds some support in the fact that many of the converts have proved to be missionaries of outstanding quality. However the case may be, the missionary zeal on the part of many leading Hebrew-Christians is more than a "necessity for self-justification", as Dr. H. C. Lee would suggest. The position of many of those Hebrew-Christians who showed sincere concern with the spiritual welfare of their own people, was such, that self-justification on their part was unnecessary. What need for self-justification could there be for men like Da Costa, Caspari or Adolf Janasz? The fact that men like these showed so much zeal and self-sacrifice in their missionary endeavour, ought to caution Jewish writers in indiscriminately condemning all Jewish missionaries as opportunists.

The father of modern missions to Jews is undoubtedly Christian Friedrich (Joseph Samuel) Frey (1771-1851). He was the prime mover in the establishment of the London Jews Society (1809).
A. Furst says convincingly: "Hätte er weiter nichts in seinem Leben vollbracht, als die London Society ins Leben zu rufen, so verdient er schon deshalb den Dank und Ruhm der christgläubigen Nachwelt..." Frey's importance in the history of Jewish missionary work cannot be overestimated. Roi, who is not given to exaggeration says of him: "Für die Geschichte der Judenmission bleibt er eine der wichtigsten Persönlichkeiten denn er ist der eigentliche Vater des heutigen Missionswerkes". It was Frey who conceived the plan for the creation of a Society which was destined to become the stronghold of all missionary work among the Jews. Thanks to Frey's remarkable tenacity and perseverance against many difficulties, the plan of an independent Society was ultimately crowned with success. In his far-sighted policy he was often misunderstood and he had to fight hard battles first with the committee of the London Missionary Society, in whose employment he stood, and later with the committee of the new Society. His broadly conceived plan became the foundation for the Society's centre, the famous Palestine Place.

Frey, though originally a qualified shoemaker, was a man of intellect and considerable learning. His missionary book, Joseph and Benjamin, written in the form of letters, treats of almost all the controversial points between rabbinic Judaism and Christianity. It saw several editions in England and America and may still be consulted with some profit by Jewish missionaries.

It is remarkable that not only the great English Society, but that also German missionary work amongst the Jews owes its existence in some measure to the missionary zeal of a Hebrew-Christian.

The name of Dr. Heinrich Christian Immanuel Frommann is closely connected with the early history of the Institutum Judaicum in Halle. Thanks to Frommann's enthusiasm while still a young medical student, the little printing-press was established, which became the nucleus of the later famous Institute. Roi generously admits: "Dass die Halle'sche Mission ins Leben trat, ist in der Tat in nicht geringem Grade auch Frommann zu verdanken". Frommann remained to his life's end a faithful champion of Jewish missions. For this purpose he translated parts of the New Testament into Yiddish. His Hebrew translation of Luke has been highly praised by Delitzsch. Dr. Biesenthal brought to light a Rabbinic commentary on St. Luke written by Frommann, which he revised and edited. Frommann was a good doctor, a pious Christian and a noble character.

An unusual man was Adolf Janasz. He was the son of a rich landowner near Warsaw. Both he and his father were baptised in the Protestant Church. Janasz married the daughter of a Hebrew Christian missionary of the London Jews Society named Rosenthal. After the abortive Polish insurrection of 1863, he founded an orphanage for destitute Jewish children, and attached to the orphanage was a home for Jewish inquirers. Janasz employed at his own expense a Bible woman and two colporteurs to bring to the Jews of Warsaw the Gospel message. Later, the British Jews Society sent him the Hebrew-Christian missionary, Paul Dworkowicz. A Polish nobleman, Count Wengerski, was keenly interested in Janasz's work and helped him to finance it. Dworkowicz left in 1877 for another field, but Janasz faithfully continued his missionary effort single-handed. L. J. S. missionaries in Warsaw found in him a devoted friend, and he remained a generous supporter of the Society all his life. He is the author of a tract called, "Die Zukunft des Volkes Israel (Berlin, 1882)." His name is now largely forgotten, though at one time he was a well-known figure to many Jews in Warsaw. There is still a market-place in the Jewish quarter of the city, bearing the name of Janasz; the property once belonged to the family.

Many other Hebrew-Christians have played a decisive role in the Church's endeavour to preach the Gospel to the Jews. Some of them, like Da Costa in Holland, Dr. C. H. A. Kalmar (1803-1886) in Denmark, and Caspari in Norway, have profoundly stirred their respective Churches to the Christian missionary obligation in general, though the Jewish missionary cause was closest to their heart. Neander himself was a great supporter of missions to the heathen, though he lacked understanding for the work amongst the Jews. He regarded the existence of the Church as a great enough challenge, making direct missionary enterprise to the Jewish people superfluous.

Hebrew-Christians have also made some contribution to the Church's missionary endeavour at home. Dr. Abraham Capadose, Da Costa's close friend, took great interest in home evangelisation, and was one of the founders of the Dutch Protestant Union Ridley Chaim Herschell, (1807-1864), the father of Lord Faber Herschell, was not only one of the founders of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel amongst the Jews (founded 1842), but had also some share in the founding of the "Evangelical Alliance" which came into existence mainly by the efforts of Edward Bickersteth in 1845, in order to bring into closer touch the nonconformists with the evangelical party. In Paris, he helped to establish a Union for the distribution of Christian literature, and in many other ways he showed keen interest in home missions. His funeral was attended by 300 police officials who used to attend his weekly Bible readings.

The greatest contribution, however, Jewish Christians have made, is in the actual mission field itself. Herein lies a marked difference between the Jewish and the heathen field. While only few heathen converts have shown qualities required of a great missionary, the Jewish field has provided a continuous succession of great and efficient missionaries. It is not possible to enumerate all outstanding Jewish missionaries, but a few names of special merit must be mentioned.

The first place undoubtedly belongs to Joseph Wolff (1795?-1862), the greatest of Jewish missionaries. Wolff was no missionary in the ordinary sense; he was a great traveller and a great adventurer as well. Few missionaries have travelled so extensively, have met with greater adventures and have enjoyed greater success than Wolff. Without any exaggeration, Wolff belongs to the greatest missionary pioneers of all times. A man of great courage, of profound scholarship and gifted with many tongues, he was described by Louis Way, the benefactor of the London Jews Society, as "a comet without any perihelion, and capable of setting a whole system on fire". Wolff was an extraordinary character, passionately active, in constant need of motion and consumed with zeal to preach the Gospel. He knew of no obstacles, was capable of superhuman endurance and was a born leader. Way describes him: "A man, who at Rome calls the Pope 'the dust of the earth', and at Jerusalem tells the Jews that 'the Gemara is a lie'; who passes his days in disputation, and his nights in digging the Talmud; to whom a floor of brick is a feather-bed; and a box is a bolster; who makes or finds a friend alike in the persecutor of his former, or of his present faith; who can conciliate a pasha, or confute a patriarch, who travels without a guide, speaks without an interpreter, can live without food, and pay without money; forgiving all the insults he meets with, and forgetting all the flattery he receives; who knows little of worldly conduct, and yet accommodates himself to all men without giving offence to any". Wolff had a great love for his people and a greater love for Jesus Christ. Like all great men, he acknowledged no fetters. Way accurately describes him: "he knows of no church but his heart, no calling but that of zeal, no dispensation but that of preaching. His Travels and Adventures, and his Missionary Journal and Memoir, give some indication of his eventful life and his great missionary efficiency.

Next to Wolff we would place Joseph Rabinowitsch, who, though less spectacular, was possessed with an equal zeal, a great vision and profound love for his people. While Wolff was the wandering preacher, aptly called in missionary circles "the meteor", Rabinowitsch was a great organiser. His merit is to have been the founder of the first modern Hebrew-Christian community without any outside assistance. As such, he will always occupy the first place in the history of modern Hebrew-Christianity. As a man of great Christian virtues, as a great preacher and above all, as a leader, Rabinowitsch will remain for long the finest example of a Hebrew-Christian missionary.

In this connection we must make mention of Dr. Joachim Raphael Heinrich (Hirsch) Biesenthal (1804-1886), who, though different from Wolff and Rabinowitsch, stands out as the exemplary scholar-missionary. Both Strack and Schlottmann have confessed that they owe to him their missionary zeal and their love for the Hebrew language. Biesenthal's merits are mainly literary, but all his writings are inspired by a great missionary zeal and profound scholarship. Delitzsch regarded his books as the best of all missionary literature. He was also appreciated for honest scholarship, Rabbinic knowledge and Hebrew style, by Jewish writers like the historian Jost and the grammarian Dr. Julius Fürst.

Both as a missionary and a writer, he exerted great influence upon Gentiles and Jews alike. Under the pseudonym of Karl Ignaz Corvé, he defended his Jewish brethren against the Blood libel. Of his many works his, Zur Geschichte der christlichen Kirche in ihrer ersten Entwickelungsperiode bis zum Anfang des 4. Jahrhunderts (1850), deserves special attention from the missionary point of view. This book was written for the Jewish people, intending to demonstrate the utter "Jewishness" of the early Christian movement. His, Chrestomathia Rabbinica, cum versione latina et Vitis Scriptorum (1844), earned him the D.D. of the university of Giessen. The London Jews Society may be proud to have counted this great man amongst its missionaries.

Of Hebrew-Christians who laboured in the heathen field, the most famous is Dr. Joseph S. Schereschewsky (1831-1906), to whom the Church in China owes a lasting debt. His Christian character, his devotion to duty, but above all, his amazing perseverance, is a lasting monument of the triumph of spirit over matter.

Schereschewsky was a missionary of the Episcopal Church of America in China. During the hostilities with the United States, he was one of the few white missionaries who refused to leave the country, earning his livelihood by teaching. Twice he was appointed bishop, but refused to accept the office until finally he conceded in 1877, becoming bishop of Shanghai. Already as an ordinary missionary, he translated the psalms into the colloquial language of China and together with Bishop Burdon, the first Mandarin Prayer Book; he was also a member of the committee entrusted with the task of translating the New Testament. In 1865, he undertook the translation of the Old Testament in Mandarin and completed the task in eight years. Later he translated the Prayer Book into classic Chinese (Wen-li) and began the translation of the Apocrypha, when he was suddenly seized with paralysis. It was during his illness, being able to use only his two middle-fingers on a typewriter, that the bishop accomplished his greatest task, namely the translation of the whole Bible including the Apocrypha into the Wen-li dialect. For 20 years he laboured on this work which he completed not long before his death. Thus, a Hebrew-Christian brought the Bible "to the two-hundred and fifty million Mandarin-speaking Chinese, as well as to the mass of readers in China."

Bishop Schereschewsky is also the author of several Chinese grammars and dictionaries. He translated the Gospels into Mongolian and prepared a dictionary of that language. Prof. Max Müller regarded him as one of the most learned orientalists; as a Sinologist he certainly occupies a prominent position.

Of the many other missionaries of the house of Israel, the names of Salkinson, Cassel, Lucky, the two Lichtensteins, Schönberger, Joseph Immanuel Landsmann, Dr. P. P. Levertoff, may all provide material enough for interesting biographical studies.
They can all be characterised by devotion to the missionary cause, simplicity of faith and great Talmudic learning. The most original of them all was undoubtedly Theophil Lucky, the editor of Eduth le Israel. Lucky was possessed of a phenomenal memory and could speak with expert knowledge on almost any subject. He was deeply religious and a great Jewish nationalist. It was his conviction that organised missionary activity is harmful and he consequently refused every help from outside. He lived the life of an orthodox Jew, keeping the Mosaic commandments, but firmly convinced of the Messiahship of Jesus. His attitude to the Church has sometimes been called in question. Dalman and Roi regard him as an Ebionite of the heretical type, but Bernstein asserts that he was "thoroughly orthodox with regard to the cardinal doctrines of Christianity". His observance of the Rabbinical laws was rather an expression of loyalty to his people than of doctrinal significance.

Lucky managed to collect a circle of Jesus-believing Chassidim both in Stanisławów and Lwów, and the movement which he started in some ways resembled the one of Kishineff led by Rabinowitsch. After his death, a few of his disciples joined the Protestant Church, others lapsed to Judaism.

Thus, Hebrew-Christian missionaries have brought valuable psychological and Rabbinic knowledge to the missionary task of the Church. They have insisted that the Gospel be brought to the Jews not in Greek, but in its original Hebrew dress, and have made no small contribution both to the interpretation and translation of the Christian Faith in terms familiar to the Jewish people. Not a few of them have had a share in introducing Hebrew as a means in the missionary approach. This has proved of utmost importance, for together with the Hebrew language came a new understanding for Judaism, and the Jewish people in general. Modern missions to Jews are closely connected with the history of the Hebrew New Testament. As long as the Church saw fit to preach to the Jew in an alien tongue, Christianity remained a subject of controversy between a few learned Rabbis and priests. It was the New Testament, offered to the Jew in the Sacred Tongue, which opened the way to the heart of the Jewish people.

Tremellius clearly recognised the utter importance of approaching the Jew in his own language and not in a foreign tongue. It was with this purpose in view that he published in 1554 his Hebrew Cathechism, which contains an exposition of the Apostolic Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the two Sacraments and finishes with some prayers. To what extent Tremellius' opinions have influenced others is difficult to say, but it is remarkable that in this period the first efforts were made to bring the New Testament to the Jews in the Hebrew language. In the first place of this pioneer work stands the Strassburg professor, Elias Schadæus, who established a special printing press for the purpose of publishing parts of the New Testament in Hebrew script. It was Elias Hutter (1553-1605?), who translated the New Testament into Hebrew for the polyglot Bible (Nuremberg, 1599). There soon followed a whole series of translations, not only of parts of the New Testament, but also of other important Christian documents, like the Augsburg Confession by Philipp Gallus (1588), Luther's Cathechism by Theodosius Fabricius. Even Christian hymns were translated into Hebrew and adapted to well-known Jewish melodies (Leipzig, 1662). The Rev. Thomas Ingemethorp, in the diocese of Durham, translated the Anglican catechism in 1633, and W. Robertson corrected Hutter's Hebrew New Testament. A Hebrew-Christian by the name of Abraham Bar Jacob made the first translation of of the Book of Common Prayer in 1717, which, however, was never published. But together with the translation by another Hebrew-Christian named Czerskier, made about 100 years later, it served as the basis for the Hebrew translation published by the London Jews Society in 1834/36 for which McCaul and Reichardt were responsible. This translation was in use at Palestine Place from 1837 and in Jerusalem from 1838.

There are at least three standard translations of the New Testament used by the various missionary societies. The first was published by the London Jews Society between the years 1814-1817. It is to a large extent the work of Hebrew-Christians. It was partly made by a German Jew named Judah d'Allemund, and the committee which was responsible for its revision in 1838 and 1866 consisted mostly of Hebrew-Christians. The second is Prof. Delitzsch's masterly translation, which appeared complete in 1877, having the Sinaiticus as its basis. It has since seen many editions. The last translation is that by Salkinson, published posthumously by the learned Dr. C. D. Ginsburg in 1886. It is entirely the work of a Hebrew-Christian, and though perhaps less accurate than Delitzsch's translation, it by far surpasses it in beauty of style and the easy flow of language.

Standing mid-way between the Gentile and the Jewish world, Hebrew-Christianity performs a double function: it interprets Judaism to Gentile Christianity and Christianity to Judaism. But its existence is of still greater significance.

The present world-crisis in which the Church and the Synagogue are both involved, has its roots in a philosophy which has placed man in the centre of the universe. Strange as it may be, such exaltation of man is neither contrary to Greek philosophy nor to the spirit of Judaism. It is, however, alien to the essence of Christianity, which is based upon the notion of human inadequacy. The prevailing humanism of our age has thus greatly reduced the distance which once divided Church and Synagogue. The faster the Church is moving in the direction of Greek philosophy, especially Platonism, the closer it approximates the Jewish point of view. The gap which still divides the two creeds is increasingly bridged by the common religious denominator. The emphasis upon religious experience has created a platform for all religiously-minded men, irrespective of creed. "Proselytising" is thus increasingly becoming a sign of intolerance, and is looked upon as outrageous to the religious instinct. On the Jewish side, the lack of active missionary propaganda on the part of the Synagogue is regarded as a virtue. On the Christian side, the theological implications of the central doctrines of the Church, are giving place to the mystic experience of the individual, thus rendering missionary activity pointless. In this general atmosphere of universal religiosity, the Hebrew-Christian is a curiosity, a disquieting phenomenon to both sides. At a time of doctrinal indifference, when adherence to a historic creed is more an expression of loyalty than personal conviction, the presence of the Jewish Christian is a strange reminder of a by-gone age. To leave the Synagogue with its many and great religious traditions appears not only to the Jew, but to many a Gentile Christian, an act of betrayal. Again, in our age of intense nationalism, when the Christian Faith has been degraded to a tribal religion of various ethnic groups, conversion from Judaism to Christianity appears to some Gentiles as an intolerable intrusion. This will become obvious when we remember that to many Church people, to be a Christian is a Gentile prerogative. In spite of the fact that the Gentile world is increasingly becoming indifferent to the Christian profession, it is still taken for granted that the Gentiles have accepted and the Jews have rejected Jesus Christ.
It is thus almost expected of the Jew to remain loyal to the religion in which he was born.

The position of the Hebrew-Christian is one of great loneliness. He finds himself outside both camps, standing mid-way. He is torn in two directions, between the Gentile Church and the Jewish people. We now understand the reason why so many prominent Jewish Christians have championed the cause of orthodox Christianity. Positive Christianity can provide the only justification for the grave step a Jew takes when accepting baptism. Religious experience is no Christian prerogative, it can be attained within the walls of the Synagogue. If a Jew leaves his kindred and his father's house, and becomes a stranger, there must be a great and compelling reason. True Hebrew-Christianity is thus founded upon loyalty to Jesus Christ. It is for Christ's sake that the Jewish Christian is called upon to make this great sacrifice. Nobody who has read the recent memoirs by a convinced Roman Catholic Jew, a Polish lawyer, can remain unmoved by the clash of loyalties in which the Hebrew-Christian finds himself. His first loyalty is to the Church whose spiritual son he is; his second loyalty is to his people to whom he belongs and whose memories and traditions are deeply buried in his heart. Jewish Christians have sometimes held that there need be no clash of loyalties. They argued that, like the Frenchman or the Englishman who manage to be loyal to their nation and remain good Christians, the Jewish Christian ought to be able to be both a Jew and a Christian. Such reasoning, however, overlooks two fundamental facts: 1) The agelong division between the Synagogue and the Church, with its manifold implications; 2) the political position of Jewry, which demands every sacrifice for the preservation of Jewish existence. But there is yet a greater truth involved. Historic Christianity avoided the conflict between loyalty to Jesus Christ and the demands of the world by a compromise. It made peace with the world by giving to Caesar what legitimately only belongs to God. There can be little doubt that national selfishness, which inevitably involves political intrigue, has been the downfall of the Church. In essence, Christianity stands opposed to the world, cutting right across all national aspirations. Philip Cohen, arguing for the national continuity of the Hebrew-Christian on the basis "that the acceptance of Christianity does not involve denationalisation", was unfortunate in the choice of his example. He says: "Japanese Christians have given a practical illustration to their people that loyalty to the national cause and love to Christ are not incompatible". Subsequent events, however, have given the lie to this statement. The Church in Japan was made to choose between the two loyalties, and like the rest of Gentile-Christianity, it chose nationalism. Cohen's plea on behalf of Hebrew-Christians, "to be allowed to exercise the same law of self-preservation, as far as our nationality is concerned, as others are allowed to do", may be justifiable on historical grounds, but spiritually, it cannot be so. The uniqueness of the Hebrew-Christian situation lies in the fact that without his choice, he is put in a position from which there is no escape. In his case, it is either - or; only two possibilities are left to him: on the one side is Jesus Christ, but loyalty to him spells the forfeiture of national rights; on the other, is the Jewish people, demanding the denial of personal conviction, for the sake of its continued existence. There is no way out of the dilemma. The creation of the much discussed Hebrew-Christian Church, or separate Hebrew-Christian communities, will not solve the problem. At best it can bring the Jewish Christian to the position Gentile-Christianity occupies at present, adding another sect to the manifold divisions of the Church.

In the Hebrew-Christian, thus, the drama of Primitive Christianity is re-enacted. Loyalty to Jesus Christ becomes to him the supreme test of discipleship. He is called upon to go outside the camp "bearing His reproach", having no abiding city in this world (Hebr.13,13f). This was the price both Jews and Gentiles once had to pay for their faith. The Jewish Christian still pays the price. From the national point of view, the Hebrew-Christian has no future. H. Loewe's opinion reflects a fact when alluding to the Birkat ha-Minim he says: "for the Jewish-Christians there can be no hope". National continuity of Hebrew-Christianity will only be possible when the Jewish people lives its own life upon its own soil, and can afford to grant to its members the luxury of personal conviction without endangering its separate existence. Until then, there is no way out of the impasse. Every effort at a solution must break at the person of Jesus Christ. Only men for whom to belong to Jesus means more than to belong to a nation are fit for the Kingdom of God. "This is the experience of every Jew who yields to the challenge of the Gospel message. The tragedy of the Church is that this is no longer the experience of the Gentile Christian".

In the unique position of Hebrew-Christianity, the conflict between faith in the One Catholic and Apostolic Church and the spirit of national separatism, breaks out in all its acuteness. In the Hebrew-Christian, the tension which exists between the Church and the world reaches a climax. Discipleship means once again carrying a Cross and fellowship in suffering. Faith ceases to be intellectual acquiescence and becomes once more a hazardous venture. Abraham's experience is the experience of every true Jewish Christian. This overaccentuation of the implications of the Christian Faith is a constant irritant to self-centred Christianity. Herein lies the significance of Hebrew-Christian existence to the Church. By the sacrifice of national loyalty for the sake of a higher good, the Hebrew-Christian demonstrates before the Church and the Synagogue that the flesh profiteth nothing, it is the Spirit which giveth Life (John 6,63).
CHAPTER VII.

JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

We have already had occasion to notice that the controversy between the Church and the Synagogue centres round the person of Jesus Christ. The problem for the Jew is what place can be assigned to Jesus in Jewish thought, without endangering the fundamental principles of Judaism? It has become increasingly obvious to Jewish thinkers that the traditional attitude of aloofness is not only impossible in modern conditions of life, but also harmful to the cause of Judaism. Yet room for the Master of Nazareth within the structure of Jewish thought is only possible on the condition of a clear distinction between the Christ of the Christian dogma and Jesus the Jew. Jesus can enter the sanctuary of the Jewish heart only divested of all his supernatural glory. Is such a distinction possible? Jewish writers say: yes. It is not only possible, but absolutely essential for the sake of Divine truth. The Christian perception of Jesus in terms of the Holy Trinity rests upon a tragic misunderstanding. Such differentiation between the historic Jesus and the Christian Christ, is a modern development, and was made possible by the influence of advanced scholarship. The rehabilitation of the "historic Jesus" at the expense of the orthodox Son of God is the logical answer on the part of progressive Jewish writers, after critical study had reduced the Divine Saviour to the plebeian position of a Jewish Rabbi. But what need is there, one would ask, to attach so much importance to the restoration to a place of honour, of a man, thus reduced to insignificance? Is it just to satisfy the modern Jewish craving to reaffirm the Jewish origin of important personages?
John Cournos, an enthusiastic champion of the reclamation of Jesus by the Jews, has no real answer to that question. He holds that, for a Jew to deny Jesus is "to reject the Jewish heritage, to betray what was best in Israel". But, we would ask, is it not possible to claim that heritage, minus Jesus? Has not Judaism assimilated the teaching of the Prophets without paying special attention to the prophets themselves? To Judaism, there can be no religious significance attached to any historic person. It is not the man who brings the message, but the message which he brings, that is decisive. So far, our study has clearly shown that Jewish scholars are unable to discover in all honesty any objective truth by which Judaism could have been enriched by Jesus. Cournos tells us that "Christ's essential Jewishness has been admitted by Jewish scholars and divines". But in the light of our investigation, this sentence requires careful examination. "The Jewishness of Jesus" admitted by Jewish scholars, refers to the background of Jesus' life, which existed in its self-sufficiency before Jesus, and remained essentially unaffected after his coming. Jesus owes a debt to Judaism, but Judaism owes no debt to Jesus. Such is the general view of Jewish scholarship. It is obvious that the Jesus whom Cournos has stripped of all theological and dogmatic significance in order to make him acceptable to the Jewish taste, has simultaneously lost all his peculiar uniqueness, which both attracts and repels the Jew. Jesus, secularized and divested of all his religious meaning, ceases to be important. Rabbi Enelow and John Cournos thus defeat their own ends: a Jesus whom the Jews do not reject, need not be reclaimed! The controversy regarding Jesus left on the plane of humanitarian idealism, inevitably works itself to a standstill. It ends in the resolve to admit the Man of Nazareth to the venerable assembly of the geniuses belonging to the Jewish race. Such admittance entails no obligations and makes no demands.

The real controversy regarding Jesus takes place, not on the plane of secularized idealism, but on the plane of religious truth. It is essentially a theological controversy which can only be carried on in its full significance between the Synagogue and the Church. The nature of their mutual relationship, their historic interdependence, their common hope, their profound divergence and their deep-rooted opposition to each other, make them, and them only, legitimate partners of the discussion. The dialogue which has taken and still takes place between Synagogue and Church is more than mere theological quibbling, it is a necessity upon which their life depends. In juxtaposition to each other, they learn the meaning of their own existence. Confronting each other in question and answer, they perpetuate their decision and affirm their faith.

The divergence between the Church and the Synagogue is fundamental and covers the whole sphere of human-Divine relationship. At no point do these two divergent circles intersect. It is only a vague and diluted Christian theology which imagines it possible to come to terms with Judaism. In reality, there is no understanding between the two faiths, they possess no common denominator, which could form the basis for a "bridge theology". They can only compromise by surrender; either the Church becomes the Synagogue, or the Synagogue the Church. But in their separateness their only legitimate relationship is that of continuous interrogation. They can, nay they must question each other until the end of time. Their existence side by side puts both simultaneously under a question mark. The theme of their conversation is thus as to the why and wherefore of their separate life. The answer to this question leads to the person of Jesus Christ. Between Church and Synagogue stands the Crucified. Church and Synagogue derive their existence from their attitude to Him. The Synagogue perpetuates her existence in her continued negation, and the Church in her continued affirmation of the claims which Jesus made.

A. Theological issues.

Mr. Montefiore has hinted at the possibility of an understanding between Liberal Judaism and Christianity on the basis of the Sermon on the Mount. He even went one step further. In his book, The Old Testament and After, he makes a remark which has been severely criticised on the Jewish side. His words are: "It will be needful for the Liberal Jewish theologians to consider the new modern interpretations of the doctrine of the Trinity"; and: "Nor does it follow that because the doctrine has been, and even is, in frequent danger of degeneration into Tritheism, or has often so degenerated, it is therefore not true". But whatever opinions Montefiore may hold about the philosophical significance of the Trinitarian doctrine, it has no bearing upon the person of Jesus. Not even in its diluted Unitarian form is the Christian emphasis upon the importance of Jesus acceptable to a Liberal Jew. An approach to the Church is therefore made impossible for any form of Judaism, as long as the Christian faith is related to Jesus Christ. That Montefiore is well aware of the difficulty can be seen from an earlier remark: "The centre of the teaching of the historic Jesus is God: the centre of the teaching of the Church is he" (i.e., Jesus himself). It is this peculiar attitude to Jesus which divides forever the Church from the Synagogue. By working out the implications of faith in Jesus Christ, we automatically draw the demarcation line which divides Judaism from Christianity. But because we are writing from the Christian point of view, we will reverse the process by stating primarily the Jewish position.
1. The unity of God.

The essence of Judaism is the doctrine of the absolute and unmodified unity of God. Prof. Moore's masterly definition of the Jewish conception of that unity can scarcely be surpassed. He calls it: "the numerically exclusive and uncompromisingly personal monotheism". With it, Judaism stands and falls. Indeed, the absolute Unity of the God of Israel together with the Torah, i.e., the revelation of this one and only God, form the heart and essence of Judaism. The rest of Jewish thought and practice is of secondary importance, when compared with these two fundamental truths. Though Liberal Judaism has only retained the first pillar upon which the Synagogue rests, and has substituted for the unchangeable Torah a progressive conception of revelation commensurate with reason, yet in its emphasis upon absolute monotheism and in its conception of Law, it is still in spirit and essence Judaism.

This characteristic emphasis upon the one-ness of God which forms the basis of the Ten Commandments and has found its classic expression in the Old Testament literature, differentiates the Synagogue from all other religions. But the Rabbinic interpretation of the Old Testament conception of the Unity of God is such that it runs contrary to the Christian conception of the Messiah. This most vital tenet as conceived by orthodox and liberal Judaism alike, stands thus in direct opposition to the Trinitarian doctrine of the Christian Church. It is at this point that the gulf between the Church and the Synagogue opens before us in all its depth and significance. On this issue, Judaism has never faltered. It still speaks with one united voice. Dr. J. H. Hertz, an orthodox Jew, and Kaufmann Kohler, a liberal, unequivocally say the same thing. The teaching of the divinity of Jesus Christ is an unpardonable offence in the eyes of Judaism. It is for this reason that Judaism could never proclaim whole-heartedly the Christians to be Monotheists; at best they were looked upon as "semi-proselytes"; while Mohammedanism was always regarded as more closely related to the mind of Judaism.

The puzzle which confronts the historian in his study of the inner causes which led to the division between the early Christian Church and the Synagogue, resolves itself into a simple answer question when viewed from this fundamental theological aspect. Did the disciples in Jerusalem, i.e., Jews, upon Jewish soil, claim for Jesus Divinity? This question is difficult to answer, and we have seen that even Bousset hesitates. But there can be little doubt that the first believers in Jesus claimed for the Master an unique importance which gradually lifted him out of the ranks of mere humanity. Against this, Judaism could not but protest with all its strength. Even the suggestion that Jesus' position was unique amongst men, a claim which was upheld by every shade of Hebrew-Christianity, no matter how it differed in every other respect, could not be anything else but an offence to the Synagogue. Such an admission would inevitably break the closed ranks of humanity and set Jesus upon a plane outside history. It is for this reason that Judaism can neither admit the authority, uniqueness, nor the perfection of Jesus. It consequently rejects even the Unitarian point of view.

Ferdinand Weber has shown that the Synagogue's conception of the Unity of God underwent a change under the influence of Christianity. He maintains that the conception of God in the older Targums is more closely related to that of the Old Testament. But even there, he finds: "einen gewissen Monismus und Transcendentismus der ihn unfähig macht auf die innergöttliche Lebensbewegung einzugehen, die dem trinitarischen Gottesbegriff zu Grunde liegt, unfähig auch dem in Alten Testamenten bezeugten Eingehen Gottes in die Geschichte gerecht zu werden. Such criticism, however, may appear to overlook the great tradition of Jewish piety and the strongly developed Jewish awareness of God's interference in human history. So much may be said in defence of Judaism. But it will be noticed that an appeal to experience removes the discussion from the theological plane on to empiricism. Philosophically, however, and theologically, the Jewish conception of $\text{ יהוה }$ reveals an abstract Monism and a cold Transcendentalism which strangely contrasts with the indwelling richness of the Christian view. We have already referred to Monte­ flore's remark regarding the Christian conception of the Trinity, which goes to show that he was aware of that fact. But Judaism is irrevocably committed to such a position as long as it confronts the Christian Church. The slightest retraction from rigid monotheism makes room for the Christian conception of the Christ. But such a conception runs directly contrary to the whole structure of Jewish thought. This can be seen from Husik's comment on Maimonides' conception of the Godhead. He says: "God is conceived as absolutely transcendent and unknowable. No positive predicate can apply to him so as to indicate his essence. We can say only what he is not, we cannot say what he is. There is not the faintest resemblance between him and his creatures. And yet he is the cause of the world and of all its happenings. Positive attributes (e.g. life, power, knowledge), signify that God is the cause of the experience denoted by the attributes in question..." From this description it can be clearly recognized wherein lies the difference between the Christian and the Jewish conceptions of God. The God of Jewish theology, especially under Maimonides' influence, is reduced to a philosophical principle. The active and intervening God of Old Testament Scriptures assumes here the form of the First Cause. His absolute otherness removes Him entirely from the world of His Creation. But while the infinite difference between man and God is the starting-point of Christian thinking, God's transcendence is overcome, not by the arbitrary act of human piety, but by the self-chosen and self-willed manifestation of God in the person of Jesus Christ, in Judaism it is overcome by man himself. This is the most significant difference between Church and Synagogue.

Closely connected with the unity of God is the Jewish conception of Man. Here it is well to remember that philosophical and theological thinking is never suspended in the abstract air of pure logic, but has a generic relationship to the concrete facts of life. It is a remarkable fact that the Jews, a small people, living for centuries in most difficult circumstances, exhibit a positivism to life and an optimism about Man which is peculiarly their own. There is an interesting connection between the Jewish outlook and the actual historical experience of the Jewish people.

It seems to us that Jewish life, which for centuries has entailed humiliation and suffering, has coloured Jewish thought in a peculiar way. The natural result of oppression is the development of an inferiority complex. But by way of compensation, that sense of inferiority has been turned into a positive tendency to assertiveness. In Jewish thought this expresses itself in an exaggerated emphasis upon the importance of Israel in particular and of Man in general.

We hold that there is an inner connection between the Jewish conception of Man and the Synagogue's attitude to the Christian concept of the Messiah; we will thus turn to consider Jewish anthropology.
2. The Jewish conception of Man.

Dr. Dienemann has seen aright, when he said that the most characteristic difference between Judaism and Christianity "ist die Lehre vom Menschen, die Anschauung über Art und Wesen des Menschen". This is by no means an exaggeration. At first sight, it would seem that the fundamental difference between Judaism and Christianity lies in their respective conceptions of God. But this is not so. Man's conception about God reflects his view about himself. Feuerbach's contention that the idea of the Godhead is a projection of the human mind undeniably contains some truth. The starting-point of man's thinking is man himself. It cannot be otherwise. Thus, the genesis of the division between Church and Synagogue is of an anthropological nature. Because the Church and the Synagogue radically differ on this point, they differ on all other points.

What is man? Upon the answer to this question depends the philosophical outlook, and ultimately the theological direction of both faiths. Needless to say, both Synagogue and Church try to answer this question in the light of Scripture. Their difference lies in the emphasis, but it is a difference of far-reaching consequences. The Synagogue emphasises the Imago Dei in man; the Church stresses man's Fall. The result is that the Synagogue offers a lofty humanism which is essentially idealistic and optimistic in its outlook. The Church, on the other hand, by emphasising the depravity of human nature and the impotence of man to save himself, presents a negative, ascetic attitude to the world. It is thus in direct opposition to that frame of mind of which humanism is its expression.

There have naturally been attempts to combine the two views in a synthesis, as both apparently contain elements of truth, and on the surface seem to supplement each other. Indeed, the history of Christian thought, viewed from this angle, reveals repeated attempts in one form or another, to find a compromise. But in reality, a synthesis is impossible. The Imago Dei concept which ultimately dispenses with the need for man's restoration, or adoption, as Paul would call it, destroys the most central fact of the Christian faith, namely the Incarnation. If man is essentially good, then the difference between him and Jesus is only a difference of degrees in the scale of perfection. Then there is no actual difference between Him and us. He only is what we shall be. Upon the ladder of human perfection, Jesus merely occupies a higher rung. He has attained to what we are striving. But even such a relativisation between Jesus and the rest of humanity is unbearable to Judaism. As Montefiore puts it: "There have been many men who were very good and very wise; there never has been, and there never can be, a man who was perfectly good and perfectly wise". Here we meet with the inexorable logic of Judaism. To admit perfection on the part of one man means to detach him from the rest of the human race, and thus to break the closed circle of humanity. In essence it amounts to the deification of one man. The only other alternative is to assume that so perfect a man is not man in the ordinary sense of the word. But against such an assumption, Judaism revolts, for underlying it is the thought of human impotence. If God revealed himself in history through His Son, as the Christian Church claims, then His appearing amongst us is an indication of human helplessness; it is the greatest crisis in the history of man. Such a crisis Judaism cannot admit, for in the light of the Imago Dei concept, the line between God and man is not really broken, it is only marred. It is still within the power of man to ascend heavenwards.
It is for these reasons that Judaism is able to accept, without restriction or qualification, the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God, and from it the deduction of the Brotherhood of man. The equality of men is thus a logical corollary to the Jewish outlook. Hence the democracy of the Synagogue. It is a democracy with a positive sign.

It is at this point that the bridge is built between the transcendental and eternal God and finite man. God's transcendence is not overcome by God Himself, in that he condescends to dwell amongst men, but by man, in that he reaches out God-wards. Thus, the barrier which divides man from God is broken down, not by an act of God, as the Christian believes, but by the self-sufficiency of man. Buber has admirably defined the position, by contrasting Judaism with Christianity: Judaism, he said, is based upon the belief that there is a way from earth to heaven, from below, upwards. It is the faith that struggling man, in his moral effort can climb the steep hill which leads to God. Christianity, on the other hand, holds the opposite view. It is based upon the belief that there is no way from earth to heaven, from man to God. Unless God, in his mercy, stretches out his hand from above, man can never reach him. Hence the Incarnation which teaches that in the person of Jesus Christ, God came from heaven to earth to find and to save mankind.

Judaism is built upon the assumption of man's unlimited resources to attain to the highest. "If you wish to stand under the special protection of special Providence", says Rabbi Wise, "you must exert your energies to rise, to climb, to ascend and come as near to your God as you can." But what if man cannot? The Synagogue does not admit such a possibility, Judaism is essentially a religion for those who can. We quote Dr. Wise.
again: "To rise to self-conscious immortality and happiness is in man's power exclusively; it depends on no circumstances and no outer influences. Man is to all intents and purposes a free and independent being".

It is obvious that the Fall of man, which occupies a central position in Christian theology, reverses the picture which Judaism draws. The corollary of the Fall is that the original relationship between man and God is broken. Henceforth man stands before God, not as a child before the Father, but as a creature before the Creator, as guilty before the Judge. The Church thus speaks in terms of unredeemed humanity. Without this fact, the Incarnation becomes superfluous. The Cross, which in the eyes of the Church, is the symbol of Salvation, otherwise becomes a mere tragedy and the Christian Faith the result of a misunderstanding.

Indeed, the Church also knows about the Fatherhood of God, but this is conditioned by an act of adoption on the part of God of which Jesus Christ is the pledge and token. For man to claim relationship with God, without the Cross, without forgiveness, is to overlook the grim fact of sin; it is an act of supreme presumption.

3. Free-will.

From what has been said already about Jewish anthropology, it is an easy inference that the teaching of Free-will is an important element in the whole conception. Indeed, Jewish thinkers from the earliest times invariably assert the absolute freedom of the human will. This is already implied in the well-known sentence: הַדְּוִי נְשׁוֹנָה, שָׁנָם שֶׁיְּזַאֲדוּ שְׁעֵם, שֶׁיְּזַאֲדוּ שְׁעֵם. The meaning of this adage is, that though God, by virtue of his position, controls the affairs of man, his control is not such as to override human choice. The assumption being that man is capable of choosing for himself and choosing aright.

The doctrine of Free-will plays a prominent part in Jewish thought. It is constantly asserted by Jewish divines and has been claimed to be a fundamental principle of Judaism. Haski says: "So fundamental has it seemed for Judaism to maintain the freedom of the will that no one hitherto (i.e. till Crescas c. 1340-1412) had ventured to doubt it. Maimonides no less than Judah Halevi, and with equal emphasis Gersonides, insist that the individual is not determined in his conduct. This seemed to be the only way to vindicate God's justice in reward and punishment." But in actual fact, the insistence upon human freedom has deeper reasons than the vindication of divine justice. The whole concept about man and his relationship to God makes freedom of will a logical necessity for Judaism. Haski is well aware of this.

The main difficulty which Jewish thinkers have felt was that the idea of human freedom clashes with the doctrine of God's omniscience. They have been thus forced either to restrict human freedom, or God's omniscience; or else, as in the case of Maimonides, evade the problem by a reference to God's transcendence. Crescas' position is exceptional for Judaism. But even in his case, the tension is lessened by a dialectical distinction between determinism and fatalism. On the whole, it may be said that the natural trend in Jewish theology is towards an emphasis upon the human side. But while medieval thinkers still restricted human freedom so as to relate it to God's sovereignty, moderns assert unqualified freedom of will.

Judah Halevi explained that free-will, which by its nature belongs to the class of intermediary causes, is linked up with other causes "which reduce it, chain like, to the Prime Cause".
Human action is thus, in one way or another, related to God's omniscience. The final choice, however, is not compulsory, but potential: "the mind wavers between an opinion and its opposite, being permitted to turn where it chooses. The result is praise or blame for the choice". This may be contrasted with the advanced views of modern writers. Rabbi Dienemann, pointing out the Christian conception of grace which man requires not only in order to abstain from evil, but also to do good, observes: "Mit Beharrlichkeit hält die jüdische Anschauung an dem Gedanken der vollen Selbständigkeit der sittlichen Persönlichkeit fest". But Dienemann actually goes further than this. In the interests of ethics, on the grounds that "die sittliche Erneuerung muss aus eigener Kraft erwachsen", and that man in himself must therefore carry the sources of moral regeneration, he does not hesitate to place man opposite God: "Neben der Hoheit und grenzenlosen Gnade Gottes steht als ebenso wichtiger religiöser Wert die Würde des Menschen". The Jewish conception of man and the characteristic emphasis upon human action, provides the background for this sentence. It is the logical conclusion of a theology which is essentially anthropocentric. That Dienemann by no means occupies an isolated position, may be judged from the words of another writer who represents a somewhat different school of thought. The leader of the Neo-Kantian school in Judaism, Hermann Cohen, explaining the connection between free-will and ethics, says: "Die Wahl des Guten ist die Aufgabe des Menschen. Die Freiheit dieser Wahl ist die Grundbedingung der sittlichen Vernunft. Für sie, für die Freiheit des menschlichen, als des sittlichen Willens, kann es keine Schranke in Gott geben. Der Wille Gottes, das Wesen Gottes, erfordert die Freiheit des menschlichen Willens". At this point, the border-line between Judaism and Christianity becomes visible. Whatever freedom the Christian assigns to himself; whatever worth he ascribes to human personality; in view of the Cross he stands incapacitated, i.e., he cannot save himself. Salvation is a gift from God; in the last resort, man undergoes salvation; he does not attain to it. But such is not the Jewish view. God indeed acts, but his action is conditioned by human behaviour. Israel's redemption depends on Israel's repentance: R. Elieser said: If Israel repent, they will be redeemed, if not, they will not be redeemed. R. Joshua said to him, If they do not repent they will not be redeemed. But the Holy One, blessed be He, will set up a king over them, whose decrees shall be as cruel as Haman, whereby Israel shall engage in repentance, and he will thus bring them back to the right path. Against this may be put the words of the Apostle, which by contrast reveal in a remarkable way the profound difference between the Christian and the Jewish idea of redemption: "while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5, 8).

The whole idea of salvation in the Christian sense is foreign to Judaism; and naturally so. The Synagogue knows of two kinds of redemption; national redemption, i.e., the redemption of Israel, and redemption from sin. Israel's redemption depends on Israel's repentance; redemption from sin is understood in terms of forgiveness: it is God's prerogative to save man from sin. This he does by an act of forgiveness. Hermann Cohen thus makes forgiveness of sin "die eigentliche Spezialität der Gnade Gottes." Judaism, therefore, emphasises not salvation, but Atonement. The Day of Atonement occupies a central place in the calendar of the Synagogue. Characteristically enough, Hermann Cohen's great book on Judaism (Die Religion der Vernunft) has a chapter on Atonement (Versöhnung) but no chapter on Salvation. Wherever Salvation is referred to, its meaning is that of Atonement.
The prerequisite to Atonement is repentance. The Rabbis had an extraordinary estimation of repentance: The Mishnah teaches that Repentance atones for lesser transgressions of the Law, while the punishment for greater transgressions are, thanks to repentance, suspended until the Day of Atonement. But in later Rabbinical writings, the importance of repentance is even more magnified. A fine example of the place רעננה occupies in Rabbinic thought is offered by Pesikta de Rab Kahana, where one section deals exclusively with repentance (Piska XXV). R. Juda Nishraja said in the name of R. Juda bar Simon: When a man shoots an arrow, how far does it go? The length of a field (required) for the sowing of one cor of corn, or two fields (required) for the sowing of one cor of corn. But great is the power of repentance, for it reaches to the throne of Glory. There is no crime which repentance cannot atone. Even Cain's sin was forgiven because he repented. Kaufmann Kohler says that "Repentance occupies a very prominent position in all the ethical writings of the Middle Ages". It is still the corner-stone of Jewish piety.

Montefiore seems to be in agreement with Delitzsch's estimate of the difference between the Jewish and the Christian conception of repentance. "According to the Jewish doctrine", says Delitzsch "God lets himself be reconciled through repentance; according to the Christian doctrine, he is reconciled (versöhnnt) through the mediation (Mittlerwerk) of Christ, and the individual man is reconciled to God (versöhnnt) when in faith and repentance, he accepts the mediation, which is common and general for all mankind. The New Testament method of salvation (Heilsordnung) has the same sound as (lautet auch wie) Jer. Maccoth 1,6 יֶשׁוּעַ גְּשָׁלוּת: ('let him repent and receive atonement'), but repentance is not the factor which atones (das Süßnende selbst), but only the way to receive atonement (der Weg zur Versöhnung)". It seems to us that in this subtle distinction lies the whole difference between the Church and the Synagogue with regard to human freedom and Divine Grace. For the main point under discussion is not what is intended by repentance, on this Church and Synagogue are agreed, but the question what efficacy we ascribe to the act. In the estimation of Judaism, forgiveness is conditioned by repentance, according to the Church, forgiveness has its foundation in the Cross. The centre of gravity is thus for Judaism on the human side, and for Christianity on God's action which precedes repentance.

We restate the case: according to Judaism, it is man who takes the first step towards reconciliation, and not God; hence the utter importance of repentance. In the act of contrition, man expresses his willingness to amend his life and to ask for forgiveness. That God will forgive is taken for granted. It is on these grounds that Maimonides can pronounce without hesitation: "Now in our days, when the house of the Sanctuary exists no longer, and when we have no atoning altar... repentance atones for all transgressions." This actually goes beyond the Mishnah, where forgiveness is still to a certain degree tied to the efficacy of the Day of Atonement. But even in the Mishnah, the reference to the Day of Atonement does not lessen the importance of repentance: "death and the Day of Atonement effect atonement if there is repentance". It is therefore quite true to the spirit of Judaism when Leo Baeck says: "Atonement too is ours, our task and our way". Dr. Dienemann has not over-accentuated the Jewish position by differentiating between the Christian conception of Salvation and the Jewish conception of Atonement: the Jew stands in no need of salvation, all he requires is Atonement (Versöhnung): "bei der Versöhnung" however, "wirken beide, Gott und Mensch mit... aber im Vordergrund steht die aus der eigenen Kraft geleistete Arbeit des Menschen". Klausner explains that Paul's doctrine of predestination, which he calls a "mystico-religious determinism", puts man in a position where the chance to determine his own fate is taken from him. Such a doctrine is unacceptable to Judaism, which is characterized by profound faith in life and a strong optimism. In the Jewish view, human dignity requires that man be free, with an absolute freedom, for only thus can he be held responsible for his deeds. It is for this reason that in the Jewish conception sin does not totally affect human nature; man only sins, but is not sinful.

4. The Jewish conception of sin.

Closely related to the problem of free-will, is the problem of evil. Judaism, with its characteristic emphasis upon morality and law, is naturally conscious of the fact of evil. The Synagogue knows of sin and human depravity. It often speaks of the Yetzer ha-ra and Yetzer ha-tov fighting for supremacy within the human heart. But the Jewish conception of Yetzer hara is totally different to the Christian conception of Sin. The difference is logically connected with the doctrine of free-will.

Evil and good are ever-present potentialities in human life. Man is constantly put to the test by being offered the choice between right and wrong. He carries in his bosom the tension between two dispositions. But his human dignity requires that he be free to tip the balance in either direction. The final decision is with him. Deut.30,19 plays an important part in Jewish thinking: "I have set before thee life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore chose life that thou mayest live..." Dr.
J. H. Hertz comments on this text: "Jewish ethics is rooted in the doctrine of human responsibility, that is, freedom of will!". Dr. Hertz, however, knows that the human will is conditioned by heredity and environment; he nevertheless holds that "in the moral universe, man ever remains his own master". This is an axiom to Judaism, on it depends its whole structure. Maimonides rightly regarded the doctrine of free-will as the pillar of the Law and the commandments. The enacting of Commandments postulates the possibility of keeping them, they presuppose human freedom. I. M. Wise puts it: "The Sinaic revelation is the proof for the immortal and God-like nature of man". It is then obvious that for Judaism there can only be sins, but no Sin in the Christian sense. Its main concern is with גבורה, trespasses and the safeguarding of the Law, but not with the redemption of sinners as the Church understands it.

Original sin was unknown to the old Synagogue and it is of no consequence in the teaching of Judaism. The Rabbis taught that man at his birth is given by God a pure and holy soul; and though man possesses the latent possibility towards evil or good, the inclination towards good is stronger than the inclination towards evil. Thus, man at the outset, starts with a plus and not with a minus. Dienemann has shown that the existence of evil is not a postulate of Judaism. It is not something that man finds already present on entering the world, but is of his own creation. Judaism denies the a priori character of evil. "And if thou wilt now ask", says a Midrash, "why did then God create the yetzer hara, God replies: who makes him a yetzer hara, only thou thyself". Sin is, therefore, not an inherent characteristic of human nature, it is only acquired. To quote Dienemann again: "Sünde ist nach der jüdischen Lehre also nichts Notwendiges, nichts dem Menschen Angehorenes, von ihm Untrennbarens. Hence, sinfulness to Judaism, is not a state to which man is confined, but rather "eine flüchtige und vorübergehende Hemmung." Or, as Rabbi Wise puts it: "A sin, according to Rabbinical definition must be an action."

If we understand Hermann Cohen's difficult discourse on the origin of evil aright, sin is essentially a means for the individual to develop into an Ego and thus to find his completion. Cohen guards himself against the thought that there is an inherent inclination (Anlage) within man towards evil. On the contrary, man carries in his bosom the holy spirit. Man by nature, however, is bound up socially with the rest of humanity; he is, therefore, only an Individual, but not an Ego. Sin serves as a medium by which man develops into a self-conscious "I". Cohen strongly differentiates between social sin and sin before God. Religious sin, i.e., sin before God, is the refusal on the part of man to rise to the state of isolated existence as an Ego. To use his own words for the sake of clarity: "Nur diejenige Stunde des Individuums haben wir allein als Sünde vor Gott zu erkennen, welche das menschliche Individuum an das menschliche Ich emporhält". Sin thus understood serves a positive end. It becomes a ladder which leads man to his highest existence. It is not something from which man must be saved, it is something which man is called upon to overcome. Without it, man is deprived of the means of attaining his highest end: "Die Sünde vor Gott", Hermann Cohen explains, "führt uns zum Menschen als Ich. Die Sünde vor Gott führt uns zur Erlösung durch Gott. Die Erlösung durch Gott führt uns zur Versöhnung des Menschen mit sich selbst. Und diese erst führt uns in letzter Instanz zur Versöhnung des Ich mit Gott. Die Versöhnung mit Gott erst ist es, die das Individuum zur Reife bringt als Ich."
The involved philosophical reasoning of M. Cohen need not obscure the fact that his structure is built upon the foundations of Judaism. The whole Jewish outlook is marked by a deep-seated optimism. Judaism is fundamentally at peace with the world. It affirms life and existence and is determinately opposed to every form of other-worldliness. קֶּה יָדַר which plays such an important part in Rabbinic thought, is not the expression of renunciation of this world, but the longing for an improved form of present existence. Leo Baeck rightly regards this inveterate affirmation of life as a peculiarity of Judaism, which he calls "the religion of ethical optimism". Not that Judaism is unaware of the wrongs and tragedies of human existence. A denial of evil is impossible in face of the accumulation of Jewish experience. But Jewish optimism is founded upon the belief that evil is not a necessary prerequisite of life, but only a deficiency which man is in power of remedying. "The optimism of Judaism", says Baeck, "consists in a belief in the good which wills the good. It is the belief in God, and consequently the belief in man, in God through whom the good finds reality, and in man who is able to realise the good. All the ideas of Judaism can be traced back to it".

Now, in the opinion of some Christian writers, "the other-worldly aspect of Christianity needs to be balanced by the incorrigible optimism of the Jews with regard to this world..." That may be so. Pessimism which expresses itself in retreat and seclusion is alien to the Christian spirit. Christianity is also essentially optimistic. But its optimism springs from a different source. The basic note of the Easter message is victory, but not man's victory, it is God's victory. God's victory, however, is man's defeat. Not so to Judaism: here, man's victory is God's victory; it is man who helps God to triumph. It cannot be otherwise; any other position for Judaism would mean the denial of its fundamental proposition - the inherent self-sufficiency of man.

The difference here between Judaism and Christianity is fundamental. While to Judaism, sin is only a latent disposition or an acquirement easily corrected, to Christianity, sin is an all-pervading principle in life. It has cosmic significance and expresses itself in the human attitude of inward rebellion against God: Eritis sicut Deus (Gen. 3,5). In the Christian view, man stands as an usurper of God's glory and a rival to His power; he is thus guilty of high treason. Sin is a power which enslaves man, incapacitates his will, pushes him irresistibly towards evil and puts him in a state of utter helplessness. To the Church, man is sinful before he has yet done anything; to the Synagogue, man is sinful when he is full-of-sins. Consequently, in the eyes of the Church, even the best of men needs salvation; in the view of the Synagogue, the transgressor needs only amendment of life. Hence, Christianity speaks in terms of regeneration, Judaism in terms of moral conduct. What Strack-Billerbeck say about the old Synagogue well applies to Judaism in general: "Die altjüdische Religion ist hiernach eine Religion völliger Selbstlösung; für einen Erlöser-Heiland, der für die Sünden der Welt stirbt, hat sie keinen Raum".

5. Mediation.

The concept of sin determines the question as to the human approach to God. To Judaism, man's access entirely depends upon his moral integrity. (cf. Ps. 44,3ff). "The essence of Judaism is ethics". Or as Baeck puts it: "It is the right deed alone which always places man in the presence of God". The attention of the Synagogue is arrested upon man in his moral endeavour. It is for this reason that Judaism is unable to accept the doctrine of the Incarnation, for such a doctrine implies the need for mediation. Mediation, however, implies the inadequacy of the human effort to reach out Godwards. Judaism is founded on the premise that man is capable by virtue of his moral effort of approaching God. Hence, God's coming to man's aid, not only becomes superfluous, but actually interferes with the progress of human development.

To Judaism, the way from man to God is open. All that man needs is to amend his ways and return to God: "If he has sinned he is always able to become different, he is able to find his way back...he can hallow and purify himself again, he can make atonement." This possibility is not only a Jewish prerogative: "The righteous of all nations have a share in the world to come." Jewish writers are proud of this sentence and quote it frequently. The meaning of it is that not faith, but works decide. God judges man according to his deeds. Though man transgress and fall away from God, he never can fall so as not to be able to stand up again. The guarantee for his ability to rise is the Imago Dei, which man has imprinted upon his soul. Thus "the covenant of God with man is never broken"; contact between God and man is always possible: "Everybody can draw near to his God, and a way to God proceeds from every soul." It is no exaggeration to say, that the Synagogue's motto is: man is able.

This almost unlimited confidence in human ability, pervades the whole Jewish outlook. There is an interesting passage in Sanh. Rab said: All predestined dates (for Messiah's coming) have passed, and the matter (now) depends only on repentance and good deeds. But Samuel maintained: It is sufficient for a mourner to keep his (period of) mourning. H. Freedman explains Samuel's words to mean: "Israel's sufferings in the Galuth in themselves sufficiently warrant their redemption, regardless of repentance". Thus, Israel's redemption, in the opinion of both sages, actually depends on Israel himself. The only difference is that in one case it is Israel's repentance and in the other Israel's suffering that effects his redemption. But to both Rabbis, Israel himself is the decisive factor. Mediation, therefore, is foreign to the spirit of Judaism. Kaufmann Kohler rightly says: "Judaism recognizes in principle no mediatoryship between God and man". This directness of approach is a definite departure from the Old Testament position. It is here, if nowhere else, that we recognize the difference between the Synagogue and the Old Testament religion.

Mediation in the Old Testament plays an important part in religion. The priest, the prophet, the angels, who act as messengers of God, they all stand between sinful man and the Lord of Hosts. The Torah itself was received by Israel. This was still the view of the Old Synagogue. Philo's Logos, which assumes such importance in his conception of God, has its root, not only in Greek philosophy, but also in the Old Testament. It rests upon the principle that between God and man there is a gap. Judaism, however, with its characteristic predisposition towards the unitary view of life, and its emphasis upon human action, has gradually departed from the doctrine of mediation. An important factor will have been opposition to the teaching of the Church, which made mediation an absolute necessity. There is a characteristic remark by Abraham ibn Ezra, which singularly well describes the Jewish tendency: "The angel that mediates between man and God is reason". Behind these words lies concealed the thought that man, by virtue of his God-given faculties, is able to bridge the gulf which divides him from his Creator. The whole trend of modern Jewish thought is in this direction.\textsuperscript{98}

How then does sinful man, we ask, find approach to the holy and invisible God? First, says Rabbi Wise, he must "find and understand the loftiest and surest standard of rectitude". This standard, Judaism finds in the Torah. The second step is exemplified in the words Israel spake at Sinai: "na'aseh venish'ma", "we will do and obey". In this manner man returns to God, and in doing so he "obliterates his own sins...he changes and reforms his character...he rises to the dignity of manhood..."\textsuperscript{99} Communication between man and God is made possible by the fact that man participates in God's spirit. The unity between them is therefore never broken. The Holy Spirit belongs as much to man as to God: "Der heilige Geist kann weder allein Gott, noch allein Mensch sein, noch aber etwa gar Gott und Mensch zugleich, sondern er ist ein Attribut beider Begriffe, vielmehr der Verbindung beider".\textsuperscript{100} In other words, Holy Spirit is not conceived in the sense of Hypostasis, but in terms of function; it is the result of the meeting between God and man. Cohen calls it "das Verbindungsglied der Korrelation". Relationship between God and man does not so much postulate the existence of the Holy Spirit, as the equality of partnership.\textsuperscript{101} The spirit comes into evidence, not only when God speaks to man, but also when man speaks to God. It is the self-same Spirit indwelling in both. The reason for declaring the spirit a function is obvious. The purpose is to exclude every form of mediation. "Vereinigung schliesst die Vermittlung aus" says Cohen.

Man occupies a position in the Jewish view which makes mediation not only superfluous, but unbearable. It is an intrusion which violates man's rights and injures his dignity. Righteousness, to Judaism, cannot be imputed, it must be attained. "Righteousness" says Rabbi Wise, "is the ability or state of man to live and act in exact conformity with the highest standard of rectitude within his reach". Judaism does not require the impossible of man; what it requires is within the sphere of human ability. Man is able to stand by himself, herein lies his dignity. "Nobody stands between him and God, no mediator or past event, no redeemer and no sacrament". The whole idea of vicarious atonement, Rabbi Wise declares is a "product of the Christianity of history". Neither in Scripture, nor in philosophy can he see the reason for it. The whole conception is directly opposed to Jewish thinking. "Was soll mir ein Gottmensch, wenn ich Gott selbst in mir habe?"

The gulf which divides man from God is of man's creation. Thus, only he himself can restore the divine-human relationship. By virtue of the Imago Dei dwelling in him, he is able to do so, if he wills. "Every man" says Miss Lazarus, "has to bridge the gulf himself"; nobody can do it for him. Man must do it himself by means of his moral endeavour. Here the divergence between Judaism and Christianity becomes very clear. These are two worlds diametrically opposed to each other. The XIIIth of the 39 Articles of the Church of England provides a classical example of the wide divergence between the two faiths: "Works done before the grace of Christ and the inspiration of His Spirit and not pleasant to God, for as much as they spring not of faith in Jesus Christ...Yea rather, for that they are not done as God willed and commanded them to be done, we doubt not but they have the nature of sin, (peccati rationem habere non dubitamus)".

In the Christian view, nothing therefore, no human endeavour, no good deeds can restore man to sonship. Sin is so grave that atonement can only be made by God himself. Jesus Christ stands as Mediator between man and God by virtue of His sacrificial death. The believer through faith identifies himself with the Crucified Saviour. There is no direct approach to God, it leads over Calvary. In Christ Jesus, God has stretched out His hand to save mankind. Underneath the Cross man stands condemned and pardoned; in it is revealed human helplessness and God's power, human sinfulness and God's eternal Love.

6. The Messiah.

From the preceding remarks, it is obvious that the Jewish conception of the Messiah must fundamentally differ from that of the Church.

To start with, it is well to remember that faith in a personal Messiah does not belong to the fundamental tenets of Judaism. This is the more curious when we consider that Maimonides has included it in the Creed which is still in use in our days, and that Jewish hopes were for centuries associated with the coming of Messiah. No doubt, in the old Synagogue, the Messianic hope was adhered to with great fervour, though Bousset has shown that in the pre-Christian era, the Messiah did not occupy as central a position as is usually assumed. It appears to us, however, that the apocalyptic literature must not be solely relied upon for our judgement concerning the Messianic views of that period. But even that literature contains enough evidence to show the place the Messiah occupied in Jewish thinking. At a later period, especially after the decline of the Hasmonean dynasty, the Messianic hope came to new life again. In the post-Christian era, it became the subject for many speculations, and Rabbinic literature is full of references to the Messianic age and the person of the Messiah. There are reasons, however, why the person of the Messiah was never emancipated so as to occupy a central place in Judaism. The first is an external reason, and is connected with the appearance of Christianity. Some Rabbinic sayings, like that of Johanan b. Torta, addressed to Akiba on his proclaiming Bar Kochba the Messiah: "Akiba, grass will sprout through your cheeks ere the son of David comes", may have been prompted by its rise. The context, however, makes this doubtful. A more likely case is that of Rabbi Hillel, who declared: "There shall be no Messiah for Israel, because they have already enjoyed him in the days of Hezekiah." This strange remark has been sometimes connected with the story recorded by Epiphanius about Hillel the Patriarch, who is supposed to have accepted baptism before his death. But it seems to us that Rabbi S. Mendelsohn's explanation is more plausible. He suggests that Hillel "may have been prompted to this declaration by Origen's professed discovery in the Old Testament of Messianic passages referring to the founder of Christianity."

In later times, Jewish views concerning the Messiah's functions have been greatly modified. This can be seen from Rashi's remark that the Almighty himself will redeem Israel and reign over him. This can also be seen from Maimonides' utmost caution in describing the position of the Messiah: "The king who is to arise out of the seed of David will be wiser than Solomon and he will be a great prophet near (בנין) unto Moses our Rabbi." The second reason is of an internal nature. The hegemony of the Law conflicts with the idea of a Messiah who may command supreme authority. Even the Messiah, can only occupy a place near Moses and is under obligation to obey and keep the commandments. The Targum already conveys this idea plainly. The Rabbis spoke of the מנה ערא, but the Messiah's Torah was essentially Moses' Torah. The abrogation of the Torah by the Messiah is totally alien to the Rabbinic view. Strack-Billerbeck observe:
"eine solche Annahme ist von vornherein durch den feststehenden Glaubenssatz ausgeschlossen, dass die Tora Moses, wie sie seit Ewigkeit präexistiierte, so auch Israel für alle Ewigkeit gegeben sei, so dass niemand das Recht habe, ihr etwas hinzuzufügen oder von ihr etwas wegzunehmen". The Messiah not only obeys the Torah, but also studies it and expounds it. In the days of the Messiah, the Torah will assume new significance and will be universally obeyed, the theatres and circuses of Edom will be turned into schools of study. Thus, the centrality of the Torah in Jewish thought has forced the Messiah into the background. This has already been recognized by Albo. "Der Glaube an den Messias, sagt Albo, würde der fundamentalen Heilsdeutung des Gesetzes Eintragung": "Das nomistische Prinzip" as Weber calls it, determined Jewish Christology. The supremacy and the immutability of the Torah which is fundamental for Rabbinic thinking, has necessarily forced Jewish theology to assign to the Messiah a secondary place.

Nevertheless, hope in Messiah's coming and the establishment of a Messianic Age played an important part in Jewish life and worship and still sways the imagination of Jewry. It forms the backbone of Jewish eschatology. It must be remembered, however, that the Rabbis have never worked out a consistent and systematic theory concerning the Messiah, his person, his coming and his reign. Their ideas are confused, often contradictory and vague.
On the whole, it may be said that Rabbinic notions connected with the coming of the Messiah show more signs of the play of imagination than of serious theological thinking. Against modern Liberal views, however, it may be safely affirmed that the Rabbis never attached the Messianic Age from the person of the Messiah. The two were inseparable. They conceived the Messiah, not as an ideal, but as a real historical person. The Messianic function, however, was conceived to be primarily political. His chief mission was to free Israel from bondage. Klausner's description well states the case: "The Jewish Messiah", he says, "is above all a redeemer of his nation from subservience to foreign rulers". That this was the case can be seen from Akiba's behaviour towards Bar Kochba. It is, however, noteworthy that not all the Rabbis shared Akiba's enthusiasm. No doubt, the Synagogue expected more than political leadership from the Messiah. Even Klausner admits so much.

Dr. S. Schechter has worked out four main points under which the Rabbinic ideas concerning the Messianic Age can be summarised; these notions reveal their view concerning the person of the Messiah himself. All the other features attached to the Messiah by various Rabbis are only of secondary importance. They are of a mystical nature (like the preexistence of the Messiah, the creation of his name before the creation of the world, etc.), and have never seriously affected Judaism. Dr. A. Cohen rightly remarks: "The Talmud nowhere indicates a belief in a superhuman Deliverer as the Messiah". Dr. Schechter's points are: 1) The Messiah is a descendent of the house of David and his purpose is to restore the kingdom of Israel and extend it over the whole world. 2) In a last terrible battle the enemies of God will be defeated and destroyed. 3) The establishment of Messiah's Kingdom "will be followed by the spiritual hegemony of Israel, when all nations will accept the belief in the unity of God, acknowledge his Kingdom and seek instruction from the law". 4) The Messianic Age will bring material and spiritual happiness, death will disappear and the dead will rise. For the sake of clarity, however, it must be added, that the Messianic concepts of the Rabbis contain other important elements. One of the most striking is that of suffering. The passages referring to the suffering Messiah have been studiously collected by Strack and Billerbeck in their great Commentary. The most striking of these which show remarkable likeness to the Christian conception of vicarious suffering come from the Pesikta Rabbathi. But three things must be born in mind:

1) Though the Rabbis were acquainted with the thought of sacrificing one's life "whether voluntarily or involuntarily for the sake and the benefit of others", vicarious suffering on the part of the Messiah was unknown to them. 2) The occasional allusions to a suffering Messiah have a definite nationalistic colouring. It is Strack's and Billerbeck's opinion that "nur Israel's Stunde schüttelt der Messias. Der Gedanke, dass der Messias die Stunde der Welt, also auch die der NichtIsraeliten, trägt (Jn.1,29), begegnet uns nirgends in der altrabbinischen Literatur". With this statement Mr. Montefiore is inclined to agree. 3) The Messinaic Kingdom of the future is, according to Rabbinic views, essentially this-worldly. It is a Kingdom within history and time and is ultimately superseded by the final end.

We see then, that whatever similarity there might be between the Jewish and the Christian conceptions of the Messiah and the Messianic Age on three most vital points they totally differ. The Christian faith is founded upon the belief in the vicarious suffering of the Messiah; this suffering benefits all nations; the Messianic Kingdom, though conceived to take place upon earth, is not totally of this world, it brings history to an abrupt conclusion and starts a New Order. But there is a further point of even greater importance. In Christian faith, the Messiah occupies a central position. He commands obedience, he makes claims upon loyalty, he forgives sin, he mediates between man and God, he redeems men, he renews their spirit, he reveals God's love. And furthermore, this Messiah is identified with a historical person whose name is Jesus of Nazareth.

The divergence between Liberal Judaism and orthodox Christianity is even greater.

Liberal Jewish theology has completely abandoned the idea of a personal Messiah. Leo Baeck, a typical representative of Liberal thinking, interprets the Prophetic conception of the Messiah as a symbolic form of speech. He explains that Hebrew genius being averse to the abstract form of expression invested in a concrete person the Messianic ideal. But later, Judaism shifted the emphasis from the person upon the time: it began to speak more of "the days of the Messiah" and of "the Kingdom of God" than of the Messiah himself. Thus, Liberal Judaism has completed the process of evolution. It detached the Messianic ideal from the person of the Messiah, and looks forward to the realisation of the Messianic Age. "The future man", says Rabbi I. M. Wise, "will need no Messiah..." To Liberal Judaism, the Kingdom of God is no gift from Heaven, it is the result of the slow but steady progress of humanity. It is brought about by "die unausgesetzte Arbeit der Menschheit an sich selbst". The establishment of the Kingdom depends on the final triumph of human reason and the highest human aspirations; "it is not given, but achieved". The Kingdom of God is not God's Kingdom, but man's Kingdom where God has been made King.

It is obvious, that though the orthodox and Liberal conceptions regarding the Messianic Age appear to differ on a vital point, in essence they are agreed. With the Messiah or without the Messiah, to Judaism, the Kingdom of God is in our hands, it is for us to establish it upon this earth. The idea that Israel himself is the Messiah is not far removed from the Jewish mind. Dr. II. Kohler will meet with approval from many on the orthodox side, that the Kingdom of God is not the work of an individual Messiah but of Israel as a whole. Kohler says: "Deutero-Isaiah stated it for all time, Israel, the Servant of God, the Messiah of the nations, working amid woe and suffering", will ultimately bring "the divine Kingdom of righteousness and peace on earth".

7. The Torah.

Felix Perles, in a short essay on, Die Autonomie der Sittlichkeit im jüdischen Schriftum, points out that the importance of Herman Cohen's work lies in showing that the concept of moral autonomy stands in opposition to religion, and therefore also to Judaism. The writer traces the anomaly to the Philonian influence upon Rabbinic thinking. He holds that the Rabbis did not realise the existing contradiction "zwischen Philos Lehre von der Autonomie der Sittlichkeit und der jüdischen Anschauung von Gott als dem alleinigen Gesetzgeber..." A contradiction, which when thought out to the last consequences, destroys the very basis of religious faith. Naïvely enough, Perles thinks that the Rabbis could not have been aware of this fact before Kant had explained the meaning of "autonomy". But to regard this phenomenon as a mere result of faulty thinking appears to us to overlook the whole nature of Judaism. The autonomy of ethics in Jewish thinking has its roots not in speculative metaphysics, but in the concrete conception of man. The absolute validity of the moral act vis à vis to God postulates freedom on the part of man and therefore the autonomy of ethics. The whole structure of Jewish religious thinking depends upon it. The depreciation of the validity of moral action strikes at the foundations of Judaism, underlying which is the conception of Law and justice.

Jewish scholars have rightly protested against the erroneous view that "Torah" and "Law" are synonyms. Torah is a much wider and more comprehensive conception than the word מosaic conveys.

"The legalistic element", says Dr. S. Schechter, "which might rightly be called the Law, represents only one side of the Torah". Torah itself covers the whole sphere of Judaism, as it expresses itself both in doctrine and practice. Torah, then, is the Norm against which Jewish life is measured, and it fulfils, in a sense, the purpose the dogmas do in the Church. But here lies a significant difference. H. Loewe has with fine insight recognized that the difference between Judaism and Christianity expresses itself in that the former insists upon orthopraxy and the latter upon orthodoxy. Behind this fact lies concealed the gulf which divides the two faiths.

Jewish scholars often dwell upon the peculiarity of the Church in that it insists upon orthodoxy, i.e., the adherence to a creed and to dogmas. That Judaism, however, has no dogmas, is a view which has been repudiated by Dr. S. Schechter. There is, however, a good deal of truth in H. Loewe's statement. The main emphasis in Judaism is upon the right deed. Leo Baeck hardly exaggerates when he says: "Judaism too, has its Word, but it is one word only - "to do"; hence the multiplicity of commandments. They all pursue the same end - the guiding of human life into the channel of right action. It is through the medium of the moral act that the Jew finds his approach to God. Indeed, Baeck goes as far as to say that obedience to the law of God is prior to any comprehension of God himself. It is only when men become conscious of the moral unity that they can comprehend the unity of God. It is from such insistence upon the right deed that the Law is put in its proper perspective.

The significance of Torah as Law and Commandment is the most characteristic feature of Judaism. It is for this reason that Moses occupies an unique position in Rabbinic thought, and that the Pentateuch stands above the rest of the Canon. What Weber says about the Scriptures in general applies primarily to the הֵדְנַמִּי: it is the norma normans of all Rabbinic thinking. The Torah is looked upon as the greatest and most perfect gift that God has bestowed upon Israel. In it is embodied "the will and purpose, of the perfect God, perfect in Wisdom, perfect in righteousness, perfect in lovingkindness". It forms the sure guide under all conditions of life and its purpose is the purification and the sanctification of men. Israel, therefore, owes his loyalty to the Torah, and he expresses his obedience by keeping the Commandments. By doing so he ratifies the covenant established at Mount Sinai between the chosen people and the God of Israel. Thus, the Torah occupies a central place in the Jewish faith.

The Chief Rabbi, Dr. Hertz, in a recent speech, said with great emphasis, that the second fundamental principle of Judaism (the first being the Unity of God) was Morality and Law. "It proclaimed the Divine origin of the Moral Law; that there was an everlasting distinction between right and wrong, an absolute 'Thou shalt' and 'Thou shalt not' in human life, a categorical imperative in religion..." This connection between moral action and faith in God is upheld by Christianity as well as by Judaism. St. Paul's antinomy between faith and work has never been understood by the Church as a dispensation from the human obligation to do right. It seems to us that Schoeps misrepresented St. Paul's position, when he implied that the Apostle misunderstood the purpose of the Law, namely the sanctification of the will of God. Schoeps' well chosen passages to show that the Rabbis too knew of the value and greatness of faith, have nothing to do with the main issue. The Apostle would have been the last to deny to the Synagogue the claim to the possession of faith.\footnote{161} There is also no hint in the Epistles of St. Paul to show that he repudiated the right of the Law to make demands upon men. On the contrary, he affirms the divine origin and the justice of the Law:\footnote{162} to him the Law is the Law of God.\footnote{163} He too knows, that not the hearers, but the doers of the Law shall be justified.\footnote{164}

The extent of the misunderstanding on the Jewish side can be gathered from Montefiore's suggestion that the antinomy between the Jewish emphasis upon works and the Christian emphasis upon faith may be combined in a synthesis for "we need them both: each possesses its measure of truth". Montefiore continues: "I cannot help believing that this old point of difference between Judaism and Christianity may gradually be done away with. Each will recognize that the fuller truth lies in a combination of doctrines hitherto thought opposed and alien to each other."\footnote{165} To this we may ask: did the Apostle Paul, and does the Church ever oppose faith to work in the sense that one excludes the other? Such an allegation we would emphatically deny. There is no antinomy between faith and work; this is made impossible by the fact that in the Christian view, they both belong to different spheres. In Christian thought, faith and work are held separate, the one relating to God, the other to human relationship. Herein lies the duality at the heart of Christian thinking to which Benzion Kellerman draws attention.\footnote{166} Such duality is conditioned by the singular position which Jesus Christ occupies in the Church.

Man's relationship to God depends, in the Christian view, not upon right action, but upon a right attitude to Jesus Christ. This is the meaning of Faith in the Pauline epistles: a striking example is offered by the strange phrase in Gal.3,23 & 25: \[\text{πρὸ τοῦ δὲ ἔλθειν τὴν πίστιν... ἔλθουόνς δὲ τῆς πίστεως...}\]
Paul does not mean to imply that before the appearance of Christ there was no faith, but that faith now centres in the person of the Messiah. Herein lies the reason for the characteristic emphasis upon the creed, which Kohler calls the conditio sine qua non of the Christian Church. The creed, as the intellectual deposit of faith, is the only criterion, whether a man affirms or denies the claims the Church makes for Jesus of Nazareth.

But there is still one further point to be considered.

Montefiore severely criticises Christian theologians for presenting Judaism as a religion of external Law-observance and Lohnsucht. This mistaken view has arisen from the position which the Law occupies in Judaism. Montefiore himself agrees with Weber that the Law forms the centre of the Jewish religion: "All radiates out from the Law, and from it all depends". The supremacy of the Law goes right through the whole history of Judaism. Even in Hermann Cohen's religious philosophy, the emancipation of religion from ethics has not taken place. Cohen was not able to overcome the supremacy of the Law as completely as Felix Perles seems to imply. Faith and Law, religion and ethics are intertwined to a degree which makes any attempt at separation impossible. This utter dependence of religion upon ethics puts man in a position of independence vis-à-vis to God, which in the Christian view is nothing else but rebellion, for it ultimately implies that man is able to stand before God on his own merits. This the Church categorically denies.

Schoeps rightly regards St. Paul's assumption that man is unable of himself to keep the Law as alien to the spirit of Judaism. "Jeder Jude", says Dienemann, "ist der Überzeugung, dass 'Glaube an die sittliche Kraft des Menschen' und 'Gesetz', dessen Erfüllung diesen Glauben bestätigen soll, unauflasslich miteinander verbunden sind". It is here that the difference reveals itself. The discussion, as throughout, turns round man's position before God. To the Synagogue, man appears as an independent agent capable of holding his own: Thou canst, is its constant cry. Pauline theology, on the other hand, begins with the assumption that man is unable to keep the Law; he thus stands condemned before God. God in His mercy, however, and herein lies the meaning of the Gospel, sent His Son to die for sinners: "While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5,8). It is thus that God becomes the Judge of the ungodly (Rom. 4,5). Rom.10,4: τέλος ἡ ἐνσήμων Χριστὸς εἰς δίκαιον...does not imply, therefore, arbitrary abrogation of the Law on the part of the Apostle. The end of the Law is in its completion, in the fact that God has accomplished on behalf of man, what man was unable to do for himself. The "righteousness" of the believer is not his own, he owes it to God, through the Messiah. Kohler says that loyalty to the Torah is an "all-penetrating principle of the Synagogue". What the Jew owes to the Torah, the Christian owes to Jesus Christ. But the difference lies, not merely between loyalty to a person and loyalty to a code. Underneath the Cross, man stands in the position of crisis, asking for grace: under the Scrolls of the Law, man stands in a position of self-assertiveness, giving his best. Thus the difference between Judaism and Christianity lies in the difference of attitude.

8. Revelation.

The connection between Torah and Revelation is obvious. Traditional Judaism has always claimed faith in Revelation as a fundamental tenet of the Synagogue. The inference from the principle of Revelation is the immutability of the Law. Maimonides, Ha-dai, Albo and others regard this an essential belief of Judaism. The rigidity which such a tenet would inevitably impose upon Jewish thinking has been remedied by the conception of tradition.
Next to the written Law (תורה.Enums) is the Oral Law, (תלמוד); in the orthodox view, both originating from Moses and enjoying equal sanctity. This principle of oral tradition accompanying the written Law provides Judaism with the possibility of growth and adaptability to circumstances. The rational tendency and the idea of progress are thus organically connected with the concept of revelation. This wide conception of Torah is already present in the teaching of the old Synagogue. When two schools of thought like that of Hillel and Shammai differed on a vital point, both claiming the right to Halachah, the Talmud simply declared both right: "All words come from the same shepherd". The Rabbis worked on the principle that the words of the Torah "are fruitful and multiply". Torah thus assumes a much wider meaning than the principle of immutability would imply. Indeed, the Rabbis went so far as to maintain that all which was to be taught in the future was already communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai: "The doctrines of the Rabbis were the harvest from the seed which was sown at the time of the original Revelation".

This fluid and broad conception of revelation lends to Judaism an unique power of adjustment to the ever changing concepts in human development. All manifestations of the human spirit, all wisdom, all philosophy, all science, become thus, as it were, a diffusion of Torah, being related to the revelation of God. Once again we meet here the underlying principle of unity between God and the world. The totalitarian tendency of Judaism to extend religion to all spheres of life springs from this source. The division between the secular and the holy, the material and the spiritual, is thus reduced to a minimum. The connection between Spinoza's philosophy and the Jewish conception of revelation, becomes evident. There is an undeniable pantheistic strain in Judaism which manifests itself in the narrow margin separating God from man. Hermann Cohen, who is determined to draw a clear dividing line between his ethical Monotheism and Spinoza's Pantheism, is only able to establish his case within the sphere of ethics. There is no denying that Spinoza's amor intellectualis and the categorical imperative derived from the Law of Moses differ both in intensity and quality. But it is significant that the dividing line appears most prominently within the sphere of ethics as nowhere else. The reason for this lies deeply embedded in the fibre of Judaism.

It is true that Judaism is deeply aware of God's transcendence; it is equally true that the Immanence of God is a vital element of Jewish piety. "Resting on this twofold anchorage", says Abelson, "Rabbinical Judaism was saved from destruction. Its outwardness and its inwardness were both necessary for its preservation". But the vital question which concerns us is by what means does the transcendent God become immanent? In other words; under what conditions does the finite meet with the Infinite? To this, Judaism has only one answer: man creates those conditions himself. By his piety, by his earnest endeavour, by his striving upwards, he reduces the distance which divides him from the Holy One. The immanence of God is thus obtained by intrusion: it is left to man to break down the barrier which keeps him separate from God.

The connection between the Jewish conception of Revelation and Spinoza's philosophy is not difficult to establish. The great philosopher in his Short Treatise on God, Man and his Wellbeing, asks the important question: how can God make himself known to man? Does it happen by means of the spoken word or by direct communication through himself? To this he answers: "we consider it to be unnecessary that it should happen through any other thing than the mere essence of God and the understanding of man: for, as the Understanding is that in us which must know God, and as it stands in such immediate union with him that it can neither be, nor be understood without him, it is incontrovertibly evident from this that no thing can ever come into such close touch with the Understanding as God himself can. Spinoza's point is that the affinity between the human and the divine Spirit is such that any intermediary instrument is not only unnecessary, but impossible: "Because we can never attain to the knowledge of God through any other thing, (i.e., works, miracles or any other created thing), the nature of which is necessarily finite...for how is it possible that we should infer an infinite and limitless thing from a finite and limited thing?" Only on the assumption, therefore, that man and God partake of the same infinity is revelation possible. The process itself takes place within the soul of man. With this we would like to compare the statement made by the great Jewish theologian Kaufmann Kohler. In his article on Revelation, in the Jewish Encyclopedia, he describes the process as "the gradual unfolding of the divine powers in man". The difference between Israel and the other nations lies in that the Jewish race "has been endowed with peculiar religious powers that fitted it for the divine revelation". In view of these two statements it is difficult to see how Dr. Kohler can assert that the essential feature of revelation "is not merely a psychological process in which the human imagination or mental faculty constitutes the main factor..." Can the "divine powers in man", we would ask, be legitimately segregated from the intellectual life of any individual? That Kohler's conception of revelation is purely subjective one and this in spite of his remark "that man is but the instrument upon which a superhuman force exerts its power", can be judged from his concluding remark. He finishes the article by saying: "Whether 'Torah' has not frequently a far broader and deeper meaning in the prophetic and other inspired books - denoting rather the universal law of human conduct, the Law of God as far as it is written upon the heart of man in order to render him a true son of God - is a question at issue between Orthodoxy and Reform".

The difference, however, between the Orthodox and Reformed conception of Torah is only a formal one. It turns round the position of the written Law within the wider concept of revealed Truth. While orthodoxy relates all truth in some way or another, to the Mosaic Law, Liberal Judaism does not hesitate to brush the Law aside when it conflicts with reason. Montefiore thus bluntly declares: "Liberal Judaism no longer teaches the eternal validity of the Pentateuchal laws or law; we teach a progressive religion, a progressive apprehension and unfolding of the will of God". But strange as it may seem, there is no essential difference between the Liberal and Orthodox view. We shall find this affirmed by the example of H. Loewe, who describes himself as an orthodox, but not a "fundamentalist".

In his introduction to the Rabbinic Anthology, he dwells upon the subject of Revelation. "Judaism", Mr. Loewe explains, "whether Orthodox or Liberal, old or modern, teaches that God's Law is universal as well as immutable. What is true in nature is true in religion: what is false in science cannot be true in religion. Truth is one and indivisible. God is bound by His own laws". Between Torah and the laws of nature there is then no essential difference. Not only the Holy Scriptures, says Mr. Loewe, but also history and archaeology "have been vouchsafed to us by Revelation". Revelation, he thus concludes, "is the silent imperceptible manifestation of God in history"; or to be more precise: "God in history is the definition of Revelation". If we ask in what relation then stands the Torah to this concept of revelation, Mr. Loewe has a twofold answer: 1) "Judaism regards the Torah as capable of expansion". He provides proof from Rab­ binic literature to show that this is by no means a novel view.
According to the Rabbis "God's word", we are told, "is not an antiquated \( \alpha \tau \delta \mu \alpha \), but one which is ever new, which men run

2) Side by side with the doctrine of the immutability of the Torah "there is in Judaism a basic principle of the most potent mutability, the doctrine of progress".

It is clear to us that Mr. Loewe has sufficiently demonstrated the essential unity between the Orthodox and the Liberal view.
On this subject, to use his own words again, "there is no difference between Liberal and Orthodox Jews". This fact is of the utmost importance as it warns us from drawing too clear a line of demarcation between the two schools of thought.

It is evident then that between the Jewish and the Christian conception of Revelation is a deep cleavage. The cleft appears not in the question as to the primacy of the Bible or value of Biblical criticism, but over the problem of history. In the Jewish view, history is essentially the manifestation or unfolding of God's will. It is on these grounds that Revelation and history can be linked up in one straight line. "In Judaism", says Leo Baeck, "the Kingdom of God is not a kingdom above the world, or opposed to it, or even side by side with it. It is rather the answer to the world...the reconciliation of its finiteness with its infiniteness". Between the kingdom of God and this world there is no qualitative difference, but only a difference of degree. Human history progressively unfolds God's purpose. All that happens within the experience of man serves a higher end. History becomes thus the supreme test of good and evil. What survives is good, what is unable to survive is evil.\textsuperscript{197} It is for this reason that thinkers, like Rosenzweig, Buber, Schoeps and others, have included Christianity within the general scheme of salvation. It withstood the test of history; it thus proved its value and is therefore God willed.\textsuperscript{199}

The Christian position, however, is diametrically opposed to such a view. Revelation, to the Christian Church, is not something that runs alongside the world, and certainly not something that merges with it, it is something that stands \textit{opposed} to it. The word of God is primarily a word of judgement, a condemnation of history. Between God and the world stands the Cross of Jesus Christ. The meaning of the Incarnation is that the continuity of history has been broken at a definite point. Whatever progress can mean for mankind, it \textit{cannot} mean that man is able to advance to a position beyond the place where Jesus Christ stood. In the Christian view, Revelation is thus concentrated in His person. The value of the Bible is in that it points to Him. It is for this reason that the Church could maintain the unity between the Old and the New Testament.\textsuperscript{200} The very fact that the Old and New Testaments were knit together into one whole refutes the view of a progressive unfolding of God in history. The idea of endless evolution is not merely excluded by the fact of the Canon, but by the position which Jesus Christ occupies in the Christian Faith.

The existence of a \textit{new} Testament, never meant to the Church that the \textit{old} one has been outgrown, but that it has reached its culminating point in the Messiah. In the words of Luther: "Chris-Schleiermacher's opinion, therefore, that Christianity is a new and different religion detached from the Old Testament does not represent the view of the historic Church. Mr. Davies' via media: Christianity grew out of Judaism, but "in the marvellous personality, life and teaching of Jesus, we have a new beginning..." also fails to understand the Christian point of view. His underlying principle is the idea of evolution which extends not only in the sphere of human existence, but to God's dealing with man. The view the Church has taken is perhaps best expressed in Prof. Macmurry's words: "Jesus is at once the culmination of Jewish prophecy and the source of Christianity. These are not two different aspects of the life of Jesus. They are the same things referred backwards into the past and forwards into the future".

Revelation as far as God's dealing with man is concerned, the Church finds not outside, but inside the Canon. The Canon forms, as it were, the periphery of Revelation, its centre being Jesus Christ. This unique position assigned to the Messiah runs contrary to the whole Jewish conception. "Jenes Wort aus dem brennenden Busch," says Buber, "Ich werde dasein als der, als der ich dasein werde" (d.h. als der ich jeweils dasein werde) macht es uns unmöglich, irgend etwas Einmaliges als die endgültige Offenbarung Gottes zu nehmen.

The reasons for objecting to the singling out of one person and attaching to him revelational significance are not difficult to find: 1) Jewish anthropology demands absolute equality of the human race. All men stand basically in the same relationship to God. At no point may the chain of humanity be broken. 2) The superiority of the Torah and Israel's unique position in the process of revelation cannot admit revelation to be vested in an in-individual person. 3) The concept of revelation understood in terms of continuous growth contradicts all claims to finality: "The richness of the religion is not contained in a single one... The whole content of Judaism truly lies in its unended and unending history".206

Modern Jewish thought deeply impressed by the idea of evolution, inevitably tends to deny absolute validity to religious values. The Christian emphasis upon the historical, the concrete, the individual, clashes with the basic principle of evolution.207 Herein, modern Judaism differs vitally from the old-Hebrew attitude to history. A-historical thinking, in terms of the general and the abstract is alien to the Bible. It always speaks in terms of concrete events. To regard the concrete individual case as a mere manifestation of the general and the abstract, a mere fraction of the pattern which is to evolve by way of endless evolution, is Greek and not Hebrew. It is for this reason that Greece had no real sense for the historical; instead of concrete history it developed an abstract mythology where the heroes of history became shadows or symbols of an idea.208

Christianity, by its very nature, is anchored in history. The Christian Messiah is not a mythological abstraction, but a historical person. He lived, taught, died at a definite moment in history. It is on behalf of a historical person that the Church makes stupendous claims. These claims have the nature of finality: there will never be a person to bring to mankind a fuller revelation or a greater Truth. It is on this issue that Judaism and Christianity part.
B. Israel and the nations.

Apart from the main theological issues already discussed, there is still one important problem to be considered. It concerns Israel's position in the world. The significance attached to Israel's election; the meaning of Jewish destiny; Jewish close proximity to the Bible; the Jewish position in the history of Revelation; the Jewish claim to the sole heirship of the prophetic tradition; are factors which have vitally determined the structure of Jewish thought.

It is not possible to understand Jewish thinking without paying full attention to the basic principle underlying all Jewish theology: Israel's unique and singular position in the history of mankind. The division, therefore, between the Church and the Synagogue opens a far wider issue than can be expressed in terms of theology. It concerns the very existence of the Jewish people. Israel's opposition to the Church is dictated by something more elemental than theological divergency; namely, by the instinct of self-preservation. The Christian claims are such that the whole meaning of Jewish destiny is at stake. The existence of the Church throws a threatening shadow upon Jewish life. Two vital factors are here involved: 1) The spiritual destiny of Israel; 2) The safety of Israel's national life.

The relationship between Jewish separate existence and Israel's spiritual significance is such that a threat to either is a threat to both. In the Jewish view, Judaism and Jewish nationhood are interdependent; there is no Judaism without the Jewish people, and there is no Jewish people without Judaism. The modern distinction between religion and nationhood is for three reasons inapplicable to the Jewish situation: a) The unitary tendency of Judaism allows of no separation between the religious and the secular; b) the political position of Jewry makes religion the only, unifying factor of Jewish life; c) Jewish experience as a scattered minority has shown that any loosening of the religious bond opens a wide door to assimilation. But the disappearance of Israel amongst the nations is tantamount to the betrayal of his spiritual vocation. Israel and Israel's message are inseparable; the message is vested in the people and the people exists by the message. Israel, in order to fulfill his historical vocation, must exist. It may be observed, however, that the Liberal Synagogue, especially in England and America, has made strenuous efforts to overcome the national implications of Judaism. Whether it will be able to survive in the recast, universalistic form only the future will show. Older Liberal theologians like Kaufmann Kohler and Leo Baeck, recognized the indivisible unity between the people and the message, and have thus held to the doctrine of Israel's unique significance amongst the nations of the world. We will now turn to consider the Synagogue's attitude to the nations and its teaching about Israel.

1. Jewish universalism.

The question whether Judaism is a universalistic or particularistic religion has been discussed at great length in recent years. Christian writers have adduced evidence from Jewish sources to prove the particularistic attitude of Judaism. Jewish writers have, from the same sources given proof of the opposite. The undeniable fact is that both tendencies exist side by side in the Synagogue. To a large extent, Jewish feeling towards the other nations was governed by the circumstances under which the Jews lived. Montefiore's contention that the real attitude of the Rabbis must not be judged from isolated instances, but against the general historical background to which they belong, is a just plea.
There is still a further point to be considered. It has been the practice of Christian scholars to contrast Rabbinic teaching with that of the New Testament. But Montefiore rightly contests the fairness of such a comparison. The counterpart to Rabbinic writings, he points out, is not the classical literature of the New Testament, but that of the Church Fathers. This is an important point worth bearing in mind.

To deny to Judaism a strong universalistic tendency, as some Christian scholars have done, is to overlook the mass of evidence contained in Rabbinic literature. The concern with the Gentile world is much older than the Synagogue and goes back to the Prophets of Israel. Is.19,29f where Israel is given the third place standing side by side with Egypt and Assyria his hereditary enemies, is the finest testimony to prophetic universalism. A similar spirit permeates many of the psalms. From the New Testament writings, we know that the Jews busied themselves with what we would now call Foreign Missions. It may well be that it was the missionary need which led to the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures. When Paul went out with the Gospel message, he found a well prepared field; the pioneer work had already been done by Jewish teachers and missionaries. The debt the Church owes in this respect to the Synagogue is inestimable. The Rabbis in later centuries often showed a similar concern for the Gentile world. Such an attitude was not only prompted by the prophetic spirit of the Scriptures, but was implicit in the monotheistic faith of Judaism. The God of Israel, being the One and Holy God, was inevitably the Lord of the Gentiles also. There is the touching sentiment expressed by R. Johanan, who declared that God does not rejoice over the downfall of the wicked: When the ministering angels wanted to sing a hymn at the destruction of Egypt, God said:
"My children lie drowned in the sea, and you would sing?"  216

By its very nature, Judaism was at first a religion deeply rooted in nationhood. The history of the Jewish people was at the same time the history of its religion. Their customs were religious customs and therefore national; their book was a national book and therefore religious. Prof. Moore has pointed out: "The Jews were both in their own mind and in the eyes of their Gentile surrounding, and before the Roman law, not adherents of a peculiar religion, but members of a nation.  217" It was as such that they carried with them wherever they went their religion and their mode of life. But Prof. Moore has drawn attention to a peculiar feature which is of great importance in the development of Judaism. The fact that the ger who previously was an advena in Jewish territory, becomes after the fall of the Kingdom an advena to the Jewish religion, testifies, not only to the change of political circumstances, but to an important change in the outlook of Judaism.  218 Dr. A. Marmorstein has noted the fact that the word Olam at a certain period of Jewish history which cannot be chronologically fixed, changed its meaning from the restricted sense as used in the Bible to its world-wide signification in Rabbinic writings. This inner change in the word Olam, testifies to a change in Hebrew thinking in the direction of universalism.  219

Characteristic of the spirit of some Rabbis are the often quoted words of R. Simeon ben Azzai. Against R. Akiba's suggestion that love to one's neighbour is the greatest principle of the Torah, Ben Azzai said that the words in Gen. 5,1 "This is the book of the generations of Adam...in the likeness of God made he him", contains a still greater principle. The inference being that the common origin of humanity imposes the duty of mutual love.  220 Leo Baeck makes the following claim for Judaism which will not easily be refuted: "Judaism created the fellow-man or neighbour, and with it the conception of humanity in its true sense...In Judaism, neighbour is inseparable from 'man'". This, of course, is an over-statement in that far as it includes all exponents of Judaism. But that many Rabbis have taken so noble a view cannot be questioned. The fact that such lofty views were often held in spite of the adverse circumstances under which Jews had to live, enhances their nobility in the eyes of mankind. It must also be borne in mind that the distance which separated the faithful Jew from his heathen neighbour was not conducive to an universalistic outlook. The natural feeling of superiority both by reason of the great spiritual tradition and the moral purity when compared with heathen life, must have made it very difficult indeed for the Jew to regard the pagan as his equal.

Nevertheless, if in the eyes of the pious Jew, his pagan neighbour could hardly be his equal, it must be said to the credit of Judaism that it made honest attempts to raise him to equality. Prof. Moore has stressed that the principle of absolute equality between the ger and the born Israelite runs right through the traditional law. The moment the Gentile underwent circumcision and baptism, he was duly received into the religious community, "having all the legal rights and powers and being subject to all the obligations of the Jew by birth". Even if he lapsed afterwards, he was still looked upon as an apostate Jew and not as a heathen. It is true that we sometimes meet with slighting references to proselytes. It was alleged that they cause misfortune, that they postpone the coming of the Messiah, that they are like leprosy to Israel. But these sentiments are easily explained by the inevitable disappointments that accompany all missionary efforts. On the other hand, the נָּעַם was held in great esteem; he was looked upon as specially beloved by God; he was to be treated with deference; his origin was not to be cast in his teeth; his failings were to be borne patiently. The Midrash contains the touching parable about a stag which joined the king's herd. The king was told about it; but he felt affection for the stag and ordered that he be treated with special care. When the servants enquired the reason for his special affection for a wild creature, the king explained: "The flock have no choice; whether they want or not it is their nature to graze in the field and to come in at even to sleep in the fold. The stags, however, sleep in the wilderness. It is not in their nature to come into places inhabited by man. Shall we then not count it as a merit to this one which has left behind the whole of the broad, vast wilderness, the abode of all the beasts, and has come to stay in the courtyard?" The Midrash continues: "In like manner, ought we not to be grateful to the proselyte who has left behind him his people and all the other peoples of the world, and has chosen to come to us?" It is for this reason that God provides the Proselyte with special protection and exhorts Israel to do likewise. "The names of the proselytes", said the Holy One, blessed be He, "are as dear to me as the wine of libation which is poured out upon the altar." "

God gave the Torah to Israel, not for the purpose of keeping it to himself, but of sharing it with the Gentiles. This is the meaning of the comment to Is. 45:19: God did not wait to give the Torah until Israel entered the Holy Land, but gave it in the wilderness, lest Israel claim it for himself and exclude the nations. The Gentiles, too, have a claim upon it: R. Jeremiah said: Whence can you know that a Gentile who practises the Law is equal to the High Priest? Because it says: "Which if a man do he shall live through them". (Lev. 18, 5). And it (also) says: "This is the Torah of man" (2 Sam. 7, 19). It does not say the Torah of Priests, Levites, Israelites, but Torath ha-Adam... And it does not say: "Open the gates, and let the Priests and Levites and Israelites enter", but it says: "Open the gates that a 157 may enter" (Is. 26, 2).

In Pirke de Rabbi Eliezer, there is the following eschatological reference: "Ten kings ruled from one end of the world to the other"; "The first King was the Holy One, blessed be he". The second king was Nimrod; the third king was Joseph; the fourth Solomon; the fifth was Ahab; the sixth was Nebuchadnezzar; the seventh was Cyrus; the eighth king was Alexander of Macedonia; the ninth King is King Messiah, "who in the future will rule from one end of the world to the other." The tenth king will restore the sovereignty to its owner. He who was the first king will be the last king, as it is said: 'Thus saith the Lord, the King... I am the first and the last; and beside me there is no God', and it is written: 'and the Lord shall be king over all the earth'. In this passage, we receive a glimpse of the Rabbinic vision which was based upon the faith of the ultimate vindication of God's righteousness and the extension of His Kingdom over the whole world. The passage reveals close affinity with the Pauline hope when God will be τὰ πάντα ἐν πάσῃ τῇ ἔκδοσι (1 Cor. 15, 28).

We may, therefore, say with some assurance, that Israel's Messianic hope had always a universal aspect. In the Messianic Age, the Gentile world will join the true worshippers of God. Meanwhile, it was incumbent upon the faithful Jew to preach repentance and to make proselytes. "By these means", says Schechter, "the Kingdom of Heaven, even in its connection with Israel, expands into the universal Kingdom to which sinners and Gentiles are invited". Here, however, one important feature must be noticed. The Kingdom of God is closely connected with the triumph of Israel. Not until the Jewish people has regained its freedom and established the divine order in the Holy Land, can salvation come to the rest of the world: "Israel is the microcosm in which all the conditions of the kingdom are to find concrete expression".

Not before redemption has come to Israel, can it come to the world; until then, even the Shechinah is in exile.

2. Jewish particularism.

It is an undeniable fact that side by side with the universalistic outlook runs a strong particularistic trait through the whole history of Judaism. Jewish scholars have tried to explain it, and we take full knowledge of the suggestions they make. The fact, however, remains with all its consequences. There is no necessity to refute Dr. A. Cohen's statement, that "in all the sphere of morals", the Rabbinic outlook, "was universal and not national". The point is that it is not in the moral sphere that Jewish particularism appears. Its roots are to be sought in the consciousness of the Jewish people. In the Rabbinic view, the difference between the Jew and the Gentile arose, not merely from the difference of moral standards. It is true that to the Rabbis the Torah made a fundamental difference between Israel and the nations. "Torahless universalism" as Schechter calls it, would have been abhorrent to the leaders of the Synagogue. It is equally true, that to the Rabbis, Israel was not a nation in the ordinary sense. It was not race, but the Torah that made Israel a people. This fact of spiritual prerogative, however, was not always interpreted in the sense of special grace, but of merit. The Gentile world refused the Torah, while Israel accepted it. There was a certain unspecified inherent quality in Jewish blood, a connection with the Patriarchs, a special favouritism on the part of God, which placed Israel in a singular and unique position. The best the Gentile could do was to join Israel, but he could not become Israel.

Prof. Moore explains that "equality in law and religion does not necessarily carry with it complete social equality", and that "the Jews would have been singularly unlike the rest of mankind if they had felt no superiority to their heathen converts". It was for this psychological reason that the Proselytes were put at the end of the list in Jewish society. Indeed, sometimes so low that they ranked lower than bastards and Nithinim (descendants of old Temple-slaves) and only above the heathen slaves who had been freed by their Jewish masters. Social conventions are certainly persistent and must not be made the criterion of religious standards. There are, however, deeper reasons which affected the Jewish attitude to the Gentile world.

It is essential to bear in mind that in the Jewish view, between Israel and the Nations, there existed an abyss, which could not be bridged. There could be no compromise between Israel and the Gentiles, as there could be no compromise between the God of Israel and the idols. Faithfulness to God already implied hostility to idolatry, and therefore to idolaters. The harsh sayings against Gentiles are primarily prompted by religious scruples. There was something so terrible in idolatry for the Jewish mind, that to conceive the possibility of a radical change within the lifetime of one generation was impossible. "We do not believe a proselyte until seven generations (have passed), so that the waters should not return to their source". A Jew could under no circumstances marry a non-Jew. There was no social intercourse between them: "for whosoever eateth with an uncircumcised person is as though he were eating flesh of abomination". If a Jew showed kindness to a Gentile, it was only Faithfulness to Judaism required a measure of hostility towards the pagan world. To this must be added the important point that the Gentiles, who by reason of their idolatry, were enemies to the God of Israel, were also, by reason of their political superiority, enemies to God's people. Guignebert affirms with good reason that even in cases where the Messianic ideal tended towards universalism, "its fundamental idea was still the restoration of Israel, that is to say, the triumph of Jewish nationalism." This was only natural, for in the Jewish view, the triumph of Israel was tantamount to the triumph of God. The primary function of the Messiah, the true son of David, was the restoration of Israel's independence and the defeat of his enemies. Maimonides quotes the Talmudic saying: "There is no difference between this world (i.e. as it is now) and the days of the Messiah, except only submission to (foreign) government." It must not be overlooked that Jewish universalism was crippled by the growing hostility of the Roman Empire and the tragic end of national life. It is for this reason that the universalist utterances of the Old Testament have been given a restricted meaning.

Bousset admits that Judaism was conscious of a world-mission, but he holds it was hindered by its deeply rooted nationalism. The only way, therefore, to reach out to the heathen world was to join the Gentiles to Israel: "wer wirklich zur jüdischen Religion übertrat, wurde Jude." It was in this peculiar form of universalism that the Synagogue differed from the Church. Both were conscious of a message and both made claims upon the Gentile world. But while Christianity, thanks to the labours of St. Paul, became completely detached from nationhood, Judaism could not afford to be so. The Jewish message could therefore only come to the Gentile world in its national dress. The reasons for this lie deeply rooted in Jewish history. But two main factors must be mentioned in order to account for the course Judaism had taken.

a) The national motive.

It is a peculiar fact about Judaism, that religion and nationality are inseparably welded together. This characteristic feature which almost creates the impression of tribalism, is not only explained by the tendency of Monotheism towards the total unification of life. The religious development of the Synagogue must be placed against its proper political background to do full justice to it. It must be constantly borne in mind that Judaism has laboured under abnormal political conditions. The Rabbis who faithfully watched over the Synagogue were not only the religious leaders, but also the guardians of national life. Only at the expense of deeply-cherished principles could Jewish life continue. Everything that served towards preservation of the Jewish people became hallowed by religion. Judaism became the means of preserving the Jewish people. While in natural circumstances, Israel would have lived for his religion, under abnormal conditions, Israel's religion became subservient to Israel's national existence. Such use of religion for the purpose of nationalism could have only taken place where the national and the religious cause were looked upon as identical. But such was the case in Judaism: the people of God and the God of the people were inseparably united. Subservience of the religious to the national cause was no departure from the main principles of Judaism. It may well be doubted whether the Rabbis were even conscious of the fact. To them, the preservation of Israel's identity was a religious task. They therefore never hesitated to use religion as the most potent means for the preservation of national life. It is for this reason that the demands of Judaism aim primarily at national pres-servation.\textsuperscript{151}

b) The Jewish religious consciousness.

We have observed already that, according to the Rabbis, Israel occupies an unique and singular position. The Jewish people differs from all other peoples upon earth. Such a view was, in the first place, prompted not by an exaggerated form of nationalism, but by the religious consciousness of the Synagogue. God's dealings with Israel have both national and religious significance.
God called His people; He saved it from the house of bondage; He gave it His Torah; He brought it to the Promised Land; He was and is Israel's King. is a familiar phrase in the Synagogue's liturgy.\textsuperscript{152}

To have Abraham as a Father, to claim God's promises, to keep His Commandments, to belong to the commonwealth of the Chosen People, were the religious prerogatives of the Jew. The fact of his birth was not fortuitous, but a God-given privilege, an act of grace. It is for this reason that the Jew thanks God for not having been made a heathen, a slave, or a woman.\textsuperscript{153} To have been born a Jew had religious significance. Even the Jewish sinner was in a different position to the Gentiles: no Jew goes to Gehenna, as there is no Israelite without some good.\textsuperscript{154} Such notions had their root in the conviction that Israel stands in unique relationship to God. "God's love is primarily for Israel as a whole".\textsuperscript{155} Israel's election stands for eternity.\textsuperscript{156}

To this must be added the fact that the Law of Moses in its Rabbinic interpretation imposed severe restrictions upon Jewish life. Hoennicke has paid attention to this important factor:
"Das Gesetz als Sitte und Observanz hatte eine in das Leben jedes Juden tief eingreifende Bedeutung".\textsuperscript{157} The Law formed the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile.
These two factors, the national and the religious, have decided the Jewish attitude to the Gentile world. In spite of its many and noble efforts, Judaism was unable to break down the barriers, it remained essentially a national religion. Even the Hellenised Jews of the Diaspora, have only loosened, but not thrown off, the fetters of national exclusiveness. Such an attitude, if detached from its religious motives, could easily lead to extreme pride and a perverse form of nationalism. No doubt, many Jews did not escape the danger. Racial pride is a failing common to man. In Judaism, where the national and the religious are closely knit together, the danger is even greater. Montefiore frankly admits the fact. "I do not deny", he says, "that the Old Rabbis' religion was prevalingly particularistic. The enemies of Israel were the enemies of God." The utter impossibility of separating the national cause from the religious, inevitably made for a certain national arrogance. It led to utter contempt for the Gentile world. Though the door to Judaism was left open, the masses of the Gentiles remained outside. For them, the Synagogue had no hope.

It is for these reasons that it is difficult to speak of Jewish universalism. For this, Judaism was too deeply anchored in its national life. The universalistic tendencies of Judaism "are nothing more than an extension of particularism, implying the absorption of the Gentile world by the chosen people." This is not an unjust description, it tallies well with the facts. The way to the God of Israel, led via Israel; the Synagogue could not conceive of any other way.

The great sacrifice the hour demanded, Judaism was unable to make. The Kingdom of God remained closely knit to Israel's national ambitions. Weber does not exaggerate when he says: "Zu dem Gedanken der Universalität des Reiches Gottes steht also das jüdisch religiöse Bewusstsein in unversöhnlichem Gegensatz". Between the God of Israel and the Gentile world stands the Jewish people. To come to God, meant primarily to come to the Jews. Without first coming to Israel, the way to God remained barred.

Leo Baeck has tried to exonerate the exaggerated importance of Israel by explaining that "the greatest duty always carries with it at the same time the greatest promise". He, therefore, asks: "Should not that power which made special demands of Israel grant it also special promise?" This question we cannot answer. How God rewards faithfulness is His own secret. Jesus Christ, however, once said: "when ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants". (Luke 17,10). It may be that such an attitude is alien to the spirit of Judaism. The fact remains that Judaism continued a national religion; the Gentile world stayed outside the Synagogue.

Jewish writers have sometimes implied that Christianity bought its success at the price of a compromise. "Compromise between Judaism and Hellenism, between Israel and the pagans", says Klausner, "is the foundation and basis of all Christianity..." But it seems to us that whatever foreign elements may have been admixed with the Gospel which Jesus preached, the success of Christianity is not fully explained by the principle of adaptation. Klausner maintains that Paul, though unconsciously and unintentionally, "made his Christianity acceptable to the minds of the best of the pagan world". But, we would ask, was the Gospel which Paul preached really acceptable to the pagan world? Furthermore, were those who received it the best of the Gentiles? Perhaps part of the answer lies in Klausner's admission that Paul "took from the Jewish Messianic idea its universalistic side, and ignored consciously or unconsciously - its politico-national side..."
That Paul's behaviour, however, was conditioned by a reconcilatory policy towards the Roman authorities, we would strongly repudiate. Klausner himself admits that the two aspects of the Messiah, the "politico-national", and the "universalistic-spiritual" existed side by side in the minds of the Jewish people. If Paul was to preach to the Gentile world at all his choice was already predetermined, without any alterior motives to decide. Only a Gospel unhampered by nationalistic ambitions and broad enough to include mankind, could break down racial prejudice and make room for the Christian Church. Herein lay the strength of Christianity, and the weakness of Judaism.

3. Israel's election.

Jacques Maritain, in his fine small book on Anti-semitism, refers to Israel as a corpus mysticum. He holds that "the bond which unifies Israel is not simply the bond of flesh and blood, or that of an ethico-historical community, it is a sacred and supra historical bond, of promise and yearning rather than of possession". This is Israel's election viewed from the Christian point of view. The Jewish view is somewhat different.

The Jewish religious consciousness is deeply aware of Israel's election; "אבתא לכהתי " is to the Jew more than a pious phrase. It expresses faith in Israel's unique significance and mission to the world. Israel's election precedes the creation of the world and extends for everlasting. This belief which Schechter calls "an unformulated dogme", for it is not contained in Maimonides' Creed, is of basic importance for Jewish religious thought. Faith in Israel's election has determined the Synagogue's attitude to the Gentile world and was an important factor in the Pauline controversy. Its foundation is the Old Testament. Passages like Deut. 14, 2: "For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth", have naturally lent themselves to an interpretation in the sense of unconditional election. It is for this reason that God is first and foremost the God of Israel: אַלֵּךְ לְרֹאשׁ אֶתְנָה, לְנַעַם עֵצָם אֶתְנָה, צֵיָדָל. Israel's future is dependant on this supreme fact. It is on the strength of this that we are told: "All Israel will have a share in the world to come". For Is. 60, 21 says: They shall all be righteous. It is, however, important to observe that such a certainty does not entirely rest upon Israel's own merits, but rather upon God's gracious dealing with his people. George Foot Moore remarks on this passage: "A lot in the World to Come is ultimately assured to every Israelite on the ground of the original election of the people by the free grace of God, prompted not by its merits, collective or individual but solely by God's love, a love that began with the Fathers".

Here we must note an important deviation from the Christian conception of election.

To the Church, election applies to the individual. It is only because the Church consists of elected members from all races that the Church claims election for herself. The Church as a body is elect in as much as its members believe themselves to have been called by God. This is not so in the Synagogue. It is not in the first place the individual Jew who claims for himself election; it is the people, the גֶּרֶם הַנְּכָר, whom God has chosen for an eternal heritage. Israel is, as it were, the repository of God's grace, and the individual partakes of it only by virtue of belonging to the community. Even the bad individual has thus still a share in the united effort of the whole people. "What the community does, or, as the community as a whole acts, can affect for good or for evil the individuals of whom the community is composed... The unity of the community is a unity which is an advantage to its evil members". God's dealing is primarily with the congregation of Israel, and through the Congregation with the individual Jew. This is not, however, a denial of individual providence, it simply emphasises the collective and social aspect of election over against the individual. "It must be remembered", says Montefiore, "that the community of Israel, and even each local congregation, were more important to the Rabbis, and, as they believed, more important even to God, than any individual Israelite. The Rabbis never abandoned the 'collective' point of view of the Old Testament, even though they had also adopted and intensified the later individualism. The community of Israel (kelal Israel) forms a sort of real, if mystical, personality. It is because the community is known to, and loved by, God, that God knows and loves each individual who composes it". There is much truth in J. Abelson's opinion that Judaism is, as he calls it; an "amalgam of a Jeremiah and an Ezekiel"; both elements, that of communal adherence to the religious traditions, and also individual piety, are present. But there can be no doubt, that the Synagogue's traditional emphasis is upon the collective side of religion. This fact is of far-reaching consequences. The collective aspect of Judaism counteracts the Christian conception of personal salvation, and also places the Synagogue in a different position to the rest of humanity. We will now turn to the more recent restatements of the doctrine of Israel's election.

It is the firm belief of the Synagogue that God's dealing with Israel is not merely an example, as is the Christian view, of His dealing with mankind. Israel's history is essentially on a different plane. There are, as it were, two histories; the history of the Jewish people, and the history of the rest of mankind. Such a view is born out of the conviction of Israel's unique mission to the world. Judah Halevi expressed it in the following words: "God has a secret and wise design concerning us, which should be compared to the wisdom hidden in the seed which falls into the ground, where it undergoes an external transformation into earth, water and dirt, without leaving a trace for him who looks down upon it..." The seed, however, which thus disappears, produces a tree which bears fruit; so also Israel. Israel's supreme mission is to stand as a witness to Monotheism.
Ziegler, referring to the Jewish determined opposition to Paul, asks the question: would it ever have come to a trinitarian doctrine had the Jews been less adamant towards the Apostle? Ziegler's answer is that there was no other solution, no compromise would have satisfied Christianity; to yield to the Gentile Church would have meant the end of the Jewish people, and therefore also of Monotheism. Providence had endowed Judaism, at a moment of great peril, with leaders, whose only aim in life became: "Die Erhaltung der Religion durch die Nation". It was for this higher purpose that the Synagogue had made use of religion to preserve Jewish identity. This is a constant Jewish plea.

Ziegler himself admits that the tenacious holding to the Law on the part of the Jews was prompted, not only by religious, but also by national motives. It is for this reason that H. Loewe insists upon the importance of the ceremonial side of Jewish life:
"it prevents the disappearance of Judaism in its environment... the discipline of the Torah is so powerful a shield that it could be laid aside only at grave risk". The religious fence which Judaism has built up between itself and the world was a measure of self-protection. Its purpose was, and still is to maintain "its individuality in the midst, both of a hostile and a friendly world". To the Synagogue, both are of equal danger; the one uses force, and the other enticement to destroy Israel's separate existence. Bousset has clearly recognized the national significance of religion in Judaism; he calls it "das wichtigste Mittel zur Erhaltung der Eigenart des jüdischen Volksstums".

Is such a use of religion justified? From the Jewish point of view it is, and this for two reasons: 1) From the peculiar Jewish conception of history, the ceremonial fence built round the Jewish people has served a purpose and has therefore vindicated itself. For "in history everything which fulfills a definite and required task is necessary; that which accomplishes something, and remains within the domain of the good, is justified." 2) The maintenance of Israel's separate existence is not an end in itself. The main purpose is the Jewish mission. The law serves as an iron wall to keep Israel separate from the rest of the world, because on his existence depends the existence of Monotheism: "nur ein Volljude" says Ziegler, with great emphasis, is able to be a real Monotheist.

Thus, the Synagogue makes an unique claim on behalf of the Jewish people. It demands a position which places Israel outside the wider circle of humanity. The Jewish people occupies a place to itself, by virtue of its election. No fusion is possible between Israel and the rest of mankind. He must remain what he is, "ein Einmaliges, Einziges, in keine Gattung Einzurei­hendes, nicht begreiflich Unterzubringendes". To Buber, Israel is neither a nation, nor a religion, in the usual sense of the word, it constitutes "eine Einheit von Glauben und Volkstum, das einmalig ist". It is this indivisible unity between nationhood (Volkheit) and faith, which closes the circle round Israel and keeps him apart from the nations. The outsider can only join, but not really enter into Israel's election. Schoeps accepts Judah Halevi's opinion that Israel's election is "samenhaft gebunden". Kaufmann Kohler's Liberal view is not much different. He explains the difference between Judaism and Christianity, that while one can become a Christian, one has to be born a Jew. It is possible to cut oneself loose from Church membership, but "the Jew is born into it and cannot extricate himself from it even by the renunciation of his faith..." The original German is even more explicit: "Im Judentum bildet die Stammesgemeinschaft die Grundlage der Glaubensgemeinschaft, derart, dass auch der ungläubige Jude noch Mitglied der Judenschaft bleibt". Leo Baeck takes a similar view. He claims that both the peculiarity and the difference which distinguishes Israel from all the other nations "rests on a clear and permanent possession". Franz Rosenzweig, however, has gone to the full length, and with indeflectible logic has built up a racial theology. His heavy book, Der Stern der Erlösung, is based on the idea of Israel's mystical blood-relationship. This, according to Rosenzweig, differentiates between the Jewish and all the other peoples: "Die Völker der Welt können sich nicht genügen lassen an der Gemeinschaft des Blutes; sie treiben ihre Wurzeln in die Nacht der selber toten doch lebenspendenden Erde...Wir allein vertrauten dem Blut..." In Rosenzweig's racial theology, the Jewish people is assigned a place of self-sufficiency which borders on apotheosis. It lives by its own salvation; it partakes of eternity (Es hat sich (i.e. das Volk) die Zwigkeit vorweggenommen); its growth is accomplished; it has reached its goal; it stands "jenseits des Gegensatzes...von Eigenart und Weltgeschichte, Heimat und Glaube, Erde und Himmel".
Augustine's concept of unity between fides and salus, which is still the dream of the nations, has already been attained by Israel. Herein lies for Rosenzweig the difference between Judaism and Christianity. It is essentially a difference of direction: "Das christliche Leben führt den Christen ins Aussen". Christianity is outside him: "Er (i.e. the Christian) ist nie Christ, obwohl das Christentum ist". Christianity denationalises the believer; but: "den Juden führt das jüdische (Leben) tiefer in seine jüdische Art hinein". It is here that the essential cleavage between the two faiths reveals itself; the greatest difference between the Jew and the Christian, says Rosenzweig, is in that the Christian "von Haus aus oder mindestens von Geburtswegen Heide ist, der Jude aber Jude".

Against this attitude the whole Christian assault breaks down. The Gospel has nothing to offer. The fact that a man belongs to Israel is already good news in itself. While the heathen becomes a son of God by adoption (υἱὸς ἄνθρωπος), the Jew is already a son by birth. He stands in an everlasting covenant with God because he is a son of Abraham: "Abraham, der Stammvater und er (i.e. the individual Jew) der Einzelne nur in Abrahams Lenden, hat den Ruf Gottes vernommen und ihm mit seinem (i.e. Abraham's) 'Hier bin ich' geantwortet. Der Einzelne wird von nun an zum Juden geboren, braucht es nicht erst in irgend einem entscheidenden Augenblick seines Einzellebens zu werden".

It is obvious from this that the whole Christian conception of salvation falls to the ground. For the Jew, there can be no personally acquired salvation. He already partakes in it by reason of his birth. Salvation is consequently limited to the national restoration of Israel. There is profound significance in the fact that to Judaism the Messiah is primarily a national "Regeneration" in the Christian sense is foreign to the Synagogue. The Jewish word for מִלְּחַ֣מָּה is נָבָשַׁד; the erring Jew needs only to return to the forsaken position. Rosenzweig rightly explains that for the Jew "Wiedergeburt ist nicht seine persönliche, sondern die Umschaffung seines Volkes zur Freiheit im Gottesbund der Offenbarung. Das Volk und er in ihm, nicht er persönlich als Einzelner, hat damals eine zweite Geburt erlebt". The real meaning of St. Paul's struggle appears in all its significance at this point of our discussion. G. Foot Moore remarks that Paul and the church had substituted for the Jewish national election "individual election to eternal life, without regard to race or station". It may be doubted whether this was a Pauline substitution, as a tendency towards individualism is already present in the Old Testament. But it fell to the Apostle to draw the last consequences from the prophetic teaching. The profound difference between Paul and the Synagogue ultimately turned round the question of the meaning of "Jew". To Paul, a Jew is not defined by race and tradition, but by the moral qualities which link him spiritually with Abraham: a true Jew, one can only be εὐαγγελίζω υἱοθετῶ (Rom. 2, 28f). Israel to Paul, is not defined in terms of race or colour, but faith. In Christ Jesus, the Gentiles are Abraham's seed and heirs of the promise (Gal. 3, 29). Here all national limitations are broken down, the New Israel knows of no differences and admits no prerogatives. Before God, all men stand in equal need and therefore have equal rights.

The whole Pauline attitude towards the Law must be viewed from the angle of human equality before God. The Synagogue accepted a graduation of standards which was unbearable to the Apostle. There were Israelites, full proselytes, semi-proselytes and God-fearers. Their status was dependent upon the degree of adherence to the Mosaic Law as interpreted by the Rabbis. Such a classification presupposed a scale of merits according to which God's attitude to man was determined. This view ran contrary to the Gospel message which proclaimed the good news of God's free grace revealed in the Messiah. Before the Cross, not only the heathen stranger, but also the pious Jew stood condemned and in need of pardon. It is for this reason that the Cross was to the Jew an offence. The complete levelling down of Jew and Gentile was an outrageous act of insolence in the eyes of the Synagogue. There can be no equality between the Chosen People and the pagans. Israel is pledged to the Law, the nations are not. While it is enough, therefore, for a Gentile to keep the seven commandments of Noah, it is incumbent upon a Jew to keep the whole Law. From Paul's position of equality, such a situation was intolerable. If the Law is necessary for salvation, then it must be the whole Law for all men, or else no law for anyone. The manifesto of the Kingdom of God, consisted for St. Paul in the announcement of free grace for all men through faith in the Messiah. Not even Israel could enter the Kingdom cum privilegio. It is not enough to be a son of Abraham in order to be a son of God.

It is important to note that this new and revolutionary conception of election is a recurring principle in the pronouncement of Jesus himself. "The first shall be last, and the last first" is the motto of his Kingdom.

4. Israel and the Church,

By God's providence, the majority of the Jewish people was destined to live in the midst of Christendom. The Church and the Synagogue have been facing each other for nearly 2,000 years. They both constituted a challenge to each other. They both claimed the same privileges, lived by the same hope, worshipped in their own way, the same God. Moreover, both have claimed to be Israel, the chosen people, the people of God. While Israel, however, has violently disputed the right of the Church, strange as it may seem, the Church has never disputed the right of the Jew. What is Israel to the Church?

1) The Christian view concerning Israel.

The Christian view concerning Israel has been moulded by the Bible; especially by St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans. However individual Christians may have behaved towards the Jewish people, the Church, at least in her doctrinal aspect, has never denied to the Jew the right to election. She could not do so in view of the Bible. Rom. 9 - 11 have been deeply imprinted upon the mind of Christianity. Israel was and remained an important witness to God's revelation. The fact that Jesus Christ was a Jew, that the Church first took root upon Jewish soil, and that the historical background of the Bible is the people of Israel, has deeply penetrated the Christian consciousness. St. Paul's words acknowledging Israel's unique position, the Church has accepted without questioning: They are Israelites, theirs is the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the Law, and the service of God, and the promises (Rom. 9, 4). Israel's obdurate refusal to accept the Messiah is a mystery to the Church which she cannot explain. But Israel's ultimate restoration, though not an article of faith, is yet a constituent part of the Church's hope. The Church knows herself incomplete without the Jewish people.

Does the Church then accept the claims the Synagogue makes on her own behalf? We think the answer is definitely No. The significance the Church attaches to the Jews over and above any other people, is not occasioned by what the Jews are in themselves but by what God is. The faithfulness of God the Church does not call in question: God's gifts are without repentance (Rom. 11, 29). Blindness in part has fallen on Israel, but this is not God's final word. God's purposes are never defeated and his triumph is the last. It is because the Church clings to the God of Israel that she also clings to Israel. Israel in himself, however, stands not outside, but within the family of nations. God's dealing with the Jewish people reveals His dealing with man. The sole advantage the Church concedes to the Jew is that of primus inter pares. All that happens in history can only happen consecutively, this is the meaning of time. The Jew, therefore, stands first but he does not stand alone. The beautiful collect for Good Friday in the Anglican Prayer Book admirably expresses the Christian attitude to the Jewish people. There the Church prays for the Jews, the Turks and the Infidels. The Jew stands amongst the Turks and the Infidels, but he stands first. His is the first claim upon the Christian Church, though they all stand together. And for all of them the Church prays: "fetch them home, blessed Lord, to thy flock..." For obvious reasons, however, the Church is specially concerned with the Jews. Without them, as Charue has beautifully put it, "l'Église reste incomplète, comme amputée d'un de ses meilleurs membres, tant que la nation élue ne l'a pas réintégrée". And he adds in hope and faith: "Cette heure sonnera, et quand seront ainsi venues la plénitude de Gentils et la plénitude des Juifs, la résurrection finale ouvrira la phase définitive du Royaume".

2) The Jewish view concerning the Church.

The Synagogue's attitude to the Church in some respects widely differs from the Christian attitude to the Synagogue. Judaism however, has in recent years undergone a profound change in its attitude to Christianity, and we will have to take full account of this change.

Traditional Judaism looked upon Christianity as it looked upon Mohammedanism, as an error. We have already observed elsewhere, that in some measure, Jewish criticism of Christianity was justified. From the beginning, the Christian attitude to Jesus Christ raised grave doubts on the part of the Synagogue. Trypho already accused the Christians of worshipping a man. Apart from this, the Christian attitude to the Law confirmed the Jewish view that Christianity is a terrible delusion, worse than paganism. Characteristically enough, Justin is told by Trypho: "it were better for you still to abide in the philosophy of Plato...cultivating endurance, self-control, and moderation, rather than to be deceived by false words...For if you remain in that mode of philosophy, and live blamelessly, a hope of a better destiny were left to you; but when you have forsaken God, and reposed confidence in man, what safety still awaits you?" The righteous heathen stands a better chance to inherit Olam ha-ba, than the Christian. This view is interesting as it confirms the Rabbinic opinion concerning the righteous Gentile. It is only natural that the claims of the Church appeared to the Jew preposterous. The Church was usurping Israel's privileges and lawlessly entering upon his heritage. The levelling down of the essential difference between Jew and Gentile was an attempt upon the Synagogue's prerogative and was violently opposed. We have, however, seen that in later centuries an attempt was made to interpret Christianity as well as Mohammedanism, in a more positive sense. Both were looked upon as a preparation of the way for Israel's Messiah.

This was the position till recently. In the last years, an important change has taken place. Schoeps explains the Novum in the history of the Jewish-Christian controversy as the result of the modern conception of relativity. For the first time, it has been acknowledged on both sides that truth is subjective, and that Judaism and Christianity can be only fully understood from the inside. This led to what Schoeps calls "gegenseitige Anerkennnis".323

In the past the controversy between Church and Synagogue was marked by mutual condemnation. Since the controversy between Franz Rosenzweig and the Christian professor of the history of Law, Eugen Rosenstock, there has taken place an important development. On the Jewish side, the subjective and objective truth of Christianity has been fully acknowledged. This became possible, not only thanks to the recognition that an outsider is unable to fathom the ultimate truth of his opponent, but also because of the characteristic Jewish conception of history.325 Schoeps explains that "im Hinblick auf die Wirklichkeit geschichtlichen Geschehens jüdischerseits die Gottgewirktheit des Christentums und seine Offenbarung als Heilswege für die Völkerwelt außerhalb Israels anzusehen", though not Halacha in the traditional sense, is since Rosenzweig and Buber, increasingly becoming a Minhag.326 "Wir sehen das Christentum" says Buber, "als etwas, dessen Kommen über die Völkerwelt wir in seinem Geheimnis zu durchdringen nicht imstande sind". It is, therefore, incumbent upon the thinking Jew to take Christianity seriously, and though he cannot see its significance for the Jewish people, he must acknowledge its profound meaning for the Gentiles. The Jew takes this view in recognition of the historical significance of Christianity, and also out of respect for the faith of the non-Jew.326 Schoeps is therefore prepared to recognize both the Old Testament and New Testament as God's word directed towards humanity. He is the same God who speaks in both, and what he says is the same truth; but His mode of revelation is different (unterschiedlich). He spoke to the Jew at Sinai and to the Gentile in Jesus Christ. The word spoken to Israel is not for the Gentiles and the word meant for the Gentiles is not for Israel. Rosenzweig thus says: "Was Christus und seine Kirche in der Welt bedeute aber darüber sind wir uns einig: Es kommt niemand zum Vater denn durch ihn. Es kommt niemand zum Vater - anders aber wenn einer nicht mehr zum Vater kommen braucht, weil er schon bei ihm ist". And this is the case with Israel (though not with the individual Jew). For the Gentile, the way to God is only through Jesus Christ, it is the way of faith and regeneration in the Holy Spirit. The Jewish way is a different one: "Dem Volke Israel ist der Glaubensumweg erspart worden"; Israel walks "mittlerlos", in the light of God's Countenance. There can be no New Covenant for the Jew, for the Israelite "ist seiner Physiologie nach schon im Bunde". Both Church and Israel, though walking different ways, move towards the same goal. Torah and Gospel (Evangelium) relate facts of sanctified history "in denen überwirkliches wirklich geworden ist..." Both testify to God's dealing with humanity. But Israel's destiny is to walk his own way. The Church calls it unbelief, and looks upon Israel as rejected by God, but Israel knows that he is not rejected. His lonely path is not obduracy, but faithfulness.

3) The Jewish and the Christian Mission.

The recognition of the singular and unique position in which Israel finds himself, bears directly upon the understanding of his missionary task in the world. The logical conclusion of the essential difference between the Jew and the Gentile, puts an end to all proselytising. Judaism is not for the Gentiles. Baeck consequently explains: "Das Judentum, so sehr es universelle Religion ist, universell in seinem Gesichtskreis wie in seinem Willen", is yet tied to the Jewish people in a way which makes it impossible to become a universal religion. Montefiore, we have noticed, regards this as the weakest point in Rabbinic Judaism. But this is not the general view of Jewish writers. They rather see in Israel's peculiar position a source of strength. Baeck explains that exclusiveness is only the other side of universalism, "only a people which felt its own individuality in its soul could feel what its importance was to be for others." Israel's mission is not to convert the world to Judaism, but to be himself. As Ben-Chorin put it: "die recht verstandene Mission Israels ist eben eine existentielle. Nur auf dem Weg nach Innen können wir werbend nach Aussen wirken." Rosenzweig has carefully explained the Jewish position: he compares Christianity to an everlasting way which demands continual expansion. Missionary activity is the Christian form of self-preservation. The case with the Jew is different: "Der als Jude Gezeugte bezeugt seinen Glauben, indem er das ewige Volk fortzeugt. Er glaubt nicht an etwas er ist selber Glauben." While the Jew has already reached the goal, the Christian is still on the march. He is the "everlasting beginner", who in hating the Jew, hates his own incompleteness. Christian life, therefore, leads outward (nach Aussen), Jewish life leads inward (nach Innen).

Judaism, as understood by modern Jews, is therefore, not a missionary religion in the proper sense. The Noachidic movement, which is connected with the names of Rabbi Elie Benamozegh, professor of theology at the Leghorn Rabbinical Seminary and the French proselyte Aimé Pallière, is not an attempt at proselytising. Its aim is to help the Gentiles to lead a righteous life by keeping the seven Noachian Commandments. The Noachide does not even join the Community of Israel, he only adheres to the main principles of morality. There is no need for him to walk the Jewish way, he remains an outsider.

There are thus two ways to God: 'the Jewish way for the Jewish people only, and the non-Jewish way for the nations of the world.' This does not mean a denial of the universalistic outlook on the part of the Synagogue. Schoeps points out: "Damit ist gesagt, dass das Judentum wohl einen universalen Gott und einen universalen Gotteswillen sowie ein universales Menschheitsziel bekennt, aber seinen Weg durch die Geschichte nicht als Missionsreligion gehen kann." And Schoeps gives the reason why Israel's way must be different: "um des Bundes willen zwischen dem Einen Gott und dem Einen Volk, zu dem am Ende der Tage die Eine Menschheit treten wird." As the People of Revelation ("das Volk der Offenbarung"), Israel is destined to walk apart from the rest of humanity.

The significance of the new attitude lies in the fact that Christianity is not ruled out as a fatal error, as was the case in the past. It is emphatically affirmed that Jesus Christ is God's revelation to mankind, but not to the Jew. Sholem Asch has given dramatic expression of the modern Jewish view, in his great book on Jesus. "This Rabbi's doctrine", explains Nicodemus to his sorely tried disciple, Judah Ish-Kariot, "is good and great for those who are born without the spirit, or for such as would deny the spirit. But we that are born in the spirit...how shall we be born again without denying the spirit? For the people of the world, for those who are born only in the flesh and not in the spirit. He has been sent to bring them close to our father in heaven...He has been appointed the prophet of the nations..." It may be noted that Trypho already accepted the doctrine of the double way. He says to Justin: "Let him be recognized as Lord and Christ and God, as the Scriptures declare by you Gentiles....
But we who are servants of God that made this same (Christ) do not require to confess or worship him. ⁶⁵⁰ These words may be compared with H. Loew's remark to the effect that "the world needs both the Church and the Synagogue" — it is wrong to deny that Jesus had none of the Holy Spirit — but as far as the Jew is concerned, there is no need for him to go outside his faith "in order to supplement his own religion". ⁶⁵¹ The famous story about the two rings admirably illustrates the Jewish position. Martin Buber has defined it with masterly precision: "Die Gottestore sind offen für alle. Der Christ braucht nicht durchs Judentum, der Jude nicht durchs Christentum zu gehen um zu Gott zu kommen". ⁶⁵²

The Synagogue's contention, therefore, is that the Church should recognize the peculiar Jewish position and refrain from missionary work amongst the Jewish people. Judaism, on the other hand, is prepared to leave to the Christian Church the missionary task amongst the nations, in the conviction that both ways ultimately lead to the same goal, namely the Father of mankind. Israel's mission is thus to be himself; the mission of the Church is to convert the nations. It is on these grounds that Jewish writers object to the missionary activity of the Church in so far as it is directed towards the Jewish people. It is argued that the acceptance of Christianity will have a disintegrating influence upon Jewish life and will thus interfere with the fulfilment of Israel's historic mission. "Jesus is the extra grain in the composition of Judaism which radically changes its whole nature". ⁶⁵⁵ S. S. Cohon argues that "to tear away a person from the religion of his people to which he is linked with all the fibres of his being, both physical and psychical, amounts to cutting him off from the source of life and idealism". ⁶⁵⁶ Kaufmann Kohler declares that "in the opinion of unbiased observers", great harm is done by those who endeavour "to uproot the faith of a race admired for its steadfast loyalty". The nature of the argument, in its theological significance, however, appears in Franz Rosenzweig's explanation that: "Verwurzelung ins tiefste Selbst" is the secret of the Everlasting People. Israel fulfils his mission by his existence. His vocation is to remain true to himself.

4) The everlasting division.

It is the Jewish contention that no religion can claim absoluteness. "Judaism", says Kohler, "denies emphatically the right of Christianity, or any other religion to arrogate to itself the title of 'absolute religion'". S. S. Cohon, in his article on Christian missions, argues that there must be more than one way "in which the human heart can reach out after the Holy One". The truth, says Schoeps, is one Truth, but the mode of human perception differs. He is the same God who revealed himself to both Jews and Christians: "je nach der Seite Gottes, die er Israel am Sinai, und die er der Welt auf Golgotha zugewendet hat". Edwyn Bevan replying to Cohon's article, argues that the Jew cannot "consistently base his plea for 'tolerance' on the ground that Judaism and Christianity are equally good religions, Judaism for Jews and Christianity for Gentiles"; for if Christianity is not true "it must be a grievous spiritual harm to Christians that they should hold it". This argument is based on the premise that there is equality between the Jew and the Christian; what is therefore harmful to the one is also harmful to the other. But the Jewish position, as represented by Rosenzweig, Buber, Schoeps and others, does not admit such a supposition. Israel claims to be pledged by an eternal Covenant to God, but this is not the case with the Gentile world. His loyalty to the Torah demands that Israel goes his own way. God's dealing with the Jews is different to his dealing with mankind. It is not that "truth" is denied to Christianity, but that it is not Jewish truth.

Can the Church accept such a duality? Can there be two ways of salvation, one for the Jew and one for the Gentiles? Is the word spoken on Golgotha essentially a word to the Gentiles and not to Israel? Can the historical fact of Israel's refusal be construed as God's will and not as human guilt?

An answer to these questions, the Church finds not in herself, and not in Israel, and certainly not in history, but by listening to her Lord. Ben-Chorin has rightly recognized that the command to the Church, to go to all the world (Mt. 28, 19), and specially to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt. 10, 6), makes it incumbent upon the Christian to preach the Gospel to both Jews and Gentiles. To neglect this duty is to betray the message, which means to betray the Master. It is thus for the sake of her own loyalty, for the sake of her life and her hope that the Church must deny any difference between the Jew and the Gentile.

God is no respecter of persons. Before Him, the Holy One, men stand not as Jews and Gentiles, but as sinners who are in need of grace. Jesus the prophet may be speaking to the Gentiles; but Jesus the Son of God, speaks to mankind. Jesus the martyr, may be appealing to some and not to others; but Jesus the Lamb of God challenges the whole human race. God's word is one word, and God's way is one, if it is the way of God.

Thus, Church and Synagogue face each other; between them stands Jesus Christ. The Synagogue's No and the Church's Yes, is not No and Yes to each other, but No and Yes to Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God. The Synagogue's theology and Israel's national position are both conditioned by the Jewish attitude to Jesus Christ. The Jewish conceptions about God, Man, Sin, the Messiah and Revelation, and Israel’s unique claim, are, not only the cause but also the result of the opposition to the Christian view.\textsuperscript{366} Buber rightly brings down the difference between Church and Synagogue to the central point – the Messiah: "Die Kirche steht auf dem Glauben an das Gekommensein Christi, als an die der Menschheit durch Gott zuteil gewordene Erlösung. Wir Israel vermögen das nicht glauben".\textsuperscript{367} To the Church, however, Israel’s unbelief, is not part of his election, but part of his humanity. It is not Israel’s unbelief, but human unbelief. The fact that it is Israel who disbelieves, stands as an everlasting warning before the eyes of the Church.\textsuperscript{368} In Israel, she sees her own faithlessness and unbelief.\textsuperscript{369} In her prayer for the Jew, she prays for herself. In as much as the Church claims to be Israel, the prophetic words: You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore will I visit upon you all your iniquities;\textsuperscript{370} are as much applicable to the Christian as to the Jewish situation. In our common humanity, in our common failure, in our common faithlessness to God, the Jew and the Christian, though standing apart, yet stand together.

The line which divides the Church from the Synagogue, is not a horizontal, but a vertical line.

As historical entities, between Church and Synagogue, there is no essential difference. They both fall under the category of religion. Both express the same human cry for God, and the same need of forgiveness and grace. Their difference is rather due to historic contingency than to elemental principle. In different modes they both express the same basic truth: finite man in quest for eternity. On the religious plane, therefore, whatever features distinguish the Church from the Synagogue, these are only of an accidental nature. There is no horizontal line to draw a clear-cut division. Church and Synagogue intersect and touch at many points. The segregation into "Jews" and "Christians" is not spiritually, but historically conditioned. Many a Jew could have lived his religion in the Church, and many a Christian in the Synagogue.

The real line dividing the Church from the Synagogue is vertical. It is the line of faith. In the last resort, neither Judaism nor Christianity can be adequately defined in terms of history. A person is not a Jew or a Christian in the true sense of the word by merely following the example of his parents, but by the acquisition of the habit of mind which is characteristically Jewish or Christian. In both cases, it is the expression of an attitude rather than a tradition. The Jewish or the Christian attitude can neither be the result of history or race, but entirely depends upon the personal response to Jesus Christ. Christian theology is the result of faith in Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God. Jewish theology is the negation of that faith. The dividing line is not between Jews and Gentiles in the racial sense, but between men who accept and men who reject the Christian claim. The division between "Jews" and "Christians" on a historical basis is thus fictitious. There is only one division: between the man who in his actual, existential situation says "yes" and the man who in his actual, existential situation says "no", to the challenge which Jesus Christ presents.

Trattner closes his book with the following words: "The intelligent Jew enjoys the Jesus of the Synoptics; the Churches adore the Christ of the Fourth Gospel. And so the grand division goes on between the brethren of Jesus and his followers..." To the Church, however, the division which separates Christianity from Judaism is only part of the division which separates the Church from the world. It is the division between faith which knows and unbelief which also knows...
A STUDY IN THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE JEWISH PEOPLE AND JESUS CHRIST

Vol. II
Notes and Bibliography.

JAKÓB JOČZ

1945.
Notes to Chapter I.

2. The initial letters of these three words make Y Y - the traditional Rabbinic spelling of the name Jesus; cf. ch. II note 184.

3. Quoted by Lindeskog, p. 27.

4. This generally accepted fact has been contested by a few modern writers: cf. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, p. 233; One of the first to advocate the Aryan descent of Jesus was Houston Stewart Chamberlain (The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century, Engl. 1910); Emil Jung's book, Die Abstammung Jesu im Lichte freier Forschung (Engl. The Ancestry of Jesus, 1933) is a pseudo-scientific attempt to present Jesus to racially-minded Germans.

5. Mt. 9, 20; 14, 36; 23, 5, suggest that the "border" of the garment were the traditional J Y S prescribed by the Law (cf. Num. 15, 38ff; Deut. 22, 12); LXX transl. J Y S with τῷ κεφαλαρεύον. For the Rabbinic interpretation of the rite, see K. Friedlander, The Jewish Religion, p. 329; A. Edersheim, Life & Times, I, p. 277, note 1; Oesterley & Box, Religion & Worship of the Synagogue, p. 450ff; Klausner, Jesus, p. 364 note 7.

Notes to Chapter II

5. cp dp 235ff.

6. cf Bonsirven, p. 70.

7. cf Kitab al Ikhazari, IV, 10 & 11

8. cf Mishneh Torah, p. 30 ff, 11, 4.

10. Rabbi J. Gould, Jewish Chronicle, Jan. 16, 1942; cf the correspondence in the same paper concerning Jewish attendance of Christian Services, Nov. 15, 1941 and subsequent numbers; but cf Friedlander, The Jewish Religion, p. 313, where pld is expressly not applied to Christians.

11. F. Ch. Ewald, Abodah Zarah, p. 331.

17. Cf. Joseph S. Bloch, Israel und die Wirkung, pp. 50-54; 77-87; Gösta Lindstedt, p. 12; Montefiore, however, admits: "It is difficult to say precisely what the Rabbis thought of Christians. Did they fall under class I (i.e., worshipers of idols), or B (i.e., enemies of Israel), or F (i.e., heretics and sectaries)? Or is the term "Heretics and Sectaries of the Perfection and the Trinity" (Christian Anthropology, p. 322)?") cp. also Kosmala, Intern. Rev. of Miss., July, 1941, p. 38ff.

20. The Conflicts of the Early Church, p. 77.
The Martyrdom of Jesus of Nazareth, Rabbi Niss goes so far as to deny the historicity of the Crucifixion altogether. For this he finds support in Acts, where it is said that Jesus was hanged on a tree, and also in the fact that the Basilidians denied that Jesus was ever crucified (ib. p. 108f).

22. Adolph Dankiger, Jewish Forerunners, p. 16.
25. John 11, 14
32. ib. p. 286.
33. Cf. D. Chwolson, Das letzte Passah, whose whole construction is based on the controversy.
34. Leszynsky, pp. 61 & 302.
37. ib. 230; there is undoubtedly an apologetic reason why Jewish investigation is mainly devoted to Pharisaism (Cf. Lindeskog, p. 145). Paul Goodman writes: "The political and religious views of the Sadducees have no living interest to modern Judaism, except as an example to be avoided." (The Synagogue and the Church, p. 245).
40. Das letzte Passah, p. 23.
41. ib. p. 98.
42. ib. p. 125.
43. An extreme example of prejudice is the book by Giovanni Rosadi, The Trial of Jesus. Thanks to Jewish criticism, there is a definite turn in the opposite direction, cf. Principal Curtis' warm appreciation of Pharisaic ideals in his recent book, Jesus Christ the Teacher, p. 26f.

44. Jesus, Paul and the Jews, p. 53.

45. ib. pp. 92f.

47. Jesus, p. 222.

52. S. Schechter, Documents of Jewish Sectaries, Vol I., p. XXI, note; the reference is to Geiger's hypothesis in his book, Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel in ihrer Abhängigkeit von der inneren Entwicklung des Judentums, Breslau, 1857, according to which, Pharisaism went through two definite stages of development. In an older period, it showed important connections with Sadduceism, traces of which are still left in the Mechila, Sifre and the Jerusalem Targum. The second period is characterised by a complete breach with the views of the opposing party. Geiger has thus endeavoured to show the existence of an older and a younger Halachah. Elsewhere Geiger observes: "Der immer in den Hintergrund gedrängte Saddacismus erhielt sich jedoch kümmerlich in einer Richtung, welche sich oppositionell der Einwirkung der Geschichte verschloss, nämlich im Samaritismus, und er verjüngte sich später in einer Opposition, welche sich dem Überwuchernden Parismatismus entgegenstellte, und zwar im Karaismus..." (Saddacism u. Pharisäer, Breslau, 1863, p. 6); for survey of the controversy provoked by Schechter's book, see Bentwich, S. Schechter, pp 263ff.

53. Leszynsky, p. 302.

But even Friedländer holds that Jesus' opposition was not directed against the observance of "hergebrachter religiöser Bräuche...sondern gegen den Missbrauch, den eine den Klausner, Jesus, p. 215.

The Teaching of Jesus, p. 37; Gerald Friedländer goes so far as to deny such a possibility. In his opinion, "Mr. Montefiore has not only erred in making this admission, but also in limiting his criticism to the single case of Luke's parable". (The Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount, p. 36); Cf. however, W. A. Curtis, op. cit., pp. 42ff.

The whole paragraph is important, pp. 144-150; cf. also pp. 272ff; Loewe argues that if the description of Pharisaism as found in the Gospels were correct, "the system must have died out" (Jud. & Christ. I, p. 179). A similar argument is brought forth by Parkes, (cp. Jesus, Paul & the Jews, p. 66). But survival in itself is no proof of greatness.

Cf. Klausner, Jesus, pp. 277ff; cp. also Trattner, p. 108; the writer, however, holds that Jesus was so close to Pharisaism that the exact nature of Pharisaic opposition is difficult to state.

Chwolson, in concluding his study, arrives at 11 points, ten of which bear directly upon the relationship between Jesus and the Pharisees:
1) The teaching of Jesus is in no way opposed to Pharisaic teaching.
2) In principle, there is no difference between Jesus and the Pharisees in respect to the religious customs and ceremonies.
3) Jesus was only opposed to certain Pharisaic views which have been rejected by Judaism and have been left unrecorded by tradition.
4) Jesus was opposed not to Pharisaism itself, but only the corruption of the same (Auswuchse).
5) Jesus was opposed only to those Pharisees who "aus übertriebener Kirchlichkeit" became a menace to true religion. The Rabbis did the same.
6) Jesus, like the Rabbis, used exceedingly strong language against the false Pharisees.
7) At that time, the Sanhedrin was entirely ruled by the Sadducees, the Pharisees being in a minority.
8) According to Pharisaic principles, Jesus neither said nor did anything deserving capital punishment.
9) The procedure of the trial contradicts the rules laid down by the Rabbis.
10) The Pharisees appear as the defenders of Christians in the trial of the Apostles of Paul, and in the case of the Martyrdom of James. (cf. op. cit. p. 120f)

65. ib. p. 72; cf. Lindeskog, p. 274f.

68. Jewish scholars have protested against the equation of "Torah" with "Law". They rightly point out that Torah comprises more than the legal aspect of Judaism. (Cf. Loewe, In Spirit & in Truth, p. 231f; S. Schechter, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, pp. 117, 127; Cf. also Herford, Jud. & Christ. Ill, p. 94). We are, therefore, using the word, bearing in mind its wider connotation.

69. The Teaching of Jesus, p. 44.

71. Klausner, p. 368; cf. also Geiger, Sadduceer und Phariser, p. 31ff.

74. ib. p. 134f.

75. Klausner, Jesus, p. 369; this admission brings the discussion regarding the connection between Jesus and Paul in line with the more positive Christian view. (Cf. Branscomb, Jesus & the Law of Moses, p. 278ff; T. W. Manson, Jud. & Christianity, III, pp. 131ff; J. Gresham Machen, The Origin of Paul's Religion, pp. 117ff).

76. Klausner, op. cit. p. 374; contrasting Jesus with Paul, Klausner says: "Ethical extremism is an outstanding characteristic of the teaching of Jesus...ethical compromise and adaptation to reality go hand in hand with extremism in religious belief" in the teaching of Paul. (From Jesus to Paul, p. 461).

77. Herford, Pharisaism (1912) p. 146.

79. Klausner, Jesus, p. 255.
Mt. 21, 23ff; Luke 20, 1ff; Elsewhere, Prof. T. W. Manson explains the conflict between Jesus and the Pharisees as a "conflict between the prophetic spirit and the legal". The opposition springs from two different conceptions of virtue. For Jesus, good living is the spontaneous activity of a transformed character; for the Scribes and Pharisees, it is the obedience to a discipline imposed from without. (The Teaching of Jesus, pp. 295, 300). This view, however, overlooks the objective authority of the law as it appeared both to Jesus and the Pharisees.

It is important to note that Klausner admits the existence of an ancient view according to which the ceremonial laws will be abrogated in the Messianic Age (Cf. From Jesus to Paul, p. 221 note 13).
Thomas Aquinas has thus given expression to a view universally held by the Church.

100. S. G., p. 487ff.

102. Harnack is inclined to regard Mt. as more original, but he significantly adds: "Aber für ihn (i.e. Lukas) spricht, dass die Stellung der Sünde bei ihm natürlicher als bei Mt. ist". He asks: "Entscheidet das"? (Sprüche und Reden Jesu, p. 16).

103. For the difficulty connected with σάλτηρευ see Dalman, The Words of Jesus, pp. 139ff.

104. Cf. W. Manson, Jesus the Messiah, pp. 20-22.

105. Harnack's remarks concerning Stephen's attitude to the Law & the Temple are important: "Stephanus hat", says Harnack "nicht wider den Tempel und das Gesetz gesprochen, um ihren göttlichen Ursprung zu bestreiten, sondern er hat die begrenzte Dauer dieser Einrichtung behauptet". (Mission p. 35). We feel convinced that the view concerning the Law, the early Church derived from Jesus himself.

106. Prof. T. W. Manson, like most modern scholars, finds it inconceivable that the same person, while showing the greatest respect for the Law (cf. Matt. 5, 17, 19f), and even for the oral tradition (cf. Matt. 23, 1f), could at the same time display by far the greatest animus against the Scribes and the Pharisees. (The Teaching of Jesus, p. 36). But surely, we ought to be able to distinguish between theory and practice. Jesus had nothing against Pharisaic teaching, in so far as it was in accordance with the spirit of the Scriptures, he castigates their deeds!

109. As an example of such misunderstanding, we would quote Bertram Lee Woolf, The Authority of Jesus & its Foundation, London, 1969, p. 261: "Jesus found essential only what was truly ethical, having to do with the inner self in its immediate relation with God. All the rest He treated as relatively indifferent".

112. The Synagogue & the Church, p. 371f.

S. G. CXLIf; Cf. Religious Teaching of Jesus, p. 55f.

3. G. p. CIV.

The Old Testament and After, p. 241.

S. G. (1927) I CXXXV.

The Old Testament and After, p. 283.

"Jesus' view was, 'unless you become as little children', "it was a 'kindergarten teaching, needed for a kindergarten class. The Rabbis did not wish this to be given to those who had grown older, and had passed to a higher stage". (Montefiore, Rabbinic Literature & the Gospel Teachings, p. 85; p. 379).

Ignaz Ziegler, Der Kampf Zwischen Judentum und Christentum, p. 22; Cf. I. L. Wise, The Martyrdom of Jesus, p. 60; Cf. also Chwolson, op. cit. p. 87.

Ziegler, p. 25f.

Klausner holds Herod to have made a claim to Messiahship and that the "Herodians" were those who upheld such claim. Klausner finds an allusion to Herod's false Messiahship in the Sibylline Oracles (cf. From Jesus to Paul, p. 145). Ziegler's view would therefore derive some probability from Klausner's theory.

Klausner, Jesus, p. 255; cf. also ib. pp. 264-272.

op. cit. p. 335.

Parkes, Jesus, Paul & the Jews, p. 31.

ib. p. 72.

ib. p. 78.

ib. p. 88.

op. cit. p. 95.

Montefiore, Rabb. Anthol., p. XX; cf. The Old Testament & After, p. 136; cf. also Gerald Friedländer, Wellenism &
Christianity, p.82.

134. Vladimir G. Simkhovitch, Toward the Understanding of Jesus; p.41; (We include Prof. Simkhovitch amongst Jewish writers, on Lindeskog's authority (cf. his bibliography).)

135. ib. p.56.

136. ib. p.60.

137. ib. p.75.

144. The Pharisees, p.33; for social divisions cf.ib.p.344.

147. Jesus the Messiah, p.85.

148. ib. pp. 89-93.

149. W. A. Curtis, Jesus Christ the Teacher, p.168; cf.p.205.

Montefiore thinks that the great diversity of views is partly due to the fragmentary nature of our sources.

152. E. Hermann, Eucken and Bergson, p.117.

153. Lindeskog, p.251f.

155. Montefiore, The Teaching of Jesus, p.120.

156. Ibid. 161.

159. Klausner, p.256f. This is also Chwolson's view, cp. Chwolson, Das Letzte Passamahl Christi, p.91 note 2.

163. H. P. Chajes, Markus-Studien, 1899, p.11. Klausner does not actually accept the suggestion, but thinks it is worth noting (Klausner, p.264f). Abrahams is opposed to it, and prefers A. Wünsche's suggestion that 장 이요시 범주 points to the Rabbinic idiom נאה דיוק. (Abrahams, I, p.13f). Both S. Schechter and Montefiore accept the phrase as authentic. Schechter connects it with Ben Sira 3,10. (S. Schechter, Studies in Judaism, 2nd Series, 123), but cf. T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus, p.106 note 1. Montefiore's remark is noteworthy: "His teaching is fresher and more instinct with genius than that of the Rabbis, of whose teaching we have records in Talmud and Midrash. It is more inspired. It is grander. It is more prophetic. It seems to claim 'authority', just as the prophets claimed it, because they were convinced that their words were from God. Such a consciousness of inspiration Jesus also must have possessed". (Montefiore, Synoptic Gospels, 1909, p.555).

165. Montefiore, S. G. (1909) p.499. Montefiore resorts to the usual method, not that Schechter is wrong, but that the antithesis is added by a later hand in the passages where Schechter's explanation is inapplicable.

167. "Les Phérisiens avaient tenu, pendant le siècle et demi qui précede notre âge, une rôle utile, et parfois glorieux” (2) but "même au temps du Christ, si beaucoup n'étaient plus que le vinaigre d'un vin généreux, les épigones d'une race héroïque, une imposante minorité n'avait pas péché contre la lumière". (André Charme, L'Incrédulité des Juifs dans le Nouveau Testament, Gembloux, 1929, p. 23).

168. D. Chwolson, Das letzte Passamahl Christi, p. 87. The most recent effort to explain the death of Jesus was made by Solomon Zeitlin in his book, "Who crucified Jesus?" Zeitlin is driven to assume the existence of two Sanhedrins: one independant and entirely concerned with the religious life of the people; the other, political, a tool in the hands of the Romans and concerned with legal questions and the relationship to the Roman Empire. It was the latter, in complicity with Pilate, which became guilty of the death of Jesus. The theory of two distinct Synhedria was propagated by Bächler, Das Synhedrium in Jerusalem, 1902. Abrahams is prepared to accept the view; cp. Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism I, p. 9.

172. Dr. Parkes, though not a Jewish Rabbi, but strangely adverse to "theological ophthalmology", whatever that may mean, apparently disputes Barth's right to discuss Pharisaism; a privilege reserved for the historian only (!) (Cp. Jesus, Paul & the Jews, p. 19).
173. Matthew 21, 28-32.
174. οτι πρωτος του πνευματος, ἡ κοινωνία, are the anawim of Is. 61,1.
176. Rom. 3, 9ff. Such a statement, however, runs contrary to modern Jewish sentiment.
177. Prof. W. Manson, enumerates five important points in connection with the claims of Jesus; cp. Jesus the Messiah, p. 98.
180. Simkhovitch, p. 31.
It is characteristic for Dr. Lee Woolf's presentation that he describes Jesus as "a mighty soul at one with God." (on cit. p.242). An identical expression is used by E. T. Herford. (Cf. Jesus Christ, London, 1901, a twopenny tract). Dr. Lee Woolf's attitude to the question of Messianism is the result of a complete neglect of the Old Testament as a background for Jesus' life and ministry. (On the importance of the O.T., see E. C. Hoskyns, Jesus the Messiah, Mysterium Christi, 1950, pp.69-89, a collection of essays edited by G. E. A. Bell and Adolf Deissmann; cf. also W. Curtis, Jesus Christ the Teacher, pp. 49, 51; also W. Hanson, Jesus the Messiah, p.43.)

Dr. Lee Woolf, on cit. p.215: "(Jesus) was not Messiah prior to and apart from this task. If He had not undertaken this special work, if He had not answered this divine call to service, He would not have been Messiah at all. The function gave the title and not the title the function".

Joim Reid, explains that to Jewish Christians, Jesus was known as the "Messiah", to Jews of Hellenistic origin, Jesus was "the Christ", but to the Gentile Christian, he was "the Lord". (Dict. of Chr. & the Gospels, Vol. II, p.568). But cp. Machen, ib. pp.300ff.

Cp. Perkes, Jesus, Paul and the Jews, p.184ff; Qesterley: "the distinguishing feature of the Hellenistic faction was its presentation of Judaism as a religion of Hope, while to the orthodox party Judaism was, above all things, a religion of Law". (The Parting of the Roads, p.87). Either this was so, we cannot tell; to what extent Hellenistic Judaism had departed from the Palestinian point of view is a matter of controversy. Klauser's view appears to be indefinite. On the one hand he assumes that Hellenized Judaism of the Alexandria type "produced an eclectic system which was "unacceptable to original Judaism", but favorable to early Christianity (from Jesus to Paul, p.11); on the other hand, he disputes Louis Ginzberg's opinion that Judaism of the Diaspora was more liberal in its outlook (ib. p.87). For the orthodox Jewish Diaspora could form a bridge to Pauline Christianity (ib. p.57). Diaspora does not explain.

192. Dr. Rabbi Ignaz Ziegler, Der Kampf zwischen Judentum und Christentum, p. 52f.

193. ib. p. 56; cp. also p. 73f.

194. Rabbi Ziegler often prints with fat, big letters, statements whose historical accuracy are questionable. This emphatic presentation cannot make up for the lack of evidence. We are thus told with every possible emphasis the art of printing can provide: "dass das Judentum und seine Vertreter, gegen Jesus persönlich vorzugehen keinerlei Ursache hatten und es tatsächlich auch nicht taten. In dem Auge blicke aber, in welchem Paulus die Befreiung vom Gesetze, von der Beschneidung u. den Speise Gesetzen, aussprach, entbrannte sofort der Kampf..." (ib. p. 73f). What evidence is there in support of such a dictum ?!

197. Norman Bentwich, in an essay on Philo-Judaeus (Aspects of Hebrew Genius, ed. by Leon Simon, London, 1910), refers to Hebrew Christianity as a section of the Jewish people "which separated itself from the general body of the community and formed the Christian Church, which, starting as a heresy from Judaism, became more and more hostile to the parent body" (ib. p. 20f). Such a presentation of facts is not historically accurate. There is evidence to prove that the Jews who believed Jesus to be the Messiah persisted in remaining within the Jewish community. Only under great pressure did they leave the Synagogue. Reflexion upon the unforeseen results of the Synagogue's intolerance may perhaps have found expression in the words of an old Baraita: Let thy left hand ever repel and thy right hand invite. Not like Elisha who repelled Gehazi with both hands, nor like R. Yehoshua ben Perachya who repelled Yeshu (the Nazarene) with both hands. (Sanh. 107b; cp. Klausner, p. 24ff).

199. Cp. Chwolson, op.cit. p. 104ff. But it is probable that in the case of Rabbi Jehudah hakadosh, the compiler of the Mishnah (ca 135-220), the Min represents a shade of Hebrew Christianity closely related to Judaism. It seems to us that Chwolson is trying to prove too much. This, as other instances, must be balanced by the passages which manifestly reveal a spirit of hostility.

200. For Rabbinic references, see Strack-Billerbeck, Vol.IV, p.332f.

200. pal. T. Shab. 13,5. For further parallels see Strack-Billerbeck. Vol.III,p.11. Strack refutes Bacher's suggestion that אָּלְכָּה here refer to Euangellion, (cp. Bacher, Tann,II,p.258). The Talmudic rule is: הַגְּזֵה/נִּהְמָה אָלְכָּה/ו לָא הָאָבָא (Shab.116a), which Strack understands to mean that the books of the Minim are to be treated like the giljonim, to which applies the injunction that they be burned. The Rabbis have cacophemistically altered the word εὖκελίαν to mean נ"א (Strack: "Unheilsrolle"; Jastrow: "falsehood of blank paper") or נ”א ("scroll of sin"). The word נ”א (plur. נ"א)itself is according to George Foot Moore: a blank leaf, or margin, before, after or on the sides of a volume (roll), (so also Strack; cp. also W. Bacher, Le mot "Minim" dans le Talmud, Revue des Etudes Juives, 38,p.40). But Rashi remarks: מ"א לְבָא לְלָא רָאוּ כָּוָה אָלְכָּה אַרְבָּא אָלְכָּה (Ewald, Ab. Zarah, p.121). Bacher, therefore, accepts the view that מ"א אָלְכָּה are not the books of heretics as Friedländer takes it, but simply "des copies de la Bibles faites par les Minim, qui servaient à leur usage". But this rule does not apply to Hagiga 15b and Sanh. 166b (cp. op.cit.p.42).

202. Chul. 13a: R. Eliezer (90 A.D.) said that he who eats the bread of a Samaritan is as if he ate pork.

203. pal. T. Chul 2,20f.

204. Jewish Studies in memory of Israel Abrahams, New York, 1927,p.210. Herford uses the example of the earth and the moon to illustrate the relationship between Judaism and Christianity: "Judaism continued to move on in the same direction as it had formerly done, Christianity from its point of origin, moved in a quite different direction". "The moon began to move in a new orbit, at first not far removed from that of the earth, but in course of time diverging further and further from it". (p.213). Such a picture belies the laws of physics. But H. guards himself against the inadequacy of the example. As a matter of fact, Judaism was as vitally affected by the appearance of Christianity as the earth was by the appearance of the moon. (cf. Montefiore, The Old Test. & After, pp.164ff).

205. op.cit.p.211.

207. R. Travers Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, p. 200ff; cf. also p. 122.

210. Cp. Bacher, Agada der Amoräer I, 555ff; also Midrash Rabbah, Gen. VIII, 9. (Transl. by Rabbi Dr. H. Freedman, London, 1939). Cp. also Midrash Rabbah to Gen. 1,1 - where the plural is explained as referring to God consulting the Torah; and Sanh. 38b - where on the authority of R. Johanan, it is explained that the plural signifies that The Holy One, blessed be He, does nothing without consulting His heavenly Court (lit. "family", כְּבָדָי).

211. Minim once asked Rabban Gamaliel "whence do we know that the Holy One, blessed be He, will resurrect the dead?" He answered: "from the Torah, the Prophets and the Hagiographa". But they refused to accept his proofs (Sanh. 90b). Herford rightly points out that this is not a case of Minim rejecting the doctrine of the Resurrection, but only the warrant for this doctrine in Scripture. Herford takes them to be Christians for whom the Resurrection of the dead "was subsequent on the resurrection of Christ". (Cf. Christianity in Tal. & Midrash pp. 281ff).

212. A. Mishcon suggests that this might have been in lieu of an honorarium for his work a) either as a teacher of the Minim (so Herford, p. 267f); b) or as an assistant-collector of imperial taxes (so Bacher, Agada der Paläst. Amoräer II, p. 96ff); c) or as a scholar (cp. Babyl. Talmud ed. by I. Epstein, Seder Nezikin, p. 14 note).

213. Abodah Zarah, 4a. A. Mishcon explains that "others" refers to the Rabbis of Babylonia. There Christianity was only known from hear-say.

214. Cp. Bacher, Agada der Pal. Amoräer II, p. 141 note. There are numerous traces of the influence of Christian thought upon Judaism. Referring to Jalkut, Chukkath pars. 764, where Adam is spoken of as having brought death into the world by his fall, Friedländer remarks: "This idea has found its way into the Midrash from Christian sources". (Gerald Friedländer, Rabbinic Philosophy and Ethics, London, 1912, p. 236, note).

219. Oesterley & Box, Short Survey of Literature of Rabb. & Med. Jud. p.159. It is interesting to note that to this day, the Decalogue is not part of the Synagogue's liturgy.

220. W. L. Knox, in Judaism & Christ. Vol.II, p.86-88; Knox draws attention to Antiq.III,5,4, where Josephus declares it prohibited to repeat the actual words of the Decalogue, presumably implying that they are the words of God Himself.

221. W. L. Knox thinks that such a view is already implied in Stephen's speech, Acts, 3.38 (?) Cp. Didascalia, VI, ch.XVI,7. The Apostolic Constitutions, which in its first part is a mere enlargement of the Didascalia (cp. Otto Bardenhewer, Patrologia, p.319) simply says: "Now the law is the decalogue, which the Lord promulgated to them with an audible voice, before the people made the calf which represented the Egyptian Apis". But after that event "He bound them for the hardness of their hearts, that by sacrificing, and resting, and purifying themselves, and by similar observances, they might come to the knowledge of God, who ordained these things for them". (VI,ch.IV,20).

222. The Decalogue contains 620 letters: It was therefore regarded as the "Crown" of the Torah (Crown= יְדֵי עָשָׁר =620) which was explained as containing the 613 ( יְדֵי עָשָׁר ) יְדֵי עָשָׁר (of which 365 are prohibitions and 248 positive Commandments) plus the 7 Rabbinical commandments, (Cp. Herbert Loewe, Jud. & Christ. Vol.I,p.III, note 1; W. L. Knox, Jud. & Christ. Vol.II,p.87, see note).

223. This is also Dr. P. P. Levertoff's view; cp. Liturgy & Worship, S.P.C.K., 1936,p.63.

224. The Shema, the most important section of the liturgy, is composed of three parts: Deut.6,4-9; Deut.11,13-21; Num.15,37-41. It derives its name from the first word of the first section: Shema Israel. It is recited three times daily: twice at morning and twice at evening prayer and once at bedtime. In old times, the custom seems to have been to recite the Shema twice only, at the beginning and at the end of the day. Cp.Strack-Billerbeck, Vol.IV,part I,p.198.

226. Joel I,p.36; Ber.13b: Why was the Parashah of Fringes (Num.15,37ff) included in the Shema? Five reasons are given, one of which is Minuth. It is then asked: but where is there a reference to Minuth? The answer is:
"after your heart" means heresy; for thus the Scriptures state: "The fool saith in his heart, there is no God.

227. H. Loewe holds that "the secterian motive underlying the choice of extracts accounts for the dropping of the Decalogue in the Synagogue and emphasizing the Shema" (Montefiore & Loewe, Rabbinic Anthology, p.641).

228. For the doxology, see Singer's Prayer Book, p.LI. For Talmudic references, see Strack-Billerbeck, Vol.IV, part I, p.194f.

229. The present writer knows an analogous case. Some of Theophil Luki's "Chassidim" who used to attend faithfully the Synagogue Services, made it a practice, at the end of each prayer, to utter under their breath: "אֲשֶׁר יִבְיָרְשָׁא לְמָתֵן לְאֵל".

230. Cp. Sotah 9,14; "during the war of Titus", reads according to the Cambridge text: "Quietus", who was governor of Judea in A.D.116 or 117. Danby, Mishnah, p.305 note. Cp. Strack-Billerbeck, IV, p.406. The traditional day of the translation of the LXX, 8th Tebet, came to be regarded as an evil day. (Cp. Strack-Billerbeck IV, 414). This marks a definite regression from a more liberal position. Schlatter interprets the prohibition not referring to the language itself, but to Greek literature and rhetoric. Its purpose was not so much revenge on Israel's enemies, as an attempt to sever the ties between Palestine and Hellenistic Judaism, for political reasons (cp. A. Schlatter, Die Tage Trajans und Hadrians, pp.89ff).

231. Cp. Dial. chch.LXXI, LXXII, LXXIII.

235. Joseph Reider, ib. p.99. Theodotion's translation, which was prior to that of Aquila's was really a revision of the LXX but still under its influence; cp. Schlatter, op. cit. p.364.

238. ib. p.28.

240. Quoted from Rabbinic Anthology, p.161.
241. A similar passage is to be found in Num. R. 14,10: "The Holy One, blessed be He, gave Israel two Toroth, the written and the oral. He gave them the written Torah in which are six hundred and thirteen commandments in order to fill them with precepts whereby they could earn merit. He gave them the Oral Torah whereby they could be distinguished from the other nations. This was not given in writing, so that the Ishmaelites should not fabricate it as they have done the written Torah and say that they are Israel". Dr. A. Cohen recognizes in this passage a reference to the Christians. (cp. Everyman's Talmud, p.155f).

243. Berachoth 28b; English translation by A Cohen, Cambridge, 1921; the original text reads: ג''ה יבבנ יבשת עטשא עשתה ברכהו לזל ושת''ח הלא בנהה אוח צדמק יבצפור וצתרוסמ קוזש וצאמור ררמא ימעול עולמה.

244. A body of men, referred to in Talmudic literature, as the spiritual leaders of Judaism during the period from Ezra to Simeon the Just (end of 4th. century B.C.)

245. Levine, observes in a footnote, that under Gamaliel II (ca 90A.D.) "the question of excommunication was brought to the fore". (The Parting of the Roads, p.302). But it is not clear whether this stands in any relationship to the Jewish-Christian controversy. Strack-Billerbeck emphasise that the פֵּרַע was not used as a means of excluding from the Synagogue till the 9th cent. (cp. Strack-Billerbeck, IVmp.331). (Or does Levine, perhaps, refer to the Birkat ha Minim ?)

246. Singer's Prayer Book, p.LXIV.

249. Abrahams, Pharisaism II, p.61f.

251. Abrahams, ibid. p.LXV.

252. Abrahams says: "The text has been modified again and again, owing to the whims of censors"; cp. also Montefiore, Rabbinic Literature & Gospel Teachings, p.99.
253. S. Krauss, The Jews in the works of the Church Fathers, Jewish Quarterly Review, Vol. V, p. 131 ff. The Church Fathers in question are: Justin, Dial. ch. 16; 96; Origen, Hom. in Jer. 18, 2; Epiphanius, Haeres, 29, 9; Jerome in Jes. 2, 13, reads: "Sub nomine Nazaraeorum anathematizant vocabulum Christianum"; and ibid. 49, 7: "Christo sub nomine Nazaraesorum maledicta"; also ibid. 52, 4: "sub nomine, ut saepe dixi, Nazaraesorum ter die in Christianos congerunt maledicta, etc". Krauss corrects Schürer's opinion that Epiphanius' phrase διά τοῦ τῆς ἡμέρας θυσίας τῷ Χριστῷ ἐποβρέφοντα εἰς τὴν εἰρήνην τῶν ἀνθρώπων means "at the conclusion of the prayers" (Schürer, Geschichte des jüd. Volkes, II, 387), but rather, "while they read the prayers". But cp. Strack-Billerbeck, IV, part I, p. 219.

254. Schechter's text reads: גניזה אן מדרים אורי תכשיט, הנמצא במרה תואר במקיף, והנה בקשר בו למחשבה קדושה ובה הוא מצית קבר, והנה שם היכינון, ברך

256. Tos. Ber. III, 25: "The Eighteen Benedictions which the Majority have ordered, correspond to the eighteen times that the Lord is mentioned in the Psalm beginning 'Give to the Lord, O ye Sons of the mighty' (Ps. 39). One combines (the Benediction about) the Minim with that about the Pharisees..." Canon Lukyn Williams explains re Pharisees: The word does not occur in either of the two forms of the Shemoneh Esreih, though in the best text of the Babylonian 'the pious' (nachasidim) are mentioned in No 13", i.e. the following benediction. A. Lukyn Williams, Tractate Berakoth, S. P. C. K., 1921, p. 43.

263. Strack-Billerbeck translate "zwei oder drei Augenblicke" so also Schwaab. Schwaab thinks it impossible that Samuel would have been kept waiting for two or three hours. He also refuses to see anything mysterious in the fact that he forgot the prayer. The reason for it, Schwaab explains by the fact that before the insertion of the 12th benediction, the 11th was followed by the 13th. He therefore understands the word נַעֲלוּת "at the end" (Bak. Ber. V,3), meaning at the end of the whole Tefilla (i.e. after having skipped the Birkat ha Minim altogether and not merely the words הַלְּכָה (Schwaab, p.142). Cp. also Strack-Billerbeck IV, part I, p.219.

264. Ber. 23b.
268. Klausner, Abrahams, Strack-Billerbeck, etc.
270. Schörrer, II, 45, p.544.
271. Schwaab, p.149.
275. Schwaab, p.152.
278. Klausner, Jesus, p.18f.
281. cf. Ant. XVIII, V, 2.
283. Yeb. IV, 13; Danby's translation; R. Joshua's definition of a bastard: (The offspring of any union)for which the partakers are liable to death at the hands of the court. Cp. Klausner, p.35f.

284. Klausner explains that Ḥ is an abbreviated form for Ṣ or Ṣ. He categorically denies the allegation that Ḥ is a nickname for Ṣ and made up of the initials: Ḥ. See Klausner p.229 and note. Cp. also Hugh J. Schonfield, According to the Hebrews, London, 1937, who thinks that "Jeshu" is a north-Palestinian contraction of Jeshua, where the letter ayin was not sounded, (p.221).

287. see Klausner, p.22f.

288. see Klausner, p.22f.

289. ibid p.23f.

290. The tradition that Jesus was a sorcerer is very old, there are hints of it already in the Gospels, cp. also Justin, Dial. c.69 -

291. "Yeshu ha-Nozri burned his food in public"-

292. The names of the disciples are given as: Mattai (Matthew), Nagei (Luke, so Krauss), Netzer (pun on Notzrim, Klausner), or Andrew, (Krauss), Buni (Nicodemus, cp. Taan. 20a; or John, (so Klausner) and Todah (Thaddeus).

293. R. T. Herford, Christianity in Jewish Literature, in Hastings Dict. of Christ & the Gospels, II, p.877f. Cp. also Herford, Christianity in Talmud & Midrash; also Klausner, op.cit.pp.18-47. Klausner denies, however, that Balaam is a pseudonym for Jesus, as it seems on good grounds (cp. Klausner, p.32-35).

296. The book was known in Jewish circles under several titles, like Ma'aseh Talui, Ma'aseh do'otho v'eth bno, etc. Wagenseil, Tela ignea Satanae, Altdorf, 1681, offers a good Hebrew text, together with a Latin translation. An earlier version of the Tol'doth is contained in Pugio Fidei Ḥ Raymundus Martinus (1220?–1284?).

300. ib. p.242. Schonfield apparently contradicts this view. He makes out that the author of the Tol'doth has purposely confused Simon Magus, the arch-enemy of the Christian legend, with the person of Jesus. Ben Stada of the Talmud, he identifies with Simon the Stadios, the Standing One, spoken of in the Clementine Homilies (II,22) who was only later confused with Ben Pandera. (op. Schonfield, p.120).

301. Krauss has not in mind the present Yosippon (first published in the 10th century, see Klausner,p.52), but an earlier Yosippon, referred to by an Arab writer, Ibn Hazm (d.1065), and the author of The Chronicles of Yerachmeel, but Klausner gives good reasons why this view is untenable. (see Klausner, p.51f).

302. Schonfield, p.23.

304. ibid p.191.

305. ibid p.226.

308. Klausner, p.51. For Agobard's evidence to the Tol'doth Yeshu, see A. Lukyn Williams, Adversus Judaeos,p.352, para.3. Klausner calls it a "book", but actually it was an epistle addressed to the Emperor Charlemagne, "recapitulating the Canons of Councils and the decrees of Kings, and enumerating at some length the grievous superstitions of Jews in general". (Lukyn Williams, p.351).

311. Klausner, op. cit. pp. 47-54; For fuller details, see Krauss. Useful notes and a good summary are contained in Travers Herford's article on Christ in Jewish Literature, Hastings Dict. of Christ and the Gospels, II, p. 878, para. II.

312. Travers Herford, ib. p. 879b.

314. Nit'il, a corruption of natalis.

317. In fairness to the Jew, it must be admitted that the Church's guilt is immeasurably larger. Canon Danby rightly remarks: "Centuries of Christianity of a kind have made it a Christian instinct to loathe the Jew". The Jews, on the other hand, unable to repay in kind, "retorted in the only way that remained open to them - the rendering of Christianity ridiculous and contemptible within their own circle". (Herbert Danby, The Jew & Christianity, pp. 55-41).

319. The sentence in italics comes from an article in the American Jewish weekly Ha-Doar occasioned by the appearance of Klausner's book; quoted by Danby, op. cit. p. 118.

Notes to Chapter III.

2. Harnack rightly stresses the fact that Paul was not the first missionary to the Gentiles and that he never made such claims. The importance of Paul's influence: "Er hat das Recht der Mission und die Pflicht wirklich begründet, und er hat die Bewegung aus unsicheren Anfängen zur Weltumspannenden Mission erhoben". (Die Mission, pp. 33ff and note 2; p.37; cf. also Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.34f).

10. So Peake; Klausner holds that the Decree does not justify speaking of "food-laws". "James yielded to the Gentiles in the matter of Terephah, but not in the matters of Nebelah and the eating of blood, both of which were abominable to an Essene and observing Jew like James" (From Jesus to Paul, p.368 note 18).

11. καὶ ὅλα ἡμᾶς ἡλετε ἐαυτοῖς ζῆν εἰθαλ ἐτέρον μὴ ποιεῖν D also adds after εὐ πράξετε: φεσομένων ἐν τῷ εἰρήν πνεύματι Cp.Alford's Greek N.T. in loc.

18. ib.p.253; But Lake admits that to the Jewish mind there was nothing wrong in "putting 'blood' into the same category with idolatry and forbidden marriages".

19. Cp. Harnack, Untersuchungen zu den Schriften des Lukas, Leipzig, 1908, pp.153ff. and p.156. As against Zahn's view that Luke only acted as a copyist. Kirsopp Lake, like Harnack, favours the view that the Decree itself is historically authentic. The fact that Paul makes no reference to it either in Galatians or in I Corinthians, signifies that he purposely ignored it. For to accept them "would have been an abnegation of his own claims". (Lake, op.cit.p.262).

21. Cp. Sanh. 56b. Ab. Zara 64b; Gen R to 8,17; Dt. R 2 (198b)

23. Maimonides H Mel. 8,10.

24. Jewish sources differ as to the number of the Commandments and the particular clauses; cp. Strack-Billerbeck, III, p.37f.

25. Peake points out that the Decree did not provide for a situation which arose at Antioch: "Nothing had been said as to the relation in which Jewish Christians stood to the Law" (Paul & the Jewish Christians, p.23), But cp. F. C. Burkitt, Christian Beginnings, London, 1924, p.154: "It was a law regulating the diet and social behaviour that Gentile Christians must adopt if Jewish Christians were to feel free to eat with them".

26. Conrad Henry Moehlman, describes the position of the early Church: "The Judaistic Christians desired to convert all Christians to Judaism and all Jews to Christianity. The Peter-James group desired to convert all Jews to a conservative type of Christianity. Paul sought to convert Jews and Gentiles to a liberal Christianity..." (The Christian-Jewish Tragedy, New York, 1933, p.189f). This is an oversimplification of the case, but describes the position. It is, however, still questionable whether Peter and James differed from Paul in principle. Moehlman's allegation that Paul despised the Law has no foundation.

29. Cf. Justin, Dialogue, CXXI; CXVII; Eusebius on Is. XVIII, 1f; Origen against Celsus, VI, 27; Tertullian, Ad nationes I, 14; see also Harnack, Mission, p. 40f, note 3. But Abrahams shows with good reason that some evidence has no historical basis, as in the case of the Martyrdom of Polycarp. Jews could not have been preparing wood and faggots on a day which is stated to be the Great Sabbath (Cp. Abrahams, op. cit. II, p. 67ff); there is also no evidence that the Jews were guilty of the Neronian persecution. The fact that Poppaea, Nero's second wife was friendly towards the Jews (cp. Joseph., Antiq., XX, VIII, 11) is not sufficient grounds for such a statement. On the other hand, Prof. W. D. Niven, makes an important observation concerning the difference of behaviour between the Jews in Palestine and those in the Diaspora. Whereas in Palestine, they were held responsible for public disorder, abroad there was no such restraining influence. "The rousing of mob violence against Christians was therefore vastly easier outside Palestine than in it", (The Conflicts of the Early Church, p. 67). Dr. James Parkes takes an opposite view, cp. Conflict, ch. IV, pp. 121-150.

30. Gerald Friedländer, The Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount, p. 34.

33. Cf. Justin, Dial., ch. VIII.

34. Trypho asks Justin: "Tell me, do you really admit that this place, Jerusalem, shall be rebuilt; and do you expect your people to be gathered together (there)?" This Justin admits, (ch. 80). In ch. 81, Justin explains that this hope is based on Is. and Rev.

37. Akiba's behaviour with regard to Bar Cochba's (his real name was Simeon) claim to Messiahship, has always been a puzzle. For a possible explanation, see Schlatter, Die Tage Trajans und Hadrians, p. 93.

40. For the difference between "Judaic" and "Judaistic", see F. J. A. Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 48.

42. James Parkes, Jesus, Paul & the Jews, p. 129.

45. Dial., XXIX.

46. Dial. ch. XXIX. The question: "Are you acquainted with them, Trypho "? is clearly rhetorical; Justin most obviously assumes that both draw upon the same sources. Cp. Lev Gillet, Dialogue with Trypho, Intern. Review of Missions, April, 1942, pp. 172ff.

47. Cf. Harnack, Texte und Untersuchungen, XXXIX, Leipzig, 1913, p. 49f. Harnack stresses the fact that Justin's home was in Samaria, he therefore had intimate knowledge of Hebrew Christianity.

48. The moderating influence of Hebrew Christianity upon the Gentile Church is well reflected in the words of the Clementines VIII, 7: "Neither, therefore, are the Hebrews condemned on account of their ignorance of Jesus, by reason of Him who has concealed Him, if, doing the things (commanded) by Moses, they do not hate Him whom they do not know". R. H. Snape describes the author as a "Christian heretic - an Essene Ebionite who regarded the Law as still binding" (Rabbinic Anthology, by Montefiore & Loewe, p. 639); Bardenhewer suspects Elchasaistic tendencies (op. cit. p. 67); but it is generally accepted that the author was a Hebrew Christian. (Cf. Hort, Clementine Recognitions, pp. 83ff).

49. Jerome, Ep. CXXI.

52. ib.p.133; Dr. Otto Bardenhewer thinks that these homilies are not so much against the Jews "als vielmehr gegen die Christen gerichtet, welche mit den Juden religiöse Feste feierten". (Patrologie, Freiburg/B, 1910,p.305).

55. Dr. Otto Bardenhewer points out that the Homilies were not so much directed against the Jews as against those Christians who celebrated Jewish festivals and observed Jewish customs (Patrologie, 1910, p.305); This has been sympathetically brought out by A. Fürst in his short chapter Chrysostomus' Reden wider die Juden, Christen und Juden, Strassburg, 1892, pp.20ff. Interesting material on the nature of the controversy between Church and Synagogue is contained in Aphrahat's homilies, cp. Georg Bert, Aphrahat des persischen Weisen Homilien, Texte und Untersuchungen, Leipzig, 1888. Specially important is homily XI on circumcision, XIII on the Sabbath, XV on the distinction of foods, XVI on the twelve tribes among the Gentiles who have taken the place of the people (of God), and, above all, XVII on Christ, that he is the Son of God. For a short summary see A. Lukyn Williams, Adversus Judaeos, pp.95ff; also Bardenhewer, pp.333ff.

57. Lord Macaulay, in his famous speech on Jewish disabilities, before the House of Commons in 1830, said with characteristic frankness: "During many ages we have, in all our dealings with them, abused our immense superiority of force..." (See Essay & Speech on Jewish disabilities by Lord Macaulay, ed. by Israel Abrahams & S. Levy, Edinburgh, 1909, p.57).

58. Parkes, Conflict, p.158.

60. Platina naturally regards Anacletus as the antipope and Innocent II as the legally instituted pope. (Cp. B. Platina, The Lives of the Popes, Engl. transl. II,p.39). But the fact is that Anacletus had the greater right to the see, the majority of cardinals being in his favour. That the schism revealed more than personal ambition on the part of Pierleoni, can be seen from the fact that after his death (Jan.25, 1138), another antipope, Victor IV, was elected.

62. Newman says: "The central issue in this warfare was that Anacletus belonged to a Jewish family". (ib. p. 248).

64. For a summary of the Discussion, see Lukyn Williams, Adversus Judaeos, pp. 141ff.

65. There is enough evidence to prove that the Jews were not inactive in making proselytes. Jewish influence was considerable. An interesting case is Bodo, the chaplain to Louis the Pious, who was converted to Judaism and assumed the name of Eleazar. (Cf. Solomon Katz, The Jews in the Visigothic and Frankish Kingdoms of Spain and Gaul, Cambridge, Mass., 1937, p. 45f; cf. also ib. p. 53f).

67. Parkes, Conflict, p. 214; for similar instances of Gregory's behaviour towards the Jews, see Solomon Katz, p. 28.

70. Gustav Pearlson, p. 172.

72. Fishberg, op. cit. p. 419f.

73. Parkes, Med. Community, p. 14. It is a curious fact, that the Jews fared better under the reign of the Vandals and the Arian section of the Church than under Catholic Christianity. They were justly treated in Italy by the Ostrogoths, and in Spain by the Visigoths. The Vandals left them free to exercise their religion. It was not until the conversion of Recared to Catholicism in 589, or more accurately, until the accession of Sisebut in 612, who resolved to enforce Recared's anti-Jewish laws, that the situation changed. Cf. Katz, op. cit. p. 11.

74. Parkes, Conflict, p. 178f.

75. ib. p. 181.

76. ib. p. 182.

77. Conflict, p. 185.

79. Several suggestions have been made concerning the heathen philosopher whose objections Macarius attempts to answer. Harnack suggested Porphyry (233-304?), the famous Neo-platonist, Duchesne is in favour of his later disciple, Hierocles. The latter is also Crafer's choice. Cp. ibid p.XV.

80. See Crafer, p.103.
81. ib.p.66.
82. Lord Macaulay, in his famous speech on the Civil disabilities of the Jews, remarked with great insight: "When once you enter on a course of persecution, I defy you to find any reason for making a halt till you have reached the extreme point". (Macaulay on Jewish Disabilities, ed. by I. Abrahams & S. Levy, p.45). These words of great wisdom have been adequately illustrated by Jewish history in ancient and modern times.

84. Cp. Parkes, Conflict,p.234. In later ages, the wealth of the Jews, ostentatiously exhibited, was a grave source of provocation; cp. E. N. Adler, Auto de Fe & Lew, 1908,p.47.
87. Cp. Parkes, Conflict, pp.366ff. Katz, however, admits that the Jews were involved in a plot against the state to the advantage of the Moors. (cp.op.cit.p.21; cf. also p.116f).
88. Parkes, Med. Community, p.40; cp. Katz,p.85. It must, however, be borne in mind that the Jewish position was only partly affected by religious considerations. Their status was, to a large extent, determined by the fact that they were foreigners. But the fact that they remained foreigners was determined by their religion. (cf.Katz, ib.p.84).

90. Cp. Parkes, Med. Community, p.108. It is not mere coincidence that the last city to eliminate the Ghetto in Europe was Rome (1870). I. Abrahams points out that at first "the Ghetto was rather a privilege than a disability, and sometimes was claimed by the Jews as a right when its demolition was threatened". (Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, London, 1895,p.65).

It became legally fixed that "the Jews and all their property belong to the King"; or as a Spanish King put it: "The Jews are ours and the peculiar patrimony of the royal treasury". (Parkes, Med. Com. p.107).

A well known example is Spain.

For a brief survey of these enactments, see Parkes, Conflict, Appendix, p.384f.

Cp. Hermann L. Strack, The Jew & Human Sacrifice, Engl. transl. 1909, pp.250ff. Rabbi Benjamin Ben Jonah of Tudela in Navarre, a Jewish merchant whose extensive travels took him almost round the then known world, draws a pleasant picture of Jewish life in Rome. He must have visited the "metropolis of all Christendom" in ca.1159/60. Rome at that time had a Jewish community of about 200. We learn that some of these Jews were "officers in the service of Pope Alexander". One of them, R. Jechiel, "frequents the pope's palace, being steward of his household and minister of his private property". Another Jew, R. Menachem, is spoken of as the president of the University. We are told that the whole Jewish community was greatly respected and paid tribute to no one. (The Itinerary of Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela, Engl. transl. by A. Asher, New York, p.38).

A typical case is the strange "conversion" of the Jews at Magona in Minorca, after their Synagogue had been plundered and burnt in ca. 418 A.D. (cp. M. L'Abbe Fleury, op. cit. pp.328ff).

ibid p.442.

Cf. Katz, op. cit. pp.10-31. This is an important chapter for the Church's dealings with the Jews at that period.

From the fact that Gamaliel the Patriarch, was deposed in 415, on the charge amongst other accusations, of having built new synagogues, Dr. Parkes adduces the existence of an even earlier law. (cp. Conflict, p.182; cf. also Katz, p.74).

107. ib. p. 250; The legal position with regard to Synagogues thus confiscated was, that once they have been used for Christian worship they remain the property of the Church. (cf. Katz, p. 74).

109. Ibid p. 263.

111. Parkes, Conflict, p. 335.

112. There is, however, some suspicion attached to the authenticity of the case, cp. Parkes, Med. Community, p. 39.

117. Ad Scapulam ch. II: "it is a fundamental human right, a privilege of nature, that every man should worship according to his own convictions... It is assuredly no part of religion to compel religion..."

119. Book V, ch. XX.

122. Cp. Parkes, Conflict, p. 268; In the reign of the Emperor Honorius, it was decreed in ca. 412 "that neophytes who through any external cause had become Christians might return to Judaism". (Newman, p. 364).

125. ib. p. 376.

126. Newman, pp. 360ff. Mr. Laurie Magnus quotes the words of a bishop, an eye-witness of forced baptism upon Jewish children: "I have seen many dragged to the font by the hair, and the fathers, clad in black, with bowed heads, accompanying their children to the altar, to protest against these inhuman baptisms. I have seen still more horrible and undescribable violence done them". (The Jew in the Christian Era, London, 1929, p. 236).

127. Alexander IV, in Nov. 1259; Clement IV, in Nov. 1265, etc.

129. E. N. Adler, Auto de Fé & Jew, p. 43.

130. ibid p. 43f.

131. The inquisition was spoken of as the Sanctum Officium.

132. The inscription upon the banner of the Inquisition at Goa; cp. Jew. Encycl. Vol. VI, p. 601. Raphael Sabatini in his book Torquemada & the Spanish Inquisition, London, 1913, reproduces a facsimile taken from Limborch's Historia Inquisitionis, representing the more popular banner of the Inquisition: a big cross in the centre, to the right of the Cross, a sword, to the left, an olive branch; surrounding the whole are the words: Exurge Domine et Judica causam Tuam. Psalm 73 (=Ps. 74, 22); ib. facing p. 272. See also Adler, facing p. 164.

134. Since the Bull "Ad extirpanda", issued by Pope Innocent IV in 1252 and repeatedly endorsed by his successors, Alexander IV (1254-61); Clement IV (1265-68); Nicholas IV (1288-92); Boniface VIII (1294-1303) etc., the civil authorities under pain of excommunication were obliged "to execute the legal sentences that condemned impenitent heretics to the stake". (Blötzler, op. tit.).

136. Judaism and Sorcery were often synonyms in medieval phraseology. Usury became the main trade of the Jews. (cp. Parkes, Med. Com., where the problems connected with usury are fully discussed).

138. ibid p. 139.

140. The title "Catholic Monarchs" was granted to Ferdinand and Isabella in 1495 in recognition of their fanatical zeal for the purity of the Church, see Adler, p. 55.
In Jewish literature, the Marranos are referred to as Anusim (= Ἀνασίμ, the outraged; οὐς = "the victim of an accident, unavoidably prevented, so Jastrow). The term Marrano is disputed - some hold it means swine, others that it refers to 1 Cor.16,22, where by some curious mistake μᾶκαρ and μᾶκαρ προτάσσεται were taken to be synonyms. This is still the case in the Polish version of the New Testament, printed by the Brit. & For. Bible Society.

Raphael Sabatini, op.cit.p.393: The author says of Torquemada: "His honesty of purpose, his integrity, his utter devotion to the task he had taken up are to be weighed in the balance of historic judgment against the evil that he wrought so ardently in the unflinching conviction that his work was good". This is certainly a mild estimation of a man who was guilty of so much human misery and untold suffering.

Adler assumes an earlier date, see op.cit.p.61.

There is considerable difference of opinion as to the number of victims penalised by the Inquisition. An exact computation is impossible, as much of the procedure was in secret and many documents have been lost. For general statistics, see Adler, op.cit.pp.39f & 99ff.

Some idea of the relentless cruelty shown by the Inquisition can be gained from an edict published in the Netherlands in order to prevent the spreading of Protestantism there: "Women who have fallen into heresy shall be buried alive. Men, if they recant, shall lose their heads. If they continue obstinate, they shall be burnt on the stake..." Quoted from James Anthony Froude, Short Studies on Great Subjects, 1879, Vol.I,p.49f.

Adler, p.48f.

Cecil Roth, ib. art. Marranos.

כָּתוּב מִצְבָּה בֵּית הָיוְתָּה לְמָזוּגָן תִּזְכִית

Kusari V, 25; So Hirschfeld, the Hebr. text does not quite give the same meaning, op. Cassel, p.432.

A longer version of the same letter is quoted by Graetz, op. cit. Vol. IV, pp.293ff; Graetz dates the letter, 1454.

157. Luther's attitude to the Jews remains somewhat of a puzzle. From his pamphlet "Jesus was born a Jew", published in 1523, to his Tischreden, where the Jews are pictured in the darkest colours, Luther seems to have undergone an unusual change. The cause of this change is difficult to explain. It is sometimes held that at the beginning of his career he hoped to rally the Jews round him, but in later years, when his hopes failed to materialise, he became a hardened enemy. That he gave up hope of converting the Jews is testified by his words: "Das jüdische Herz ist Stock = Stein = Teufelhart, das mit keiner Weise zu bewegen ist". Newman's suggestion that Luther's hostility was due to the influence of converted Jews, is entirely unsubstantiated. (Cf. Newman, Jewish Influence on Christ. Reform Movement, pp.625ff). The fact that Luther appears to be quoting from works of Jewish converts like Antonius Margaritha, is no evidence in itself, for his anti-Judaism left the plane of religious controversy and became personal antipathy to the race.

158. Jacques Maritain, Antisemitism, 1939, p.27.

159. A definite distinction must be made between Continental and British Christianity. The Churches of the British Isles, the Scandinavian Churches, the Church of Holland and to a large measure the Swiss Churches have shown a spirit of charity and tolerance in keeping with their great liberal traditions.

162. Ibid p.108.

165. Significantly enough, the Hebrew Bible ends with the last chapter of the 2nd book of Chronicles. It virtually has no end.

166. See Dr. J. H. Hertz, Alleged Christological References in Scripture, one volume ed. of his Pentateuch &
Haftorahs, London, 1938, p. 201f. The chief Rabbi's exegetical arguments don't meet the point; the main point is that to the Church the importance of the Old Testament lies in its witness to Jesus Christ.
Notes to Chapter IV.

1. The Jews refer to him as Rashi. He was born in Troyes in 1040 and died there in 1105; cp. Kaufmann Kohler, Jewish Theology, systematically and historically considered, New York, 1918, p.427; cp. also p.329.

2. His name has been Latinised to Maimonides. Jews refer to him as Rambam. He was born at Cordova in 1135 and died at Fostat (Old Cairo) in 1204, where he was court physician to the Caliph; for his attitude to Christianity, see p. 16 and ch. Three 3.

3. For Jewish influence upon the Renaissance and Reformation, see Charles and Dorothea Singer, The Jewish factor in Medieval thought; also G. H. Box, Hebrew Studies in Reformation Period and After; The Legacy of Israel, Oxford, 1927. Cp. also W. I. Schleiden, The Importance of the Jews for the Preservation and Revival of Learning during the Middle Ages, Engl. transl., London, 1911.

4. Special attention to the Jewish influence upon the Reformation is given by L. I. Newman, Jewish Influence on Christian Reform Movements, New York, 1925.

5. The Legacy of Israel, p.498.

6. The Jewish Encycl. pointedly remarks: "the external history of the Talmud reflects in part the history of Judaism persisting in a world of hostility and persecution". (Vol.XII,p.22).

7. To our knowledge, however, the Talmud was never on the Index librorum prohibitorum. It was thus not a prohibited book in the strict sense of the word. The Church only raised objections to certain passages referring to Jesus and Christianity.

10. 6. Zarek, quoted by Lindeskog, p.30, note 3. Husik, op. cit.p.429: "The material walls of the Ghetto and the spiritual walls of the Talmud and the Kabbala kept the remnant from being overwhelmed and absorbed by the hostile environment of Christian and Mohammedan". Husik connects the decline of the political and economic conditions of the Jews in the 14th. and 15th. centuries with the growth of mysticism and obscurantism.
11. R. Moses ben Nachman is usually referred to as Nachmanides; amongst Jews he is known as Ramban, from the initial letters of his name. He was known to non-Jewish scholars under the name of Bonastrec de Porta, which led in the past to the assumption of two distinct persons. Cp Jew. Encycl. Vol. IX, pp. 87ff.

13. Graetz, who calls Pablo Christiani "the first missionary preacher for the conversion of the Jews", holds that Pablo is to be held responsible for the banishment of his adversary. This, however, is doubtful. Graetz himself, comparing this dispute with the one held at Paris between Rabbi Yechezkel ben Joseph of Paris and Nicholas Donin (1240) says: "The Rabbi of Paris and the Dominican Donin fought like two fierce pugilists, who assailed each other with heavy blows of the fist, accompanied by words of abuse: the Rabbi of Gerona and the Dominican Pablo, on the other hand, met like two well-cultured noblemen, who dealt their blows with an air of politeness, and with due observance of the etiquette of refined society". (op. cit., III, p. 618).

15. Befestigung im Glauben, Hebr. with German transl. by Rabbi David Deutsch, Sohrau and Breslau, 1873; also Wagenseil, op. cit. For a short discussion of this work see Lindeskog, p. 19ff.

17. Frederick the Great; cp. Shalom Spiegel, Hebrew Reborn, London, 1931, p. 52

18. It is significant that at Lafayette's suggestion, the French Declaration began with the words: "Les hommes naissent et demeurent égaux en droits..." words borrowed from the American Declaration. (Cp. René Fülöp-Miller,

21. William Zukerman, The Jew in Revolt, London, 1937. This book offers an interesting study of the relationship between anti-Semitism and the capitalist system. The following passage is characteristic: "The Jew stands out as the most prominent symbol of the hateful system, as the living personification of the people's trouble, and it is upon him that their wrath is poured down first. It is not a coincidence that the outbursts of anti-Semitism occur always in times of economic depression and among nations most deeply steeped in economic despair... For anti-Semitism is primarily economic unrest, misdirected, misguided, following the wrong clue, but nevertheless not without some plausible, understandable, erring human reason". (p. 248).

23. Dr. Parkes writes: "According to Germanic Custom, a stranger was an object without a master. In so far as he was not protected, either by a powerful individual, or by inter-tribal or international arrangement, he did not enjoy the most elementary rights. He could be killed, and his murderer could not be punished; any man who gave him lodging was responsible for his actions; his property was ownerless, and his heir had no right of inheritance". (The Jew in the Medieval Community, p. 102ff)

24. Political motives are an important factor in all anti-Semitic agitations. A good example is furnished by the riots in Budapest which the Austrians staged in order to counteract the effects of the liberal-nationalist propaganda carried on by the famous Magyar leader Louis Kossuth (1802-1894); cp. Otto Zarek, Kossuth, Engl. by L. Hudson, London, 1937, pp. 226ff.

25. "Die wichtigste Folge der Emanzipation ist die Selbstbefreiung des jüdischen Geistes aus dem Zwange des Ghetto-Daseins und die damit zusammenhängende Assimilierung an die abendländische Kultur, was negativ die Entnationalisierung des Judentums bedeutete". (Lindeskog, op. cit. p. 33).

a - b.

29. The Pentateuch (1780-83); the Psalms (1783); the Song of Songs (1788); The significance of Mendelssohn's work can hardly be overestimated. M. Samuels aptly says of Mendelssohn: "Moses the son of Amram delivered his brethren from bodily slavery; the glorious task of emancipating their minds was reserved for Moses the son of Mendel". (Memoirs of Moses Mendelssohn, London, 1825, p.110).

35. ibid. p. 270. Mr. Cohen fails to mention, however, that such action was taken by the authorities on the request of the Jewish orthodox party which was bitterly opposed to every sign of Reform. (Cp. David Philipson, The Reform Movement in Judaism, New York, 1907, p.34f).

37. Mr. Cohen's partisan spirit has led him to many overstatements where Christian missions are concerned, and to several inaccuracies. Thus, quoting the authority of Die Allgemeine Zeitung des Judentums, 1897, p.317, he credits De le Roi with the saying: "Never has a Jew become baptized through conviction". But the fact is that De le Roi has written 3 volumes to prove the opposite! (Cf. Cohen op.cit.p.273f; cf. De le Roi, Die evangelische Christenheit und die Juden, 3 vols. Berlin, 1884-1892; cf. specially his Introduction).

40. Berlin, 1799; Cp. Schoeps, op.cit.p.98; David Philipson presents the incident between Friedländer and Teller in a different light, op. The Reform Movement in Judaism, New York, 1907, p.15f; but Schoeps' presentation is more accurate.

41. W. A. Teller, An einige Hausväter jüdischer Religion. Von einem Prediger in Berlin, Berlin, 1799. De le Roi records that Teller used to avoid at Jewish baptisms the traditional baptismal formula by saying: "Ich taufe dich auf das Bekenntnis Christi, des Stifters einer geistigeren und erfreuenderen Religion, als die der Gemeinde, zu welcher du bisher gehört hast". We are told that such alterations were a frequent occurrence in those days. (Cp. De le Roi, op.cit.Vol.II,p.34).

42. Philipson, op.cit.p.37.

43. Cp. Philipson, p.14f; Lindeskog, p.38; "The primary object of Reform has been to save the modern Jew for Judaism and Judaism for the modern Jew". Adolph Lichtigfeld, Twenty Centuries of Jewish Thought, London, 1937, p.163.

44. Israel Cohen divides lapsed Jews into two groups:
   a) Those who leave the Synagogue without entering the Church.
   b) Those who become nominal Christians. (Cp.op.cit.p.269).

45. For the history of the movement, see D. Philipson, op.cit. For a short summary of the main difference in points of doctrine see G. Gottheil, The development of religious ideas in Judaism since Moses Mendelssohn, a paper read before the World Parliament of Religions, Cincinnati, 1895, p.26ff; most valuable is Montefiore's book, Outlines of Liberal Judaism, London, 1912.

46. S. Formstecher, Die Religion des Geistes, eine wissenschaftliche Darstellung des Judentums nach seinem charakter, Entwicklungsgange und Berufe in der Menschheit, Frankfurt/M., 1841; for a short summary, see Lichtigfeld, p.144f.

47. Vallentine's Jewish Encycl. p.522b.

48. Israel I. Mattuck, What are the Jews, London, 1939, p.239; Liberal Judaism is the extreme wing in the Reform movement. There is a marked difference between Liberal and Reform Judaism, especially in Germany; cf. J. H. Hertz, Affirmations of Judaism, London, 1927, pp.124ff; (esp.p.125, note 10); Some Liberal Synagogues, notably in the U.S.A., have pushed reform to the extreme: The Beth Israel Congregation at Houston, Texas, has by a large majority of votes, adopted the principle to bar from active membership those who adhere to "the Rabbinical & Mosaic laws which regulate diet". It has also been decided to require from members the repudiation of the Hebrew language as "unintelligible to the vast majority of our coreligionists". (Jew. Chronicle, Jan. 7th, 1944). The opposition to Zionism on the part of American Rabbis is very considerable.

49. Philipson points out the difficulty of translating the German "Wissenschaft des Judentums". But he says: "if the word 'science' be understood in its original and larger meaning of knowledge and not in the more restricted significance of physical science, the phrase 'science of Judaism' may stand as the equivalent of the German". (op. cit. p. 38 note). It is in this sense that we make use of the phrase, following Philipson's example.

50. Lindeakog, op. cit. p. 41.
52. Cp. C. G. Montefiore, Outlines of Liberal Judaism, pp. 284ff; also Israel I. Mattuck, What are the Jews.
54. ibid p. 201.
57. The definition of political Zionism was left to a Western Jew, Theodor Herzl (1860-1904), (Der Judenstaat, 1896). Herzl was the founder of the Zionist World Organisation.
61. Cp. Affirmations, pp. 21f, 93f, 125, 179.
62. J. D. Eisenstein, (Ozar Wikuhim, 1928, p. 20), quoted by A. Lukyn Williams, The Doctrines of Modern Judaism considered, S.P.C.K., 1939, p. 50; cp. also the appended note by Herbert Danby, The Jew & Christianity, p. 113 (note 13), where similar views are expressed by "a Hebrew writer of considerable repute".
63. To call Dr. Klausner's work "a vindication of Christianity" betrays a mind of more than ordinary prejudice. Does Mr. Eisenstein know that Jesus enjoyed the reputation of a great teacher before Klausner's book was written? For a Christian scholarly criticism of Klausner's work, see C. J. Cadoux, Dr. Klausner's estimate of Jesus, The London
64. Affirmations, p. 93, note 16.

66. ibid. p. 233.

68. ibid. p. 243.

69. ibid. p. 263.

70. ibid. p. 264.

71. ibid. p. 267. This is the view of almost all Jewish scholars. Ernest R. Trattner, attempts to show "that Jesus was not an isolated phenomenon, a self-contained organism utterly unrelated to his fellow men, but a product of Jewish life" (As a Jew sees Jesus, New York & London, 1931, p. 35).

72. ibid. p. 271.

73. ibid. p. 274. The impracticability of Jesus' ethical teaching is often stressed by Jewish writers; cp. Klausner, op. cit. pp. 373ff.

74. ibid. p. 277.

75. ibid. p. 281: "No healthy state of society has ever been built on purely Christian principles".

76. ibid. p. 290f.

78. ibid. p. XVIII.

79. ibid. XXI; cp. also G. Friedländer, Hellenism & Christianity, London, 1912, pp. 49ff. It is, however, characteristic of Jewish scholarship to insist on the historicity of Jesus: "Wenn wir die Literatur überblicken, finden wir, dass die allermeisten jüdischen Autoren von der Geschichtlichkeit Jesu fest überzeugt sind". (Lindeskog, p. 207). But there are a few exceptions; Samuel Lublinski, Das Werdende Dogma vom Leben Jesu, Jena, 1910, advocates "die mythologische Richtung". Lublinski's aim is to work out a positive & synthetic picture of the "Erlösungsmythos" and to emphasize the magnificence of the symbol which forms its background. He therefore reduces the whole Synoptic tradition to mythology. Wherever two persons show any affinity or similarity, they instantly become "Doppelgänger", e.g., Mary and Martha, Lazarus and John, etc. cp. also Georg Brandes, Jesus-Sage, Berlin 1925.

80. Friedländer, op.cit.p.4.
81. ibid.p.XXIIf.
82. ibid.p.23; this is a common feature of most Jewish writers.

Abraham Geiger already said: "Sind die Ausserungen, die in den reinseitlichen Verhältnissen der Menschen gegen einander wurzeln, wirklich treu berichtet (i.e. in the Gospels,) so finden wir in ihnen entweder nichts Neues, oder das Neue tritt in einer gewissen krankhaften Weise auf, wie es einer kranken Zeit gehört". (Das Judenthum und seine Geschichte, Breslau, 1864, p.113). Lindeskog calls it the "Nihil novi" attitude, cp.op.cit.pp.217ff. and footnotes. Montefiore thinks that the majority of educated Jews would insist that the teaching of Jesus, "where good was not original, and where original was not Jewish or good". (In Spirit & in Truth, p.316).

83. Ibid p.XXVII; Test. Issachar, V, 2.
84. Ibid p.266.
86. Cf. Lindeskog, p.250.
87. Friedländer, p.262.
88. p. 265.
89. p. 262f.

91. ib.p.15.
92. ib.p.16.
93. Buber singles out two main features of Judaism: "Die erste grosse werbende Eigentümlichkeit der jüdischen Lehre war diese ihre Alloffenheit, die zweite war ihre Richtung auf die positive Tat. Sie wollte nicht wie etwa der Buddhismus, von der Welt weg, sondern ins Herz der Welt führen; sie forderte von dem tätigen Menschen nicht, dass er auf das Tun verzichte, sondern dass er das Rechte tun lerne". (Vom Geist des Judentums, Leipzig, 1916,p.32f)

94. Buber, Vom Geist des Judentums, p.33f; Buber explains that Christianity has conquered the West in its syncretistic form: "wohl hat sie (i.e. Christianity) vom Hellenismus mehr angenommen als Bilder und Worte; aber das dauernd Zeugende im Christentum war jüdisches Urgut". (ibidem). The greatest weakness of Christianity is its dualism which has its origin in Pauline theology. (Cp. Der Heilige Weg, pp.44ff). Prof. Buber has thus anticipated Klausner's last book, From Paul to Jesus; (cp.pp.204f; 522, and throughout).

95. Buber, Der Heilige Weg, p.40.

96. ibid.p.41.

97. ibid.p.48f. Saul, the man of Tarsos, whom Buber calls a "representative Jew", has deflected the essential Jewishness of Jesus' message, in his effort to hand it over to the Gentile world. Over and against the ever-present attempt of Judaism to positive action, stands the Pauline conception of human impotence. Buber calls Paul's attitude the "titanic renunciation" (titanischer Verzicht).

99. "...an Stelle dieses echt jüdischen Wissens tritt die Annahme einer grundsätzlichen und unüberbrückbaren Zweifheit von Menschenwillen und Gottesgnade". (Der Heilige Weg, p.45).

100. Der Heilige Weg, p.47.

101. Quoted by Levertoff, Der Weg, Jan/Feb., 1933,p.8. (Yiddish).

102. "Dies, dass Gott in der Welt...verwirklicht werden will... dieses abgründeiche Wissen ist Jesu tiefstes Judentum". (Der Heilige Weg, p.41).

103. ibid.p.44.

104. It may be that Prof. Buber would object to such a statement. But the general trend of his reasoning makes such an assumption possible.

105. ibid.p.18.

107. "The Jew must change his attitude before the world, and come into spiritual fellowship with those around him. John, Paul, Jesus himself, we can claim them all for our own. We do not want "missions" to convert us. We cannot become Presbyterians, Episcopalians, members of any dividing sect, 'teaching for doctrines the opinions of men'. Christians as well as Jews need the larger unity that shall embrace them all, the unity of spirit, not of doctrine'. (Miss Josephine Lazarus, The Outlook of Judaism, in Judaism at the World's Parliament of Religions, Cincinnati, 1894, p.303).

108. The emphasis upon the Jewishness of Jesus is common to all Jewish writers, with the exception of the ultra-orthodox. By placing Jesus of Nazareth within the line of religious development, the edge of his uniqueness is broken and he can be dealt with as a phenomenon belonging to the manifold manifestations of the spirit of Judaism.

111. Synoptic Gospels, 1927, appended note at the end of the 2nd. vol.

113. "The teaching of Jesus, which has had such gigantic effects upon the world, is more and other than a dissected list of injunctions. It is not merely the sum of its parts; it is a whole, a spirit". S.G.,1909,p.CIVf. cp. Some Elements of the Relig. Teaching of Jesus,1910,p.85f.

114. Lindeskog, p.236f. Though Montefiore was not the first to hold this view, Lindeskog says of him: "Er scheint mir das Problem geschickter und bewusster als andere gestellt und gelöst zu haben". The greatest merit of Montefiore's work is his honesty in controversy and his fine sense of justice. An outstanding example of these great qualities is his essay, Jewish Views of Christianity (In Spirit & in Truth, pp.311ff).

116. Some Elements of the Teaching of Jesus, p.20. cp. S.G., p.CXXXIV: "His teaching is a revival of prophetic Judaism, and in some respects points forward to the Liberal Judaism of to-day".

118. The Teaching of Jesus, pp.55ff.

119. ibid.pp.89ff. Montefiore holds that while the Talmud and other Rabbinic literature is opposed to Christian trinitarian doctrine, yet there is no contradiction "between the religious and ethical teaching of Jesus and the best religious and ethical teaching of the Rabbis". (Rabbinic Literature & Gospel Teachings, London, 1930, p.161). At another place, Montefiore remarks: "Jesus was not so far from the Rabbis, nor were the Rabbis so far from Jesus". (ib. p.195).

120. ib.pp.125ff; 132; Montefiore, though admitting what he calls "a marked personal element" in the teaching of Jesus, thinks that this has been unduly emphasized by tradition and editors; cp. ib.pp.156ff.

121. ibid.p.131.

122. ibid.p.141.

123. "To the hardest excellence of all even Jesus could not attain. For it was far easier for him to care for the outcast than to care for his opponent..." (ib.p.53). In this respect he did not differ from the Rabbis. (cp. Montefiore & H. Loewe, A. Rabbinic Anthology, London, 1938, p.XXIX).

124. ibid.p.146.

125. Montefiore holds that though the evidence is conflicting, Jesus inclined to the universalistic view; cp. p.70f.

126. ibid.p.139; Montefiore admits that a subjective element enters into the task of textual criticism; cp. passages where he expresses the hope that certain utterances are unauthentic because they conflict with his own views; p.164.

127. cp.pp.143, 145, 147, 152, 156, 159 etc.

131. J. Q. R., Jan. 1901, p.168ff. But Montefiore does not altogether reject Paul. H. Loewe, in his introduction to the Rabbinic Anthology, objects to Montefiore's opinion that "There are no such religious geniuses and innovators as Jesus, Paul and the author of the Fourth Gospel among the Rabbis". In Loewe's view, Hillel's introduction of Prosbul and Simeon's ben Shetach's invention of Ketubbah make them of equal importance to society. The Rabbis have, therefore, also a claim to the title "religious innovators". (p.XCIXf).

132. The Significance of Jesus for his own age, Hibbert Journal XX, 1911/12, p.773, 779.

135. H. J., III, 1904/5, p.657; in his later work, Rabbinic Literature & Gospel Teachings, Montefiore has made an even stronger case for the originality of Jesus; cp.ib. p.162f.

140. Liberal Judaism & Hellenism etc., p.128. (The whole chapter, Liberal Judaism of the New Testament, gives a clear outline of Montefiore's position and also contains some of the most striking tributes to Jesus Christ).

141. Liberal Judaism & Hellenism etc., p.126f.

142. Outlines of Liberal Judaism, p.313.

146. ibid.p.217.

147. ibid.p.205: Antiq. XVIII,3,3.

151. The Origins of the Synagogue & the Church, pp. 218; 230.

152. ibid. p. 230.

153. ibid. p. 223.

154. op. cit. p. 231.

155. Origins of the Synagogue & the Church, pp. 217, 229f; it is interesting to observe that a similar criticism is made by Klausner with regard to Judaism. Klausner points out that Judaism by its tendency to give to all accidents of life a religious bent has made the development of politics impossible. That is the reason why "the Arabian, Abyssinian & Cuzarite kings, who embraced Judaism in the Middle Ages, found themselves unable to survive"; (Klausner, op. cit. p. 226); in opposition to the Rabbinic striving for "a higher synthesis", however, Jesus fully accepted a duality alien to the spirit of Judaism (cp. ib. p. 373f).

156. Israel Abrahams, Studies in Pharisaism & the Gospels; First series, 1917; second series, 1924.

158. ibid. p. 16.

160. ibid. p. 149.

162. ibid. p. 146; cp. Aboth III, 20; Abrahams explains the Pharisaic position as an effort "to hold the balance between man's duty to strive to earn pardon and his inability to attain it without God's gracious gift of it" (ib. p. 147). Strangely enough, the Pauline words of Phil. 2, 12f, entirely escaped the author.

163. ibid. p. 156.
164. ibid. p.88.
166. Montefiore, Outlines of Liberal Judaism, p.304.
168. For a survey of the literature, cp. Lindeskog, chapters V, X, and his exhaustive bibliographical list, pp.328ff.
170. Robert Eisler, The Messiah Jesus and John the Baptist, according to Flavius Josephus' recently rediscovered 'Capture of Jerusalem' and the other Jewish & Christian Sources, Engl., London, 1931, p.X: "I was actuated almost exclusively by a boundless curiosity and a passionate desire to get at the real truth".
175. Trattner, op.cit.p.49.
176. ibid.p.50.
179. This is the burden of Klausner's recent book, From Jesus to Paul.
180. Enelow, A Jewish view of Jesus, p.159; Montefiore says of Paul that he was "a religious genius of the first order", (Rabbinic Judaism & St. Paul, J.Q.R., Jan.1901).
"Paul," says Graetz, "conceived Christianity to be the very opposition of Judaism. The one was founded on Law and compulsion, the other owed its origin to freedom and grace". (II, p.231).

But cp. Solomon Grayzell, Vallentine's Jewish Encycl., p.463a. Dr. Grayzell says: "The Epistles of Paul are permeated with Jewish concepts and Jewish modes of thought". But elsewhere, Grayzell says that Paul could not have been for any length of time a pupil of Gamaliel since his subsequent writings show no evidence of an understanding of Pharisaism". (ib. p.505b); Montefiore holds Paul's opposition "of work and faith, and of merit and grace" as inapplicable to Rabbinic Judaism, which is an "unsystematic mixture of works and of faith, of grace and of merit". (J.Q.R., Jan., 1901, p.183).

But cp. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.309; Klausner says: "it seems to me that there is evidence, even if it is not absolutely conclusive, that Paul was a pupil of Rabban Gamaliel".

The Origins of the Synagogue & Church, p.261. cp. also Kohler's art. on Paul, Jew. Encycl., Vol. XI, pp.79ff; cp. also Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.304f. Klausner says: "If Paul could without sufficient grounds assign Jesus to the house of David, why could he not assign himself to the house of Saul"? Klausner explains that he called himself a Benjaminite on the grounds that his namesake King Saul also belonged to that tribe. (!)

ib. p.127; Dr. Wise's denial of the actual crucifixion of Jesus is based upon the apparent similarity between the martyrdom of Jesus and that of Antigonus who was scourged and crucified by the Romans under Antony. Paul made use of the death of the latter because there was great sympathy amongst the peoples of the east for him. ! Cp. also Salomon Reinach, Orpheus, A history of religions, London, 1931, p.245f, 249f.

Reinach, Orpheus, p.253; cp. p.257f. A peculiar view is that of Moriz Friedländer, who sees in Paul a representative of Jewish Hellenism which was opposed to the Pharisee:
"ein richtiger Phariseer ist er dennoch niemals gewesen".
When Paul first heard Apollos preach in Ephesus "da wurde er inne, dass der Inhalt seiner Predigt sich mit dem göttgeoffenenbarten Evangelium Jesu decke". This would, of course, mean that the essence of the Gospel message existed independently of the preaching of Jesus. Indeed, Friedländer says of Apollos: "Dieser predigte, ohne noch von Jesu Kenntnis zu haben, sein hellenistisches Judentum frei in den Synagogen der griechischen Diaspora".
Die religiösen Bewegungen, p.342f; cp. also pp.344ff.

192. ibid., p.311f.
193. cp. ib., p.310; Shab.30b. In a note Klausner explains that "there is no good basis for the conclusion that the Rabban Gamaliel, who discoursed about the Messianic Age, was Rabban Gamaliel II (Rabban Gamaliel of Jabneh), as Sachar asserts against I. S. Bloch". (p.311 note 40); 194. The reference is to Shab. 30b, where to Gamaliel's teaching regarding the Messianic age, somebody referred to as "that pupil", is supposed to have laughed and to have quoted Eccl.1,9: There is no new thing under the sun;
cp. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.600f; Aboth III,12 contains this striking passage: R. Eleazar of Modiim said: "If a man profanes the Hallowed Things, (some texts read 'the Sabbaths') and despises the set feasts, and puts his fellow to shame publicly, and makes void
the covenant of Abraham our father (i.e. circumcision) and discloses meanings in the Law which are not according to Halakah, even though a knowledge of the Law and good works are his, he has no share in the world to come".
(cp. A. Jellinek, Zur Geschichte der Polemik gegen das Christentum, Orient, X, (1847), p.413; G. Kittel, 195. ib., p.312; cp. p.465: Klausner explains that Paul, influenced by his environment, created a religion "which was Judaism and non-Judaism at the same time. Such a religion", the author says; "could not have been created or founded by Jesus, who, with all the strange, non-Jewish elements that came to him, perhaps from the schismatic Jewish sects founded by apocalyptists, or more correctly, from a very vivid expectation of "the end of days", was nevertheless a Jew rooted in the soil of Palestine".
196. ib., p.466: a similar view is expressed by M. Friedländer.
He describes Paul as: "der Diasporajude, in dessen Brust zwei Seelen wohnten, zwei Kulturen, die jüdische
u. die griechische, miteinander rangen".(Die relig.Beweg.,
p.371).
Jesus' teaching already contained the germ for the future rise of Christianity, cp. Jesus of Nazareth, p. 371.

ib. p. 590; it is to be noted that Klausner attaches considerable importance to the influence of the primitive Jewish Church upon the views of Paul. The germs of some characteristic tendencies in Pauline thought are already present, according to Klausner, in primitive Christianity, while still on Jewish soil. If this were not so, it is difficult to see, Klausner says, the reason why James the brother of Jesus was executed in the year 62 A.D. He thus ignores Eisler's hypothesis which gives a political interpretation to the death of James. This Eisler does by connecting the Brother of the Lord with the ultra-nationalist party, which apparently dissatisfied with the pro-Roman policy of the priestly hierarchy, acclaimed James to the High priestly office. Ananus, however, profiting "by the interregnum in the Roman governorship after the death of Festus" had James executed. (Robert Eisler, The Messiah Jesus and John the Baptist, Engl., London, 1931, pp. 540ff).

Quoted by Lindeskog, p. 27.

"Like the Prophets of old, Jesus unhesitatingly criticized the religion of his people; but no more than they, did he dream of instituting any independent organization or of becoming the founder of a new faith". (Trattner, p. 46).

Moriz Friedländer, Die religiösen Bewegungen, p. 317.

Enelow, op. cit. p. 73.

Graetz, II, p. 156; cp. Trattner, p. 55.

Cp. Graetz, II, pp. 149ff; Moriz Friedländer's view, according to which Jesus acted in conscious opposition to the Pharisees and stood on the side of the Am ha-arez, found little support among Jewish scholars. (cp. Klausner, p. 116); for Friedländer's view concerning the Am ha-arez, see Lindeskog, p. 153.

211. Trattner, op.cit.p.50f;

212. Enelow, p.85.

214. Adolph Danziger, Jewish Forerunners of Christianity, London, 1904, p.32. Danziger comments on the death of Jesus: "Jesus died for the essence of all religion; for purity, charity and holiness; for a cause in which death itself is a godly thing". (ib.p.51).

217. ib.p.132; cp. also the view of S. Heinach, Orpheus, p.153

221. Klausner, Jesus, p.374.

222. Graetz, II, p.368.

226. Klausner, pp.211; 245.

Klausner, in a prefatory note to his most recent book From Jesus to Paul, remarks: "I came to the conclusion, after much research, that Jesus considered himself to be the Messiah, and that, by means of the repentance and the morality which he preached in Jewish cities, he expected to bring redemption to Israel"; p.IX; cp.p.4, pp.255ff. etc.

R. T. Herford, Jesus Christ, (small pamphlet), London, 1901, p.18; Herford holds that the final step of the deification of Jesus was taken by "John", by identifying him with the Divine Word (ib.p.20).

From Jesus to Paul, p.107.

Eisler's main argument seems to rest upon the fact of Jesus' crucifixion as an "auctor seditionis". (cp.op. cit.pp.510ff); the reconstruction of his sources, his treatment of the so called Testimonium Flavianum, and his use of the Slavonic Bellum Judaicum, has met with severe criticism; cp. Gustav Pfannmüller, Jesus im Urteil d. Jahnhundert, Berlin, 1939, pp.399ff; cp. also Lindeskog, op.cit. p.193ff.

Am ha-arez in Friedländer's view is not the "idiotische Pöbel" of a later period, but the land-gentry which stood in opposition to the Pharisaic party; cp. Die relig. Bewegungen, pp.78ff; but cp. I. Abrahams' notes on the Am ha-arez appended to Montefiore's commentary, 2nd. ed.

Friedländer sees the mission of Jesus in the attempt to break the power of Pharisaism which hindered Judaism from becoming a world-religion. But Paul went one step further; the Apostle broke the letter of the Law of Moses; cp.op.cit.p.354.

Moriz Friedländer, Die relig. Bewegungen, pp.318ff; it is interesting to note that Friedländer, like other Jewish scholars, feels the harmony of the person of Jesus disturbed by the double strain in his character (severity and humility, love and rigour, etc.). But Friedländer ingeniously explains the double presentation of the character of Jesus by the double conception people had of the Messiah: "bald als eine von himmlischer Liebe überquillende, bald als eine kriegerische, die Welt in Schrecken setzende, mit dem Hauch seines Mundes tösende Persönlichkeit". This duality "ist eine Schöpfung der Evangelisten"; it does not belong to the historical Jesus. It only betrays the close connection between primitive Christianity and the Apocalyptic literature. But the historical Jesus by far outdistances (überragt) the mythological portrait. (ib.pp.323-328).
M. Friedländer, op.cit.p.339; it may be noted that Klausner attributes the emphasis upon the individual, not to Jesus, but to Paul, and regards it as a departure from traditional Jewish teaching, cf. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.119; 555.

Cf. Abba Hillel Silver, A history of Messianic Speculation in Israel from the 1st through the 17th Centuries, New York, 1927, pp. 6ff

ib.p.64.

ib.p.111; "after his death, his disagreements with contemporary Judaism were magnified in the interests of Gentile propaganda". (p.50).

ib.p.78; op. also p.145f. Trattner explains that Jesus' emphatic "I say unto you" - "is merely...a very old and approved rabbinical method". (p.86); op.p.

Enelow, op.cit.p.128. 248; ib.p.150.

Montefiore, The teaching of Jesus, p.20; S.G. (1927) p.25; op. D. Chwolson, Das Letzte Passamahl Christi, p.89; "Der Kern und die Quintessenz der Lehre Christi besteht, wie allgemein erkannt wird, in der Vergeistigung der Religion

Enelow, op.cit.p.131f; cp.p.92.

Klausner, From Paul to Jesus, p.p.266; 267f.

ib.p.212; it is difficult to see what Klausner means by the phrase "the disciples decided". Does he visualize some sort of a conference which resulted in a change of policy? The author is actually trying to evade unobtrusively a problem of the greatest importance. It involves the question: how did the Messianic movement, with its national implications, become a purely mystical movement continued by Paul? On Klausner's own evidence, the change began not with the Apostle of the Gentiles, but with the primitive Church in Palestine. (op.ib.p.343, et al)

ib.p.268; cp.also p.437f. 257. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, p.312f.
258. Maimonides, Mishneh Torah (Yad ha-Hazakah), Hilkhot Melakhim, XIV, 4; cp. p. 15f.
261. Trattner, op. cit., foreword.
262. Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, p. 413f.
263. Graetz, op. cit. II, p. 149.
266. Enelow, op. cit. p. 167.
267. ib. p. 170; Schalom Ben-Chorin, in his preface to the booklet containing George L. B. Sloan's address on the Christian view on the O. T. and his own answer, well remarks: "die protestantische Kirche, ebenso wie die Synagoge, kann heute nicht durch einen Sprecher verbindlich vertreten werden. Was allein möglich scheint in dieser Weltstunde, ist ein Glaubensgespräch zwischen Juden und Christen. Das heisst also zwischen Einzelnen, die als Einzelne sprechen, nicht als Delegierte einer Gruppe". (Das christliche Verständnis des Alten Testaments und der jüdische Einwand, Jerusalem, 1941).
268. ib. p. 171f.
269. ib. p. 172f; cf. Buber, Die Stunde und die Erkenntnis, p. 153: "Wir wissen aber auch, wie wir wissen, dass Luft ist... dass Raum ist... tiefer, echter wissen wir, dass die Weltgeschichte nicht bis auf ihren Grund aufgebrochen, dass die Welt noch nicht erlöst ist. Wir spüren die Unerlöschthet der Welt".
271. cp. ib. p. 43.
272. ib. p. 176; 178.
Notes to Chapter V.

1. Mt.1,15; cf. Lk.4,20f.

2. Cp. Mt.3,2: Prof. F. C. Burkitt, may be right, however, in pointing out that the words ἡ ἀναίων ζωή ἡ ἀναίων ἰδιοτατά in Mt.3,2, are a Matthaean addition, as they are lacking in Luke. If so then, "the message of John was comprised in the single word "Repent"! (F.C.Burkitt, Christian Beginnings, London, 1924, p.15f).

3. Mt.4,23; cp.9,35.

4. Mt.9,12 and paral.

5. Lk.19,10.

6. Mt.11,5.

7. Mt.9,11 and paral.

8. Jn.12,19.

10. Mt.9,36.

11. The deeper reasons for the antagonism which finally led to our Lord's death, we have discussed elsewhere, seepp.45-55.

12. Edmond Fleg (Flegenheimer) has shown fine psychological insight in portraying the double effect which Jesus exerted upon the common people; cf. Jesus: told by the Wandering Jew, London, 1934.

13. Cf. a.t.Montefiore, who admits the double strain in Jesus' character and often refers to his inconsistency (cp. The Teaching of Jesus p.53), speaks at the same time of his character as "finely balanced and tempered". (cf. S.C., 1909,p.182); cp. also Cecil Roth, A history of the Jewish people, p.140.

18. Lk.9,62.

19. Jh.6,66.

24. W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, Göttingen, 1921, p.XIII - Paul the Pharisee must have come in contact with Greek-pagan thought and speculations which he carefully stored up in his mind, and which came to the surface under the impact of the new faith: "Und wie bei einem Eisbruch die träge Masse in Fluss gerät und die Eisschollen sich stossen u. schieben und über einander türmen, so ist nun die Gedankenmasse des Paulus in Fluss geraten und hat sich zu wunderlichen Massen aufgetürmt, und das Ergebnis war - die paulinische Theologie".

27. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.464f; and elsewhere. It is of interest to note that Klausner's detailed analysis of Philonian conceptions related to Pauline theology, yield negative proof against the author's intention. It seems to have escaped Prof. Klausner that he is actually proving the opposite. For example: he points out that Philo's goal was the advancement of supreme happiness for the human race (De Virtutibus - de Caritate II 395) - but was this Paul's goal? Paul, who worked upon the principle of eternal predestination! Again, he tells us that Philo speaks of man as "having come into being as a copy or fragment or ray of that blessed nature", ("the divine spark" idea) (De Mundi Opificio I, 35) - this "modernist" conception is foreign to Paul, to whom man is only related to God by adoption. Again, to show the high opinion Philo entertained about man, Klausner quotes his sentence: "Assuredly there is in the soul of every man, however undistinguished he may be, a detestation for evil". (De Specialibus Legibus, III, M II, 312) - but this is not Paul's opinion about fallen man in whom sin reigns unto death (cp.Rom.5,21). The "delight in the law of God after the inward man" in Rom.7,22 applies only to the awakened sinner or the struggling saint. The others are dead in their sins till they are quickened with the risen Lord, (Col.2,13). Pauline theology reveals a low opinion of man. Again, Philo's mysticism which Klausner describes as the attainment to the highest knowledge, the "sober intoxication" (μετανοημενοφασκλιοσι, "the state in which man's knowledge of himself is fused with the heavenly light which is shed from deity into the soul of man" (Klausner, p.196), is different from the life εν πνευματισμω (cp.Gal.2,20) of which St. Paul speaks. This "unio mystica" of which Klausner speaks is not easily applied to Paul, as Deissmann has shown. Herein the Apostle differs from the mystics of the Middle Ages. In Pauline theology no "fusion" is possible; its feature is the dying with Christ in order to be raised with him (cp. Rom. 6,8ff; Col. 3,1; Cp. also Adolf Deissmann, Paul, Engl. London, 1926, pp.147ff).

That Philo's conception of the Messiah is entirely different from the Christian view, Klausner admits himself: "at this point Christianity was not able to borrow anything whatever from Philo" (op. cit. p.198).

With regard to pagan Hellenism, Klausner finds only minor affinities, apart from the idea of the sacraments and the conception of the Son of God. Its importance, he sees, not so much in the influence of explicit doctrine, as in the general tendency, the "colow", and the atmosphere. (cp. op. cit. p.464ff). On the main issue, as to the faith in the risen Christ, Klausner definitely dissociates the early Church from the influence of pagan cults: "The differences between the stories about the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus and the stories of the pagans about the death and resurrection of their gods are so numerous and so great, the possibility of death by crucifixion, at the hands of the Roman procurator, for anyone who claimed to be the Messiah was so near certainty, and belief in the resurrection of the dead was so widespread in Israel in the period of the Second Temple that all three of these reasons force us to conclude that the fate of Jesus is not just a reflexion of the fate of the gods Osiris, Attis, Adonis, Mithras, and other such divinities". (Klausner, ib. p.107).

28. Meyer, op. cit. p.17. Klausner is well aware of the difficulty; after strongly affirming that "there is nothing in all the teaching of Paul, as there is nothing in the teaching of Jesus which is not grounded in the Old Testament, or in the Apocryphal, Pseudepigraphical, and Tannaitic literature of his time", (p.482; Klausner's italics), he adds: "Nevertheless, it is difficult to explain the adoration, amounting almost to deification, with which Paul regarded Jesus merely as an intensification of the Jewish Messianic idea". (p.484) It is on these grounds that Klausner is driven to assume the influence of "pagan-philosophic" ideas "which hovered in the air in the Hellenized cities in which Paul lived and preached".

31. Cf. 1 Cor.15,3ff.

32. Meyer, ib. p.69; cp. also p.65. Klausner, op. cit. p.261:
"If Jesus had not been a remarkable personality, who did remarkable deeds and spoke remarkable words, he would have faded from the memory of his disciples after a shameful death on the cross as faded the memory of the rest of the "false Messiahs", that is to say, the saviours who did not succeed in saving".

33. cp. note 24.
34. cp. p.124; Faith in the Resurrection was now related to the person of Jesus, cp. Acts 4,2.
37. Schäder has rightly stressed the fact that the Cross with Paul does not lead to death, but to Resurrection and life. The Apostle knew of the meaning of the Cross in the light of the Resurrection. (cp. Meyer, op.cit.p.31).
39. Graetz explains the success of the early church by the fact that the message was chiefly intended for the simple and dejected, whom the Law deprived of their rights "while Christianity opened the Kingdom of heaven to them". (op.cit.II,p.367). But this is not borne out by Christian tradition which includes amongst the believers men like Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea and many priests and Pharisees.
40. But cp. Johannes von Walter, Die Geschichte des Christentums, Gütersloh, 1932, pp.26ff, where separation is already contemplated by Jesus.
41. Cp. Jh.11,49 - 51; Acts 23,5. Jn. attributes to the Highpriest the gift of Prophecy and Paul acknowledges him to be the ruler of the people. (There must have been an old tradition which attached the gift of prophecy to the highpriestly office. Strack-Billerbeck quote some passages where prophecy is uttered unawares, but have nothing to show for the connection between the highpriesthood and the gift of prophesying).
42. Graetz, II, p.171f. From the context it would appear that he is actually speaking of the early Christians.(?!) 43. Weizsäcker, op.cit.I,p.130.
44. Dr. Joseph Klausner, Die messianischen Vorstellungen des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter der Tannaiten, Berlin, 1904, p.2; cp.p.119.
45. ib.p.14; (Klausner's italics).
46. cp. p. 25/.

52. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p. 313.

55. Burkitt, op. cit. p. 104f; cp. Prof. Walter Grundmann (Jena), Das Problem des hellenistischen Christentums innerhalb der Jerusalemer Urgemeinde, (Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft, herausg. von H. Lietzmann u. w. Eltester, Bd. 38/1939), p. 65: "Es ist ein beredter Hinweis auf die Tiefe dieser Spaltung (i.e. between the Hellenists and Judaizing Hebrew Christians), wenn die Zwölfe und ihre Anhänger in der Stadt bleiben können, während die Sieben und die Hellenisten sie verlassen müssen". (Wetter's words quoted by Grundmann).

64. For the central importance of the Law, see Bousset, Die Relig. d. Judentums im neutest. Zeitalter, pp.136ff.

69. Kaufmann Köhler, Jewish Theology, p.496.417.

70. Burkitt, op.cit.p.46f.

71. Cf. the important essay by Edwyn Clement Hoskyns, Jesus the Messiah, Misterium Christi, ed. by G. K. A. Bell and A. Deissmann, 1930, pp.69ff.

74. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums, p.124; (his italics).

75. Bousset, ib. pp.128ff. Bousset quotes three facts to prove this important point:
   1) The existence of the Essenes, who though universally esteemed for their great piety, did not participate in Temple-cult, at least not in the animal sacrifices.
   2) The general tendency of Jesus' message, directed against the outward ceremonial.

3) The fact that after the destruction of the Temple, Judaism remained unshaken.

76. Cp. Klausner, Die Messianischen Vorstellungen, p. 117f; Schlatter has shown that there existed some form of Temple-service even after the Destruction, cp. A. Schlatter, Die Tage Trajans und Hadrians, pp. 55ff.

77. Cp. 1 Peter 2, 5.

79. E. Klostermann regards the quotation both in Mt. 9, 13 and 12, 7 as not original, entirely due to the "Biblizist Mt." and interfering with the context. (Handbuch z. N. T., Das Matthäusevangelium, Tübingen, 1927, pp. 81; 105).

80. Cp. Yoma 8, 9: Transgressions that are between man and God, the Day of Atonement effects atonement, but for transgressions that are between a man and his fellow, the Day of Atonement effects atonement only if he has appeased his fellow. (Danby). Cp. also Thomas Walker, Hebrew Religion between the Testaments, London, 1937, p. 117f.

81. Klostermann says that μετήρων "geht (wie Mt. 11, 7, 12, 41f) doch nicht auf ein wirkliches Neutrum." The meaning of the passage is: "kann der Tempel schon seine Diener vom Sabbatgebot entbinden, wie viel mehr der Messias seine Jünger". (Klostermann, however, thinks the whole text out of place here. cp. op. cit. p. 105).

83. Klostermann points to an important difference between Mt. and Mark concerning the "false witnesses"; he says of Mt: Durch die (weitere) Auslassung von Mc. 59 und durch die ausdrückliche Betonung von οὔτε τούτων and συνο ( = die erforderlichen zwei, die Mt also übereinstimmen lässt) scheint er die Aussagen über das Tempelwort nicht wie Mc als weiteres Beispiel der ungläubigen πρόκλησις zu rechnen, sondern als ein gültiges Zeugnis, dessen schwerwiegender Inhalt nun den Hohenpriester zu einer direkten Frage veranlasst". (op. cit. p. 215). Erwin Preuschen remarks: "jede Christus feindliche Aussage galt als πρόκλησις . (Handbuch z. N. T., Die Apostelgeschichte, Tübingen, 1912, p. 38).

84. Eisler for some reason regards John as having preserved the more genuine text. (op. cit. p. 496).

86. Ephiphanus, Haer. XXX, 16: Ἄθυμον κατολύων τὸς θυσίας - ad abroganda sacrificia veni - Migne, vol. XLI, 431; it is a remarkable fact that in Jewish legend the birth of the Messiah is placed on the day of the Destruction of the Temple. Gressmann says: "die Zerstörung und der Neubau des Tempels (ist) mit dem Erscheinen des Messias aufs engste verbunden." (Der Messias, p.449, note 5). He leads this tradition back to Menahem ben Hiskia, who led the insurrection in 66 A.D. (cp. Jos. Bell.II, 17, 8 - 9) Menahem could have easily been singled out as the cause of the destruction (cp. Gressmann, pp.458ff). There is, however, some difficulty as to the connection between the coming of the Messiah and the destruction of the Temple. The reading is uncertain (cp. A. Cohen, Midrash R. Lamentations, p.137, note 1 & 2). נְעַלְיָל ( נְעַלְיָל - Buber) may mean because of his coming; or through him (so Geiger) or, for his sake. Gressmann remarks: "die dritte Auffassung, wonach dieser (i.e. the Messiah) als Ursache gedacht ist, setzt Mark.14,58 voraus". It is therefore quite possible that the view which connects the Messiah with the destruction of the Temple goes back to a much older tradition. (cp. Jer. Talmud Ber. II, 4 fol 5a; Midrash Rabbah, Echa, to 1,16).

90. ib.II,p.274.
93. For the Ebed JahWe and his messianic features, see Hugo Gressmann, Der Messias, Göttingen, 1929, pp.308 - 323.
94. It is remarkable how little reference there is to the suffering Messiah in the apocalyptic literature, (cp. Strack-Billerbeck, II, p.282 note 1), 95. Cp. also W. Baldensprenger, Die Messianisch-Apokalyptische Hoffnungen des Judentums, Strassburg, 1903, pp.88ff. Baldensprenger takes over Schürer's simile and speaks of two poles in Judaism: Nomism and Messianism. In the ordinary way these two trends counterbalanced each other, but under special circumstances, e.g. under the influence of a powerful religious personality the balance could be upset. This does not however imply a conscious opposition to the Law, but a latent tendency towards it (Unterströmung) cp. p.215.
We have already pointed out Klausner's failure to establish a connection between Paul and Philo. The same may be said of Moriz Friedländer. Friedländer connects all the great truths in Paul's Epistles with Jewish Hellenism. This includes his teaching about the Law, the Resurrection, Grace, Election, etc. For parallels he naturally goes to Philo. But his quotations rather tend to show the opposite. Friedländer, like so many other scholars, overlooks the fact that both Philo and Paul have at least one important source in common, the O. T. It is also to be noted that not only Philo, but the Rabbis too, knew about the resurrection, grace, election, etc. (cp. Friedländer, op. cit., p. 349ff). For the relationship between Christian and apocalyptic writings see Baldensprenger, op. cit., pp. 164ff, 174ff. His estimation of this literature is important: "Im Unterschied zu den prophetischen Messianismus bedeutet die Apokalyptik nicht Fortsetzung, sondern Abbruch, nicht Abschluss, sondern Antithese, nicht potenzirtes Erdenleben, sondern Gericht über das Vergangene und neuer Anszatz, sie ist nicht ein Finale, welches an ein früheres Motiv anklingt, sondern ein neues Lied in höherem Chor" (p. 174). In that it is detached from history and otherworldly, it essentially differs from the prophetic outlook. "Es gibt keinen anderen Punkt, in welchem sich das apokalyptische Judentum so scharf von der älteren Religion abhebt als die Vorliebe für die transzendente Welt".

Hoennicke assumes that Hebrews was written by a Jew for Jewish Christians, before the destruction of the Temple. (Gustav Hoennicke, Das Judenchristentum im ersten und zweiten Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1908, p. 95); but see Hermann von Soden, The History of Early Christian Literature, Engl., 1906, pp. 248ff. Herford, Christianity in Talmud, p. 364; "Hebr. is a sort of declaration of independence on the part of the Minim".

Cp. Hoennicke, op. cit., pp. 90ff. Hoennicke regards James as a document of the time when Hebrew Christians still participated in the Service of the Synagogue. 2, 2 refers to the Synagogue and not to the εκκλησία, which has a Christian connotation.

Cp. Moore's excellent analysis of the Didache, op. cit., I, p. 188f. He dates it at the beginning of the 2nd c., and regards its source a Jewish Christian community.

Moore, ib. I, p. 186; Prof. T. W. Manson says: "The strong anti-pharisaic tendency seems to belong both to the first evangelist and to his special source". (The Teaching of Jesus, 1935, p. 336, Additional Notes). Arnold Meyer justly calls attention to Rev., which shows "wie eng das Christentum mit der apokalyptischen
101. Joël maintains that the "Yom Trajanus" in the Megilla Ta'minit l8b, which is a day of rejoicing, was due to the fact that at first Trajan declared himself willing to allow the rebuilding of the Temple. Such an attempt, however, was frustrated by the influence of the antinational and antinomistic section of Hebrew Christianity, as for them it was a question of to be or not to be. (Blicke, p.15; cp. also p.30f). The Destruction of the Temple was certainly of great consequence to Hebrew Christian theology, but Joël has no evidence for Hebrew Christian interference: 1) The "Yom Trajanus" is connected with the escape of Pappus and Luliani; 2) it is doubtful whether 017/37b can be identified with Trajan in view of the fact that the latter died a natural death. There is a suggestion that the incident refers to Trajan's general Lusins Quietus, who was executed by Trajan (cp. Schürer, I, p.660 note 62); 3) Trajan's record and his attitude to the Jewish people was not such as to show willingness for the restoration of its religious-national centre. Samuel Krauss suggests that the "Yom Trajanus" was to commemorate a Jewish victory over the Roman army. (cp. J. E., Vol. XII, 218b); this is also Schlatter's view (cf. Die Tage Trajans und Hadrians, p.95f).

102. Though Samuel Lublinski represents the opposite view to our own, he has a sentence which deserves quoting: "Die Absonderung der jungen Kirche vom alten Stamm war eine Entwicklungsnotwendigkeit, die ohne wilde Kämpfe und Krämpfe und ohne Krisen nicht vollzogen werden konnte. Hier lässt sich die Schuld und Unschuld nicht mit der Elle messen". (p.148).

103. Joël, op.cit. II, p.87. Grundmann expresses somewhat similar thoughts with regard to the Temple, but his presentation is too radical and includes only the Hellenistic element of the Church in Jerusalem. (cp. Das Problem des hellenistischen Christentums innerhalb der Jerusalemener Urgemeinde, ZNW, Bd 38/1939, p.65).

104. Joël's judgement "Das Christentum entstand als Verwirklichung gerade der nationalen Hoffnung, die damals Israel hegte..." (op.cit. p.25f), is an overemphasis of the national element. But that there were national motives which came into play need not be denied.

105. According to Graetz, Jesus chose to work amongst the lowly and the outcast because the middleclass was already good enough (!) and the rich would not listen in any case (cp.op.cit. II, p.152).
106. It is difficult to see how Moehlman can assert: "The earliest Christian records (then), reveal no break between Jerusalem Jew and Christian prior to C. E. 66"? (op. cit. p. 189f).

111. Cp. Euseb. H. e. II, 23; The passage reads: (Ἰάκωβος) εκαλέτο ὁ δίκαιος καὶ ἀδικίας, ὁ ἐκ τῶν ἐλληνικῶν περιοχῆς τοῦ λαοῦ, καὶ δικαιολογήσας.

Klausner suggests 3 interpretations of which the last seems to be the most natural:
1) ἀδικίας - ἐπὶ τοὺς "strong tower of the people"
2) ἀδικίας - ἐπὶ τοὺς "strength of the people"
3) ἀδικίας - ἐπὶ τοὺς "Father of the people".

Burkitt says: "Oblias means nothing nothing at all"; op. cit. p. 58, note 1.

113. Epiphanius, Adversus haereses 29,7; cp. 30,2; De Mensuris et Ponderibus 15: "discipuli omnes ab angelo moniti sunt, ut ex ea urbe migrarent".

114. Lawlor & Oulton, II, p. 82; or Julius Africanus, cp. Harnack, Mission, p. 413; cp. also Schmidtke, Texte und Untersuchungen, XXXVII.

120. The importance which primitive Christianity attached to Jerusalem can be seen from Justin's Dial. Trypho asks Justin with understandable curiosity: "Tell me, do you really admit that this place, Jerusalem, shall be rebuilt; and do you expect your people to be gathered together...?" To this, Justin replies that for his part he has such a hope, though others "who belong to the pure and pious faith, and are true Christians, think otherwise". (Dial. ch.80; cp. also ch.81) Cp. also Julius Wagenmann, Die Stellung des Apostels Paulus neben den Zwölf in den ersten zwei Jahrhunderten, Giessen,1926, p.28.

121. Harnack interprets the evidence from Eusebius and Epiphanius to mean that the whole Christian community left for Pella. He therefore feels himself entitled to assume that the Church consisted of a very small minority. (cp.Mission u. Anstr. p.413 & note 5). But the evidence of Acts is against such an interpretation. It is therefore, more reasonable to assume that only the leading members of the Church left the city. Hoennicke also assumes a very small Christian community in Palestine. (Das Judenchristum im ersten und zweiten Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1908, p.175). But the fact of persecution is evidence for the growth of a movement.

122. Joël attributes to the Destruction of the Temple one of the main causes which brought about the separation of Christianity and Judaism. (cp.op.cit. II, p.85f); a similar view is expressed by Travers Herford, (cp. Christianity in Talmud & Midrash, London, 1903, p.383f).

124. George Foot Moore, Judaism, I, p.244.

125. Dial. ch. 108; cp. ch. 40.

126. Mt.23,38; Luke 13,35: διότι έτελευη άμισος ο σεκος ἢμην

127. Shab. 119b: Abaye said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because the Sabbath was desecrated therein; R. Abbahu said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because the reading of the (shema) morning and evening was neglected; R. Hammuna said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because they neglected (the education of) schoolchildren; Ulla said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because they (its inhabitants) were not ashamed of each other; R. Isaac said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because the small and the great were made equal; R. Amram, son of R. Simeon b. Abba said in R. Simeon ben Abba's name in R. Ḥama's name: Jerusalem was destroyed only because they did not rebuke each other; Rab Judah said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because scholars were despised therein; Raba said: Jerusalem was destroyed only because truthful men ceased therein.

129. Von Soden puts the date between 92 – 96 A. D., on the grounds that the persecution hinted at in the Epistle refers to the reign of Domitian; cp. op. cit. p. 271f; cp. also H. Windisch, Der Hebräerbrief, Tübingen, 1913, p. 114f.

132. Dial. ch. 40.

133. Jn. 1, 29; 4, 23f; cp. 11, 51; H. Loewe says that "the stress laid in the Church on the Agnus Dei motif... made the Jews look for a parallel". They found it in the Akedah, the binding of Isaac. Rabb. Anthol. p. CI.

134. Mt. 27, 51; Mk. 15, 38; Lk. 23, 45; According to Jewish tradition, the veil of the Temple, Titus cut with his sword; cp. Strack-Billerbeck, I, p. 1044.

135. Cp. Mt. 24, 1f; Lk. 21, 5f.

136. Erich Klostermann, Das Markusevangelium, p. 147.

139. V. G. Simkhovitch's remarks concerning the application of Jesus' message to the political situation of his time has greater force for the post-Destruction period. (Cp. Toward the Understanding of Jesus, New York, 1937).

141. Hoennicke has rightly argued that 13 bishops within the space of 28 years implies that they did not hold office in consecutive order but several of them simultaneously. (cp. Hoennicke p. 106f).

143. Harnack observes: "Dass unter den τῶν Ἰουδαίων, die noch täglich zu Christus bekehrt werden, geborene Juden zu verstehen sind, ist nicht gewiss, aber wahrscheinlich". (ib. p.84 note 2). But this is an unnecessary caution, as the whole sense of Justin's argument would otherwise fall to the ground.

144. Some read "of our race"; (cp. Ante-Nicene Christian Library, Vol.II, p.149, note 1), but "your race" seems to be more natural, as Justin is now addressing himself to the whole company.

145. Harnack, op. cit. p.89.

146. ib. p.89, note 2.

147. ib. p.84 and note.

148. Harnack's omission is due to his narrow definition of Hebrew Christianity, according to which not Jewish descent, but adherence to the national character of Judaism is the determining factor. Thus Paul, because of Rom. 11 is a Jewish Christian, while Papias, the author of the Didache, and Hermas, are not. (cf. Harnack, Abriss der Dogmengeschichte, 1893, p.42f).

149. Cp. Dial. ch.119: "After that the righteous One was slain we bloomed forth as another people...This is that nation which God promised of old to Abraham". The Christians spoke of themselves as "a new nation" and "the Christian nation"; cf. Euseb. Hist. I, 4,2; IV, 7,10; cf. Lawlor & Oulton, Vol. 2, p.52.

150. The Nazareans with whom Jerome stayed in Aleppo seem to have been orthodox Christians; cf. Lawlor & Oulton, II, p.97f.

151. To such secret or semi-believers the Talmud refers:...הנני בכרך המaysia במציאי הכהניא... Berach. 29a; also Mishna Ber. V,3; (cp. Ber. 34a; Megilla 25a); According to Jēēl this is evidence to "die noch nicht vollzogene Trennung zwischen Juden und Christgläubigen". (op. cit. p.34, note).

152. Cp. Walter Grundmann, Das Problem des hellenistischen Christentums innerhalb der Jerusalemer Urgemeinde (ZNW, Bd. 38/1939, p.60); p.63: "Die Eigenständigkeit des Christentums des Hellenistenkreises ist schon in Jerusalem offenbar".

153. so Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p.83.

156. Chwolson's Talmudic references, showing close relationship between Jewish Christians and pious Jews, bear out our theory. Chwolson finds it remarkable that the Mishnah very rarely refers to Minim. He thus concludes that Judaism only opposed gnostic Hebrew Christians; but as to the others: "Man stimmt zwar ihren Glauben an die Messianität Christi nicht bei, aber man verdammte sie nicht deshalb". R. Judah, the compiler of the Mishnah, Chwolson suggests must have only known such Hebrew Christians who in everything shared the religious life of the Jews, and were thus treated as members of the community. Hence the lack of reference to them. (cp. Das letzte Passamahl, p.110f). The story in Hullin 87a where Judah (usually referred to as Rabbi, died 193 A.D.) sat down to a meal with a Min, the Min insisting upon the privilege of pronouncing the blessing upon the wine (יְסָרָה שָׁלוֹם), is a remarkable example of such friendship. (cp. ib. p.104f).

158. Harnack well observes: "Das Judenchristentum, welches in Lebensgemeinschaft mit den Heidenchristen trat, hob sich damit selbst auf..." (Mission, p.43).

159. M. Friedländer, Die religiösen Bewegungen, p.171; (cp. also Der vorchristliche jüdische Gnosticismus, 1897; Der Antichrist, 1901).

160. op. cit. p.172.

161. ib. p.178.

163. In a few instances, such Minim may have been Gentile Christians or other heretics. Thus Moore says: "That by the Minim who are so often named in the Talmuds and Midrashim, Nazarenes or Christians are always intended is going much beyond the evidence and sometimes contrary to it". (op. cit. III, p.68). cp. also Herford, op. cit. p.122: "A Min as such is not necessarily a Christian; but as a matter of fact, most of the heretics who came into strained relations with Jews were Christians, and more particularly Jewish Christians". A. Schlatter perhaps goes too far when he makes all the Minim to be Christians. (cp. Die Kirche Israel's vom Jahre 70-130, 1898, p.7f.) Cp. ib. p. 177f: That there were Gnostic Minim, nobody can deny. Some of them may have existed in pre-Christian times, but whether they were called Minim before the advent of Christianity we seriously doubt. (But cp. H. L. Strack, Jesus, die Häretiker und die Christen nach den ältesten jüdischen Angaben, Leipzig, 1910, p. 47; Strack speaks of pre-Christian Minim; Minim at the time of the appearance of Christianity, and Minim who are Hebrew Christians of a later time).

H. Strack, op. cit. p. 47.

Herford, op. cit. p. 365; J. Wiesner, Scholien zum babylonischen Talmud I., 1859, p. 35, explains the etymology of מ"מ with מִיָּוָעֵל = מִיָּוָעֵל = to betray: "so wurden die Christen im ersten Jahrhundert genannt, weil es wahrscheinlich nicht selten vorkam, dass die Anhänger der neuen Sekte ihre früheren Glaubens- und Leidensgenossen bei den römischen Gwalthabern verleumdeten und anschwärzten". (?) But why should the Jews go to Greek for a Christian nickname?

Joël, Blicke II, p. 90.

Herford, op. cit. p. 365: "This is ingenious, but nothing more". (?) Joël draws attention to a few similar corruptions, like מ"מ "be Abidan") which he thinks stands for the meeting-place of the Ebionites; and מ"מ ("be Nazarete") for meeting-place of the Nazarites; (cp. ib. II, p. 91, note 2). But this is doubtful. However, there are other examples: The corruption of the word מ"מ, which R. Meir called Aven-giljon ( מ"מ ) and R. Yochanan called Avon-giljon ( מ"מ ). Shab 116a; or else the corruption of מ"מ.

175. Moore, op. cit. III, p.68f.

176. Cp. Joël, II, p.188.

177. Cp. Herford, op. cit. p.247 - 250; A. Böckler has tried to show "dass in Galiläa im zweiten und dritten Jahrhundert Min in erster Reihe ausser-jüdische Sekteirer bezeichnet..." (Über die Minim von Sepphoris und Tiberias im zweiten und dritten Jahrhundert, Festschrift zu Hermann Cohens siebzigsten Geburtstage, Berlin, 1912, p.273). But such is not the general view. Böckler's main proof rests on the assumption that no Hebrew Christians have ever accepted the divinity of Christ. (cp.ib.p.289). But we shall see that this is unwarranted.

179. Strack, op. cit. p.47.

181. Böckler, op. cit. p.293; Against Böckler's view may be put that of I. Abrahams: "The Jewish sources have a good deal to say about Christians, but almost invariably it is Jewish Christians that are the subject of castigation". (Studies in Pharisaism, II, p.56, cp. also ib. appended note l).

182. Cp. Justin, Apology I, 31; Schlatter has shown that Akiba was not the only one to acclaim Simeon (Bar Cochba) King Messiah. There were other leading Rabbis who followed Akiba's example. Cf. Die Tage Trajans u. Hadrians, pp.50ff.

183. Cp. Harnack, Mission, p.45; Hieronymus, in his epistle to Augustine (cp. 89) says: usque hodie per totas Orientis synagogas inter Judaeos haeresis est, quae dicitur Minaeorum, et a Pharisaeis usque nunc dammatur, quos vulgo Nazaraeos nuncupant, qui credunt in Christum filium Dei, natum de virgine Maria, et eum dicunt esse, qui sub Pontio Pilato passus est et resurrexit; in quem et nos credimus, sed dum volunt et Judaei esse et Christiani, nec Judaei sunt nec Christiani". Schmidtke, however, has shown with some reason that the whole passage depends upon Epiphanius, haer. 30, 9 - Cp. Alfred Schmidtke, Neue Fragmente u. Untersuchungen zu den judenchristlichen Evangelien, Leipzig, 1911, Texte u. Untersuchungen, XXXVII, p.252f.

184. "The war under Hadrian brought about a complete separation of the Nazarenes from the body of Judaism, and after the war the animosity diminished with the danger of the spread of infection within the Synagogue".
(Moore, Judaism, I, 244; cp. also p.90ff).

187. "Ich kenne ein bisher nicht publiziestes altchristliches Fragment, in welchem sich der Ausdruck Χριστος και Πνευματος findet". (Mission, p.38, note 1).

188. Harnack, ib.p.37, note 5.

190. Sanh. 38b: Adam is called a μαθητής, for it is written, Where are thou? (Gen.3,9), i.e. whither has thine heart turned? R. Isaac said: He practised epiplass, for it is written, But like man, (Adam) they have transgressed the covenant (Hos. 6,7). This passage may, however, contain a hint to Hebrew Christianity.

191. Aboda Sara 27a permits to receive medical treatment from a min if it is not done διά μικριας, i.e. secretly (έν παντεσχετικοι.

192. Chwolson, op.cit.p.102. (Chwolson also refers to A. C. Toettermann, R. Eliezer ben Hyrkanos, Leipzig, 1877; cp. ib.p.101, note 4); cp. Abodah Zarah, 27b; A. Mishcon translates the sentence in the same manner: "It is different with the teaching of Minim, for it draws, and one (having dealings with them) may be drawn after them". (Abodah Zarah, London, 1935, p.137).

194. Abodah Zarah 16b - 17a.

197. Yoma 66b, R. Eliezer was once asked whether is worthy of the world to come. But he obviously tried to evade the question by saying: "have you only asked me about '??b? Dr. Leo Jung remarks, that all his answers are evasive, (cp. Yoma, London, 1938, p. 311, note l); but Klausner has shown that '??b refers to Jesus (cp. Klausner, Jesus, p. 37); cp. Hoennicke, op. cit. pp. 389ff. cp. also Chwolson, p. 101.

Ber. 28b, Eliezer became ill and his pupils asked him to teach them the way of life. He advised them that their children be restrained from reading (the Scriptures ?). Goldschmidt transl. '4hJn "nachsinnen" (cp. Der Babylonische Talmud, Bd. I, p. 124 note 67). But if Löw is right, then '4hJn ought to read '4hJn = '44hJn (??). Cp. Bacher, Die Agada der Tannaiten, 1903, I, p. 98 note. This may be an attempt to rehabilitate a great teacher, suspected of heresy (?). (cp. Hoennicke, 392 note l).

200. cp. jcr. 'Hagg. II, 1 (77b); Schlatter interpretes the story of R. Meir's seeing his former teacher on the sabbath at Tiberias on horseback, metaphorically, the horse being a symbol for wealth. (cf. Die Tage Trajans, p. 26).

202. 'Haggah 15b: "It is told of Aher that when he used to rise (to go) from the schoolhouse, many sifre minim used to fall from his lap". May there not be some significance in the fact that R. Meir, R. Akiba's greatest pupil and "Aher's" devoted disciple is credited with the pun on '44hJn - "'4hJn " which Johanan further developed into "'4hJn "? (see Bacher, Agada der Tannaiten, II, p. 36, note).

203. L. Ginzberg doubts whether the note in 'Hag. 15b is genuine aviris lacking in the Jerusalem Talmud; he also suggests that owing to the changes made by the censors, the original may have referred not to Minim, but to Sadducees. (J. E. p. 138b). This may be so or may not.

206. A few Christian scholars, notably Schürer, have identified Trypho "with R. Tarphon; Jewish scholars take the opposite view. (cp. Schürer, Geschichte II, 5, 378 & 555f; cf. Strack's Introduction to Talmud & Midrash, Schlatter supports the Jewish view, cp. Die Tage Trajans, p. 98.

207. There are several hints in Rabbinic literature which show a knowledge of the N.T:
Reference to the 3 hours darkness and the rending of the veil; cp. Joel, op. cit. p. 6f.

210. Cf. Strack, Introduction, p. 120.

212. Herford's analysis of this, as of many other stories, suffers from a too literal adherence to the text. His presentation presupposes historical accuracy, he thus tries to interpret every feature, while most of it is allegory with the intent to sermonize.

213. Cp. Herford, op. cit. p. 391; There is also another factor to be considered, and this is the alterations made owing to Christian censorship. Cp. Hoennicke, op. cit. p. 282f.

217. "Man was created last. And why was he created last? That the Minim might not say there was a partner with him in his work". Tosephta Sanh. 8,7. (Tosephta ed. by Dr. M. S. Zuckermandel, 2nd. ed., Jerusalem, 1937). Cp. The prologue to John's Gospel; cp. also Midrash rabbah to Gen. 1,1.

218. Dial. ch. 49: Trypho: "Those who affirm him to have been a man, and to have been anointed by election, and then to have become Christ, appear to me to speak more plausibly than you who hold those opinions which you express. For we all expect that Christ will be Χριστός καὶ Νεόνιος... cp. Ch.67, where Trypho hints that the Christian doctrine concerning the birth of the Messiah resembles the Greek myth about Perseus & Danae, the virgin.

219. Megillah IV, 9: Danby takes דבש to refer to man "Good men shall bless Thee". Rabbinowitz translates in the same manner: "The good shall bless Thee". The heresy thus being "in the implication that God is blessed only by 'the good' and not by all His creatures". This is Rashi's view. But the Jerusalem Talmud, Rabbinowitz admits "interprets מזלו (the good') as referring to the Deity", in the sense: "May the beneficent powers bless thee". (cp. Joseph Rabbinowitz, Mishnah Megillah, London, 1931, p.130f). If this were the case, Rabbinowitz thinks to detect Zoroastrian dualism here, which he identifies with "the chief doctrine of the anti-Jewish Christian Gnostics". Did the Parsees, however, invoke a blessing of Ahimanar as well as of Ormuzd? It seems to us that there is no need to go beyond the text, especially as in the phrase, מזלו מזרד, Rabbinowitz seems to admit the reference to two powers. (cp.ib.p.132).

220. R. Samuel b. Nahman said in R. Jonathan's name: When Moses was engaged in writing the Torah, he had to write the work of each day. When he came to the verse: 'And God said let us make man etc', he said: 'Sovereign of the Universe. Why dost Thou furnish an excuse to heretics? ' 'Write', replied He; 'whoever wishes to err may err'. (Midrash Rabbah, to Gen.8,8). Evidence of how the Christians understood this passage is to be found in the Epistle of Barnabas. Here the writer represents God saying to the Messiah at the foundation of the world, "Let us make man, etc". (Barn. ch.5; cf. ch.6).

221. Sanh. 38b.

224. For other instances concerning the unity of God, the "Two Powers", etc. see Herford, op.cit.pp.291 - 307.

226. The reference is to Semukin, (שומק) which Herford transl. "contexts", i.e., "The law of Biblical exegesis which is based on the fact that two passages are found together in the text and are therefore to be connected in interpretation". (A. Cohen, Berakot, Cambridge, 1921,

228. Ber. 10a.

230. So Herford, p.303; Strack calls him Reuben ben Isterobeli or Esterobeli. Nothing is known about him; it is assumed that he belongs to the Tannaitic period and that he lived in Rome (cp. Strack pp.116 & 314, note 45).

231. J. Shab. 8d.

233. Herford, p.302f; cp. also the following passage on the same theme, ib.p.303f. The passage from Agadath Bereishith c 31 (end) concerning the death of the son of God belongs to a later period (4th c.) cp. Bacher, Agada d. P. A., III, p.690.

234. For similar passages, see Schoeps, op.cit.p.29.

238. קא"ל ד"ל דז"ד דא רד ש"ת ש"ע מ"כ כ"א מ"כ י"ו Sanh. 97a; for parallels see Herford, p.207.

240. Herford, p.209. Abrahams suggests the following explanation: "The refusal of the Jewish Christians to join (in the latter's) revolt against Rome and the triumph of Rome over the Jewish nationalists, may well have appeared to Judah b. Ilai (acc. to Sanh. 97a, he is credited with this utterance) an indication that the 'Kingdom shall be turned to minuth; and that another than Bar Cochba must be looked for as Messiah". (Stud. in Phar. II, p.63). But in view of the fact that Abrahams insists that Minuth is a purely Jewish heresy, the only inference possible is that the passage contains a reference to the success of Christianity.

243. אַמְמוּרָה יָסְרָאֵל, כְּלַיְלָה, קָדַם אָדָם, מִּכְלָה חֲלוֹלָה, מִכְלָה חֲלוֹלָה.

Midrash Rabbah, Lam. 1, 13; cp. Song of Songs v. 8, 9. A. Cohen & Maurice Simon (Midrash Rabbah, London, 1939), have both accepted the reading "Babylonians".

244. Abrahams, Stud. in Pharis., II, p. 59; for "test-passages, see Montefiore - Loewe, Rabb. Anthol., pp. 335, 369; cp. also ib. p. 12 (parag. 21).

247. To the same category belongs the passage quoted by Schoeps from Midrash Samuel V, 4: "Wenn du das Daleth in dem Worte 'Echod' (Deut. 6, 4) zu einem Resh machst, zerstörst du die Welt". "Echod" would thus become "Acher" - "an other one". This is the reason why Prayer Books and Bibles have the daleth printed in double size and fat type. (cp. Schoeps, p. 29, notel).

249. Büchler, op. cit. p. 293.

250. Mishnah Megillah IV, 8 - makes some mysterious reference to the אֱלֹהִים and ד' נַחֲמָה - it is difficult to decide who are meant. It is in connection with the performance of public prayer and Graetz and Herford and Moore have assumed that the reference is to Hebrew Christians. (cp. Herford, p. 199 ff; 361 ff); cp. Moore, Judaism, Vol. I, p. 365 f.

251. "Our Rabbis taught: Adam was created on the eve of Sabbath. And why: Lest the Sadducees say: The Holy One, blessed be He, had a partner in his work of creation". (Sanh. 38a); cp. also Sanh. 37a.

252. cp. the case with R. Akiba and R. Jose.

253. The Torah declares: "I was the working tool of the Holy One, blessed be He"; God consults the Torah in the creation of the world - the Torah itself being created before the world. (Midrash Rabbah, Gen. 1, 1; cp. J. Q. R., III, 357 ff).
254. Scrolls of the Law, tefillin, mezuzzot, written by a Min were burned (Git 45b; Ab. Zarah 40b); Relatives of a Min were not permitted to observe the laws of mourning after his death and were required to wear festive garments and to rejoice instead (Semahoth II, 10). But considering the late date of Ebel Rabbathi (euphemistically called Semahoth), the custom may belong to a much later period.

255. Leo Baeck points out that R. Simon bar Yochai's saying that together with Israel is also the Shechinah exiled, is directed towards the Christian Church; also R. Juda ben Simon's utterance about the dwelling-place of the Shechinah in Israel's midst points in the same direction. (cp. Schoeps, op. cit. p.36, note1).

256. Taanith 7a: R. Abbahu said: "Greater is the day of the fertilizing rain than the resurrection of the dead; for this is only for the pious, but the rain for pious and wicked." (A strange utterance from the mouth of a Pharisee! (cf. however, Loewe, Rabb. Anthol. p.369).

257. Harnack, Texte und Untersuchungen, XXXIX, p.91.

258. The prevailing temper towards the Minim can be seen from the following story: A Min said to Beruriah: It is written 'Sing, 0 barren, thou that didst not bear' (Is.54,1). Is the woman to sing because she did not bear? This is her answer: "Sing, 0 community of Israel, who art like a barren woman that hath not borne children for Gehinnom - like you". (Berekot 10a).

Beruriah was the wife of R. Meir and the daughter of R. Hanina ben Teradjon. It must be borne in mind that her father was executed during the persecution under Hadrian. Her husband was a disciple of R. Akiba, another martyr. This may account for some of the bitterness to people who refused to partake in the national struggle. The Min here is certainly a Christian, and probably a Jewish Christian. Herford remarks: "Her answer shows clearly enough the hostility felt by Jews towards the Christians, in the second century, at a time when the latter were steadily increasing in numbers". (ib. p.239).

260. Joël rightly says it represents the first attempt on the part of the Synagogue "das Judentum gegen das überhandnehmende Christentum abzugrenzen". (Blicke, p.31f).

261. It is possible that Mishnah Megillah IV,8,9, where reference is made to those who place their phylacteries on their foreheads (in a way not prescribed by the Rabbis) and on the palms of their hands (instead of the traditional way on the inner side of the left arm), has in mind Hebrew Christians. (cp. Herford, pp.200 - 204). It would be a means of detecting those with heretical tendencies. Perhaps the practice arose in an effort to symbolise the manner of death of the Messiah? It may well be that those referred to in Midrash Ps.XXXI, 23, who say: "Amen against their will in faithfulness" are secret believers in Jesus. (But cp. Rabb. Anthol. p.385). That some Gentile Christians have also left the Church and joined or rejoined the Synagogue may be assumed. An outstanding example is that of the translator of the O. T. from Hebrew into Greek, Aquila. Both Jewish and Christian tradition connect Aquila with the Church and the Synagogue (cp. Ephiphanius, De Ponderibus et Mensuris XIII - XVI; Git. 56b and 57a; see also J. E. II, pp.37f). Aquila is supposed to have been a Christian who apostatized for Judaism and became a pupil of R. Akiba.

263. Adolf Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig, 1884, p.440; cp.ib.p.33, note 47. Hilgenfeld bases his view upon the testimony of Stephanus Gobarus quoted by Photius. Carl Weizsäcker, however, suggests that his remark on 1 Cor.2,9 may well refer not to Paul, but to a Gnostic Apocryphon. For, indeed, the words of Paul in 1 Cor.2,9, and the words of Jesus (Mt.13,16) which Hegesippus is supposed to have quoted to contradict them, express the same thought. (cp. Weizsäcker, Realencykl. für protest. Theologie u. Kirche, 3rd. ed., Vol. 7, p.534).

264. Weizsäcker's main reason for denying Hegesippus' Jewish descent.

268. Wilhelm Bousset refers several times to Schmidtke's work. For his criticism, see Kyrios Christos, p.21f; cf. also A. F. Findlay, Byways in early Christian Literature, pp.54ff.

270. Origenes, hom XX in Jer: καὶ πρῶτον χρήσατον παραδόου ἐν οἴδατος εἰς ἡμᾶς διὰ τοῦ φυγόντος διὰ τὴν Ἑριδοῦ πιστεῖν...

271. Epiph., haer., 30,9; Graetz has naturally nothing good to say about Joseph whom Constantine raised to the dignity of Comes. As to his story about the Patriarch who accepted Christianity on his death-bed, Graetz calls it
"a thoroughly incredible tale". (op.cit.II,p.572); but cp. F. Heman, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes seit der Zerstörung Jerusalems, Stuttgart, 1908, p.57f.

274. Wagenmann, op.cit.p.142.

276. ib.p.54.

277. ib.p.57.

281. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, p.22.

282. "Zwischen ihr (i.e. the Nazarene community of Beroia) und der jerusalemsichen Urgemeinde hat ein Zusammenhang bloss in der Phantasie des Epiphanius bestanden". (ib.p.124).

284. Cp.ib.p.125, note 1; Origen in referring to those Israelites, who though converted to Christianity, have not abandoned the law of their fathers, has probably such Nazarenes in mind. (cf. C. Cels, chap. 5).

286. Irenaeus, Haer, I, 26,2; cf. also Hort, op.cit.p.197.

287. Hippolytus, Philosophumena, 7,23.

85

290. Cf. Tertullian, De praescriptione haer. chs. 10; 33; de carne Christi, ch.14; de virginibus velandis, ch.6; Hieronymus, Gal.3,14; Tit.3,10; etc; cp. Schmidtke, op.cit.pp.191ff; 247ff; Hoennicke, pp.228ff.

291. J. Lightfoot, Perergon de excidio urbis; cp. Hoennicke, p.229.

292. Hilgenfeld, p.426, note 725. cp. J. Levy, Neuebräisches Wörterbuch; also Jastrow, ad loc. It has been suggested that Baba Kam. 117a corresponds with Shab. 116a, where יִנְקָה and יִנְנָה occur. These being corruptions of סַגְדּּא and סַגְדּּה; cp. Hoennicke, p.229, note 2; cp. also ib.p.175, note 15.

297. Origin explains the name Ebionites: περικείμενος κοινά (De princ.IV,22; cp. also Contra Gels II,1; cp. Euseb. h. e., III, 27).

298. "Viele Gründe sprechen dafür, dass Ebion eine fingierte Persönlichkeit ist..." (Hoennicke, lb.p.231).

299. Schmidtke has shown that Epiphanius, the chief witness for the existence of Ebion, had almost no personal knowledge concerning the Ebionites. He is entirely dependent upon other writers whose data he reconstructs to his own intuition. (cp.ib.pp.215ff; cp. also pp. 204ff, where Schmidtke describes the sources of Epiphanius' knowledge).

300. Wagenmann, op.cit.p.143.

305. ib. p. 233.

307. Cp. Brandt, op. cit. p. 90: Findlay explains the name "partly with reference to their outward condition, and partly through their sense of unity with the pious in Israel who in the Old Testament were often so called". (op. cit. p. 309).

308. Cp. also W. Beveridge, op. cit. p. 139.

309. A clear cut distinction between the Pharisaic, i.e. non-Gnostic and the Gnostic or Essene Ebionism, is not possible. (cf. J. C. Lambert, art. Ebionism, Hast. Dict. of Christ & Gospels, I, p. 505a). For Essene influence upon the Ebionites, see Beveridge, op. cit. p. 143a.

312. Schmidtke came to the following conclusion with regard to Epiphanius' statements: "So viel steht nunmehr unbedingt fest: die meisten und eindruckvollsten Nachrichten von haer. 30 sind nicht nach eigenen Erforschungen in ebionisischen Gemeinden niedergeschrieben, sondern aus dem vermeintlich total ebionisch verfalschten Klemensroman herausgezogen". (ib. p. 199).

313. Wagenmann, p. 145.

316. Beveridge mentions the following three points which differentiated the Gnostic Ebionites from the Pharisaic type: a) their Christology while fundamentally alike, is mixed with elements of Gnostic speculation; b) their ascetism is rigid, except on the point of marriage; c) for their abandonment of the sacrificial system, the annals of Pharisaism contain neither precedent nor preparation. (ib. p. 143a).

318. Hoennicke has recognized the absolute importance of the O. T. to the young Gentile Church: "ohne das Alte Testament wäre es schwerlich so schnell zur Verbreitung des Evangeliums gekommen. Das Alte Testament so wie die Predigt der Judenchristen trug dazu bei, dass beiden Heidenchristen das Evangelium sich nicht verflüchtigte oder auflöste in asketische Theorien, in Libertinisums oder philosophische Spekulationen". (op. cit. p. 176).
319. "The Nazarenes...acknowledged the power of the Jewish law in its entirety; but they explained the birth of Jesus in a supernatural manner...and ascribed to him godlike attributes". (Graetz, II, p.373).

320. Hoennicke, p.175.

325. Hilgenfeld has described Ebionism as "Entwicklungsunfähig" (op.cit.p.445), but its basic problem, in our view, was not doctrinal, but national.
Notes to Chapter VI.

1. The prayer is called שְׂדֵקָה and is recited at the end of the first section of the Sabbath morning prayers in the Synagogue and at the home service for the two Passover nights. (cp. Singer, pp.125ff). The peculiarity of the prayer is that it forms a "nominal acrostic", giving the name of יהוה written backwards. For the tradition Cp. Samuel Krauss, Das Leben Jesu, p.226f; cp. also Monatschrift für Geschichte u. Wissenschaft des Judentums, 1858, p.461; 1861, p.212; 1870, p.237; cf. also Baring-Gould, Lost & Hostile Gospels, pp.91, 101; also H. G. Box, Peter in the Jewish Liturgy, Expository Times, Vol. XV (Oct. 1903 - Sept. 1904), pp.93ff. Box describes the tradition as "nothing more than a passing Jewish fancy". For other legends connected with the person του Πέτρου, see Aug. Wünsche, Minhass Rabi Raba, Leipzig, 1883.

4. תַּמְשָׁ, Hif. תַּמְשָׁנָה to destroy.

6. Raymund de Peñafort on the authority of Gregory I, held that Jews and Saracenes ought to be provoked to accept the Christian faith with the help of "authorities, reasonings and allusions" (auetoritatibus, rationibus et blandimentis); quoted by L. Williams, Adv. Jud. p.243 note 2).

7. Leo Baeck, after deploring the methods the Church employed in order to win over Jews to the ruling religion, asks with obvious irony: "Who are they, for the most part, who left Judaism, in order to belong to another religion?" Here is his answer: "They were too often 'believers', who went over to the other religion, in which they did not believe, or in which they also did not believe... Seldom has conviction ever caused anybody to turn his back on Judaism, seldom has conversion shown a spirit of courageous sacrifice. Usually the conversion has been an act of materialism". (op.cit.p.284f; cf. also S. Daiches, p.133).

8. Henri Bergson explained in his will that he decided not to accept baptism as he felt it impossible to leave the Jewish people at a time of rising anti-Semitism. Cf. Jacques Maritain, Redeeming the Time, London, 1943, p.89, note; cf. also Jewish Chronicle, Jan. 16, 1942. Alfred Engländer, one of the two heroes in Franz Werfel's novel Barbara, undoubtedly expresses the author's own experience when he confesses the reason for his not accepting baptism: "Ich war ein Sklave der Menschenfurcht, ich war zu eitel, mich durch einen scheinbar vorteilhaften Tausch in den Verdacht des Opportunismus zu setzen...") (Barbara, p.514).

10. A. Marmorstein, The Doctrine of Merits in Old Rabbinical Literature, London, 1920, has shown that the emphasis upon Israel's merits was due to the Synagogue's controversy with the Church. (cp. pp. 79, 86, 96f, 106, 128, etc.). It appears, however, that the whole concept of merit is much older than the Jewish Christian controversy, and is closely connected with the Jewish view concerning the value of human action.

12. R. Isaac's opinion: "Everybody is in need of God's grace, even Abraham on whose account grace surrounds the whole world", expresses an essential Christian attitude. (cf. Marmorstein, The Doctrine of Merits, p.13; cf. also ib. pp. 10, 12, etc).

13. An extreme example of an essentially Jewish attitude is provided by the person of Pelagius. His emphasis upon human freedom, upon the natural goodness of man (naturalis sanctitas), human sufficiency, etc., is characteristic Jewish teaching. (cf. W. J. Sparrow-Simpson, The Letters of St. Augustine, pp. 126ff).

14. The present writer found an anonymous note in a copy of Dienemann's book, Judentum und Christentum, belonging to the New College Library, Edinburgh. The note was written by a German Jew who once left the Jewish community out of "cowardly motives". As time went by, he found deeper reasons for separating himself from Judaism. Though eclectic in leaning, he was drawn towards Christianity. But for the fact that the Christian Church is "zu sehr im Buchstabenglauben gefangen", and therefore does not incorporate the teaching of Jesus, he would have become a Christian. His remarks are important, as an illustration that the characteristic Christian attitude is no Gentile prerogative.

In contradistinction to Dienemann's emphasis upon the goodness, autonomy and self-sufficiency of man, the writer remarks:

1) I believe that man is sinful. I need Christ as a Symbol, as Mediator between me and God. To me, the Jewish teaching concerning Jewish election is inconceivable. The conception of the eternal value and the continued existence after death is entirely different in Judaism and Christianity.

2) Concerning grace: When I do anything good, my first reaction is gratitude for having been allowed by the Almighty to do it, and not the consciousness of my own strength.
15. Cf. Augustine, Retractiones XIII, 2; cf. de praed. 2, 5; 2, 7.

16. "Der Christ ist ewiger Anführer; das Vollenden ist nicht seine Sache, - Anfang gut, alles gut. Das ist die ewige Jugend des Christen; jeder Christ lebt sein Christentum eigentlich noch heutigen Tags, als wäre er der erste". (Der Stern der Erlösung, p. 451; cf. p. 497).

18. We use the term Hebrew-Christianity, not in the narrow sense which Harnack assigns to it, but in the wider sense, describing Christians of Jewish descent.

20. Cf. Mt. 10, 5f; 15, 24. These passages express more than the much-spoken-of Judaistic tendency of M. Streeter's comment to Mt. 10, 23, εάν may well include the above verses also: "It is not that Gentiles cannot or ought not to be saved, but the time will not be long enough to preach to all, and Israel has the first right to hear". (Four Gospels, p. 255). Cf. also Hort, Judaistic Christianity, p. 34.

23. Harnack: "Paulus ist nicht der Erste gewesen, der die Heidenmission begonnen hat..." (op. cit. p. 211),

25. Rev. 19, 10: ἡ μαρτυρία τοῦ Ἱησοῦ εἶναι τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς προφητείας; which Weymouth beautifully translates: Testimony to Jesus is the spirit which underlies Prophecy. (Moffatt reads the sentence differently).

27. Canon Lukyn Williams, Adversus Judaeos, briefly discusses the theory as suggested by Edwin Hatch and later developed by Rendel Harris; (cp. op. cit. ch. I).

28. Sanh. 99a; Ber. 34b.

29. Cf. Mt. 2, 5f; 15, 17f etc. Edersheim's insistence upon the conception of unity between Israel and the Messiah is important to the understanding of the Gospel references to the O. T., especially in Mt; Cf. Life & Times,
I, p.161f; cf. also Church & Synagogue Quart., Vol. VI, p.45; for the use of O. T. prophesy in the early Church, see V. H. Stanton, The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, Edinburgh, 1886, pp.177ff; 370ff.

30. Acts 8,35.

31. Cf. Strack-Billerbeck, I, p.481; under the stress of the controversy with Christianity, Is.53 has been re-interpreted as a prediction of the sufferings of Israel. (cf. Bergmann, Jüdische Apologetik, p.57; cf. also Dr. Montalto, A Jewish tract on the 53rd ch. of Isaiah, transl. from Portuguese, London, 1790).

34. Cf. E. C. Hoskenes, Jesus the Messiah, Mysterium Christi, ed. by G. K. A. Bell & Adolf Deismann, p.70; Against the background of the O. T., Jesus' significance becomes that of the Messiah, "if this be the case, we must then abandon a merely tentative ascription to Jesus of Messianic claims..."

35. Acts, 18,24, 28.

36. Prof. F. C. Burkitt refers to it as "a curious interpolation which long survived in Latin Psalters", (Legacy of Israel, p.87 note 2). "Wood" as a reference to the Cross appears to have been an important item in Christian evidences. Tertullian sees in almost every O. T. reference to it a prediction of the Cross. (cf. Adv. Judaeos, chch. X & XIII); the accusation that the Jews have tampered with the text is a frequent feature of Christian apologetics (cf. Orig. Ep. to Julius Africanus, Ante-Nicene Lib. Vol. X, 377ff). The Jewish convert David Aboab makes similar accusations against his former co-religionists (cf. his Preface to A short, plain and well-grounded Introduction to Christianity, London, 1900).

38. Lukyn Williams observes: "Christian Jews only carried on the methods of Biblical interpretation which they had used before their conversion, and Gentile Christians naturally followed suit". (Adv. Jud. p.17). The infinite ingenuity of exegetical skill can be seen from how a newly converted Jew, David Aboab, manages to translate the words נְאָמַר לְךָ בַּיֶּם הָיֶשָּׁרָה "we shall rejoice in thy Jesus" (!) (op.cit.p.X), after first having inserted these words in Ps.145,13; The Vulg. transl. εὐχαριστήσας σε Ἰησοῦν (Hab.3,18) "exsulta in Deo, Jesu meo" (!)

42. Strack-Billerbeck, III, p.388; cf. Lev Gillet, pp.53ff; H. Loewe, Jud. & Christ. II, p.11; Strack-Billerbeck point out the important difference between the Alexandrian method of interpretation and that of the Rabbis. The latter, probably under the stress of the Jewish-Christian controversy, warning against the dangers of allegorising. (ib. III, p.397 - 399); the same warning is sounded by Hayyim ben Musa of Bejar who advises his coreligionists to keep to the literal text and reject allegory when engaging in Christian controversy. (cf. A. Neubauer, The Expositor, 3rd. series, Vol. VII, p.197).

44. Prof. M. Philipson (1846 - 1916) has frankly acknowledged the fact that many Christian converts were men of outstanding quality. These are his words: "Man ist häufig geneigt, sich über den um sich greifenden Abfall zu trösten indem man sagt, es seien nur faule, kranke Zweige, die von dem uralten Baume abbröckeln. - Allein das ist leider unrichtig; vielmehr verlassen uns zahlreiche geistig und materiell potente, sogar sonst sittlich hochstehende Elemente". (quoted by A. Frank, Zeugen aus Israel). A similar admission is made by Graetz, who says: "By the conversion of learned and educated men, physicians, authors, poets, Judaism was deprived of many talents, some of them were possessed of a zeal for conversion, as if they were born Dominicans". (Geschichte, VIII, p.83; quoted from Enc. of Missions, 2nd ed., 1904, p.356b); cf. also Schechter views; Benthwich, S. Schechter, p.101.

46. Cf. the answer by the Rev. M. M. Ben-Oliel to a similar allegation made by Claude G. Montefiore, in a letter to the Times, April 26th, 1902. (Church & Synagogue, Quart., Vol.IV, p.118); Mr. Ben-Oliel, addressing himself directly to Montefiore, points out that seven members of his own family-circle have become Christians; cf. also C. P. Sherman, who in an article on Isaac Salkinson's translation of Paradise Lost, says: "The Mission to Jews can boast of having from the days of St. Paul gained the ear and heart of many brilliant sons of Israel who shine as stars in the firmament". (Milton & Salkinson, Church & Synagogue Quart. Vol. XI, p.85).
47. Acts, 9, 22.

49. J. Lichtenstein, in an open letter to his Jewish brethren, declared with great solemnity: "als ein im Amte ergrauter Rabbiner, als alter gesetzestreuer Jude bekenne ich nun laut: Jesus ist der geweissagte Messiahs Israels..." (Eine Bitte an die geehrten Leser, Budapest (no date), p. 4).

51. The greater part of the Chizzuk Emunah is concerned with the interpretation of O. T. passages. Lukyn Williams' answer to R. Isaac of Troki is an exposition of the same passages from the Christian point of view. (cf. Lukyn Williams, Christian Evidences, Vols. 2, 1911/1919).

53. cf. ib. p. 221.

54. Dr. Isaac Da Costa, Israel & the Gentiles, Engl. by Mary J. Kennedy, London, 1850; cf. also Dr. Abraham Capadose's experience; Breuiter, p. 174.

55. Quoted in full by Bernstein, p. 178.

56. Kingsley has truly recognised the importance of the O. T.: "if we once lose our faith in the Old Testament", he wrote to Saphir, "our faith in the New will soon dwindle to the impersonal spiritualism of Frank Newman, and the German philosophers". (Church & Synagogue Quart., Vol. VI, p. 75).

60. For a description of the Pugio Fidei and the line of argument it takes, see Lukyn Williams, op. cit., pp. 248ff; cf. also the learned art. by A. Neubauer, Jewish Controversy and the "Pugio Fidei" (The Expositor, 3rd series, Vol. VII, pp. 81ff, 179ff). Neubauer shows, against Schiller-Szinessy, that Martini was well versed in Rabbinic literature and that not Pablo, but he himself was the author of the Pugio Fidei.
61. Cf. G. H. Box, Legacy of Israel, pp. 328ff; A. C. Adcock, Jud. & Chty. II, pp. 292ff; one of the most outstanding pupils of the Cabala was Pico di Mirandola (1463 - 94); Reuchlin attached great importance to the Messianic conceptions of Jewish mysticism, cf. Kayserling, J. E. art. Cabala, _Vol. III, p. 470f).

62. Cf. Bernstein, Jewish Witnesses, p. 337; Delitzsch called Lichtenstein's book upon which the author has laboured for 12 years "das gelehrteste und eigentümlichste, was je ein Judenchrist geschrieben", describing it as "gnostisch-ebionitisch"; (Saat auf Hoffnung, 1868/69, p. 189); Lichtenstein's later Commentary, however, shows greater restraint in the application of esoteric teaching. (cf. Zöckler, Aus Jechiel Lichtensteins HebräischemKommentar, Leipzig, 1895, p. 6); another famous Hebrew Christian, Joachim Biesenthal, uses the Sohar to adduce proofs for the doctrine of the Trinity and other Christian dogmas. (cf. Auszüge aus dem Buche Sohar, 1837).

63. "Christianity expressed in Jewish terms", has always meant to Levertoff, 'Chassidic terms". (O. T. Levertoff, The Jewish-Christian Problem, Judaism & Christianity, ed. by L. Gillet, p. 99); cf. also Comm. in the Messiah, p. 203.

64. Cf. his study in the conception of love in Chassidism & the Johanne Gospel, (Love & the Messianic Age, London, 1923); cf. also his liturgy, Missale Judaorum Fidei Christianae; Paul Schorlemer, Eine Judenchristliche Liturgie; Olga Levertoff, Paul L. & the Jewish Christian Problem; in Judaism & Christianity, ed. L. G., pp. 57ff; 71ff; 93ff.

65. Gillet, Communion, p. 97; Gillet observes, however, "One must categorically repudiate the naive endeavours to find in Jewish tradition the present Christian dogmas of the Trinity, Incarnation & Redemption".

68. Communion in the Messiah, p. 186; J. Douglas Lord: "The change from Judaism to Christianity is less a Conversion than a progress". (Church & Synagogue, Quart., Vol. I, (1898), p. 213).

For the description of Jewish mystical literature, see Cesterley & Box, A short Survey of the Literature of Rabbinical & Medieval Judaism, pp.235 - 254; cf. also S. Spiegel, Hebrew Reborn, pp.136ff.

71. Cf. Abrahams, Judaism, pp.68, 76f. Heinrich York-Steiner's verdict: "von Mystizismus will die jüdische Religion absolut nichts wissen...", is obviously an exaggeration. Torsten Ysander speaks rightly of a double trend in Judaism, one tending towards rationalism, the other towards mysticism. The trend towards rationalism is, however, in preponderance.

72. "Der unterdrückte Mystizismus wurde ein Ferment des entstehenden Christentums..." (York-Steiner, p.114).

73. It is interesting to note that Nachmanides and Buber, both no mean mystics, are strongly opposed to Christianity.

75. Spiegel, op.cit.p.137f.

76. 2 Cor. 3,13 - 15.

77. 2 Cor. 3,6; cf. M. Güdemann, Spirit and Letter in Judaism and Christianity, J. Q. R., April, 1892. Güdemann holds that the Rabbis too, were willing to sacrifice the letter for the sake of the spirit. They opposed Paul, because the spirit with which he was concerned was not the spirit of the Biblical text, but a spirit foreign to it: "the Jewish teachers felt themselves compelled to retain their hold upon the letter, not for the sake of the letter, but for the sake of the spirit". (ib.p.354f).

78. Cf. Barn, ch.8; the author says crudely: "The calf is Christ"; The whole chapter is an example where the allegorical method of interpretation can lead to.

79. Barn, ch.9.

81. Hippolytus, Refutation of all heresies, Bk.IX, ch.25.
83. cf. ib. ch. XIII.
84. Apologeticus, parag. 20.
85. ib. parag. 21.
86. Tert., Ad. Jud., ch.XIV; Hippolytus says of the Jews that "up to this day they continue in anticipation of the future coming of Christ", whom they expect to be "a warlike and powerful individual". (Haer., ch.XXV).
88. Tert., Adversus Marcionem, Bk.V, ch.XI.
89. Homily XVIII,17.
90. Homily XVIII,20; the usual method of dealing with difficult texts in the O. T. was by means of allegory. A past master in this method of exegesis was Origéen. Dr. R. E. Tollimton says of him: "His whole exegesis rests upon the principle that Scripture says one thing and means another..." (Selections from Comm. & Homilies of Origin, p.XXVI).
94. Meelführer wrote a little book, Jesus in Talmud Sive Dissertatio Philologica, etc. Altdorf, 1699, in which he discusses the well known passages referring to Jesus with special attention to the Tol'doth Yeshu; but his Consensus veterum Hebraeorum cum Ecclesia Christiana, 1701; Causae Synagogae errantis, 1702; contain his views concerning Judaism and its relationship to the Church.
95. The author of Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae, in his Manipulus specilegiorum, has a section specially intended for the Jews, showing how the Law of Moses foretells the function of the Messiah which has been fulfilled by Jesus Christ.

100. The Old Paths, (Nethivoth Olam) was translated into Hebrew by a Jewish Christian, Stanislaw Hoga of Kazimierz, Poland. In 1857 the Jews replied to it in a Hebrew book, The voice of Judah, where it is alleged that McCaul is a Jew by the name of Judah, the son of Rabbi Israel of Brody near Iwow; that he was given 100,000 mark for his work; that he went to America and there returned to Judaism. Later, Isaac Ber Levinsohn (1788 - 1860) and Lazar Zweifel (1815 - 1888), have also written against it. (cf. RoI, III, p. 56).

105. ib.p.654.

111. Communion in the Messiah, p. 186.

113. There is, however, an important difference in the appreciation of Judaism between those who look upon it as opposed to Christianity and those who regard it merely as on a lower stage of development. Thus, Dalman, in a missionary talk once said: "let us not despise Judaism as a religion. Some missionaries have tried to make Jewish religious thoughts, books and customs ridiculous. This is an entirely wrong method of procedure, and will only be resorted to by ignorant people. Among the non-Christian religions of the world, none deserves more respect, none is of greater interest or more worth studying than the Jewish - wrong though it is". (Church & Synag. Quart. IV, p.105); against this may be put Lev Gillet's view that Christianity is merely a continuation or the completion of Judaism. (cf. Communion in the Messiah, pp.130; 186). The difference between these two outlooks is connected with the conception of progressive revelation. To Gillet, the Messiah has not only come in history, but is still coming; his coming is "a long-drawn-out historical process". (ib.p.110).

114. C. Cels. Bk.II. ch.I.
116. Clement Alex., Stromata, Bk.II, ch.5.
117. Cf. Lactantius, Epitome div. inst., ch.49; cf. Gregory Thaumaturgus, On the Annunciation to Mary, Ante-Nicene
118. Cf. Parkes, Conflict, p.395 parag. II; Rabbi Moses Scialetti, an Italian Jew who was baptised in London in June 1663, in his tract, A letter written to the Jews, London, 1663, gives us the questions and answers on condition of which baptism was administered. One question reads: Do you renounce the errors of Judaism and with all your heart embrace the doctrine of Christianity? Another question: Are you heartily sorry...for the errors and obstinacy of your nation, whereby they approve the malice of their forefathers, and are guilty of the death of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ?
(ib.pp.16ff).

119. William Surenhusius, the famous Amsterdam Hebraist, held that a worthy disciple of Christ must either become a Jew or else learn thoroughly the language and culture of the Jews. (cf. Graetz Vol.V, 199f). For the influence of Rabbinic Studies upon modern Christian thought, see G. H. Box, Hebrew Studies in the Reformation Period and After, Legacy of Israel, pp.315 - 375.

120. R. E. Strahan, in an article: Evangelistic work among the Jews, points to the strong bond of unity between the English Christian and the Jew on the religious basis.
Judaism already possesses "the great elements of 121. Cf. Gillet, Communion in the Messiah. (The Mission of Israel to the Christian Church), pp.191 - 195.

122. Jesus, Paul & the Jews, p.151f; cf. also his article:
A Christian looks at the Christian Mission to the Jews,

124. G. H. Box, The ideal of a Hebrew Christian Church, Church & Synag. Quart. Vol.VI, p.40; but H. Heathcote, The Anglican Church & the Jews, (Church & Synagog. Quart. Vol.IV, pp.43ff), warns against the creation of another Church which will soon become a denomination. He holds that "the Synagogue reformed in the direction of Christianity" will not meet the need. "The Anglican Church can offer the Jew nothing less than the Catholic faith in its entirety". (cf. G. H. Box's answer, ib.p.55).

125. The idea itself is not entirely absent in Judaism, and occurs under the term of חֲרָבִית הָעָיִן; cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, p.178.

126. Dalman, p.177.

129. J. Douglas Lord records a significant fact: "The orthodox Jew looks upon a sincere acceptance of Christianity as a moral and inherent impossibility, and attributes in every case to base motives". (Church & Synagog. Quart., Vol.I, p.213). In the majority of cases this is also true of the non-orthodox Jew. For Jewish views concerning converts, see J.E. art. Apostacy, Vol.II, pp.12ff; also Conversion to Christianity, ib.Vol.IV, pp.249ff. Kaufmann Kohler repeats the ridiculous story about a certain Jewish convert of the 13th century called Everard, canon of St. Andrew's in Cologne, who is supposed to have said: "as little as the dog will ever cease running after the hare and the cat after the mouse, so little will the Jew ever become a true Christian". The Haggadic origin of the whole story is clearly recognizable. (!)

130. see William James, The Varieties of Religious Experience, 1902.

131. Gillet, Communion in the Messiah, p.195f; Gillet, however, takes up a much more positive attitude in his reply to Parkes' article on Missions to Jews, cf. Theology, Vol.XLVII, Oct. 1944, pp.224ff.

132. It is significant that Fr. L. Gillet is a member of the Greek Orthodox Church.

133. The polemical or apologetical fact is thereby not excluded and has its place as part of the human effort to say, what can only be said adequately by God Himself. The missionary may thus follow the example of the great Apostle. (cf. Oesterley, Church & Syn. Quart. Vol.XI, p.67f).
134. Jo. Christoph Wolf, in his Bibliotheca Hebraea, gives a list of over 80 Jewish converts who have written on behalf of Christianity before the year 1721: Scriptores anti Judaici ex Judaei, op.cit.pp.1003 - 1013; The list contains 91 names, but a few do not appear to have been of Jewish descent; A. Neubauer remarks that it was usually learned converts "who provoked the official discussions" (op.cit.p.88).

135. Bernstein says of him: "he was a poet of ability, but lacked discretion as well as charity in his poems with regard to the Jews". (op.cit.p.45).

139. Disputatio Judaei cum Christiano de Fide Christiana; Lukyn Williams dates the tract some time before 1098 A.D.; for a description, see ib.pp.375ff.

141. W. T. Gidney, p.2; Italy was the scene of an intensive missionary effort in the 16th century due to the influence of Pope Paul III, who established a house for Jewish enquirers in 1550 and who was a great friend of the Jews, cp. Heman, p.299.

142. In 1728, the Institutum Judaicum in Halle came into existence, founded by Prof. John Henry Callenberg. It was the result of coincidence rather than design. Johannes Müller of Gotha wrote a booklet Das Licht am Abend, which a Hebrew Christian student of medicine called Immanuel Frommann translated into Yiddish-German, and for lack of a publisher offered to act as compositor. (Bernstein attributes the authorship of the tract to Frommann himself, but this is a mistake). In March 1728 the first 1,000 copies were printed. Frommann put on the title page the Hebrew translation of Müller's name: Jochanan Kimchi. The booklet was a tremendous success and was translated into many languages. Soon two other Hebrew Christians were engaged in the printing press. Thus the Institute was born. On the 16th Nov. 1730 the first two theological students, Johann Georg Widmann and Johann Andreas Manitius went out as wandering missionaries to reach the Jews. Not long after, other students followed their example. Roi regards Callenberg as the father of Jewish missions of the evangelical Church. (cf. op.cit. Vol. I, p.246); At the end of a little book, A short account of the wonderful conversion to Christianity of Solomon Deitsch, with Preface and Remarks by the Rev. Mr. Burgmann, London, 1771, the writer, a missionary of the Halle Institute gives a short description of its early history. The Institute was established "for the good of Jews and Mohametans".

143. An interesting tribute to the importance of C.M.J. comes from the Jewish side: "Until the beginning of the nineteenth century", says Israel Cohen, "the efforts of missionaries to convert the Jews were carried on only sporadically, but since the establishment in 1809 of the London Society for the Propagation of Christianity among the Jews, missionary societies have sprung up in all parts of the world". (Jewish Life in Modern Times, p.271).

144. The dispersion of the Jews was a favourite argument for the truth of Christianity, cf. Augustinus, Ep. 232, parag. 3.

145. In German pietistic circles, the general conversion of the Jews became a universally accepted dogma, only opposed by a few theologians (cf. Roi I, p.239). Roi mentions that in 1748 the theological discussion as to the final salvation of Israel stirred so much strife amongst the Danzigers, that the authorities had to forbid any further discussion of the subject.

146. The Calling of the Jews, a present to Judah and the Children of Israel, London, 1621.

147. John Grindley, The Farmer's Advice to the Unbelieving, Jews, Shrewsbury, 1717; the writer makes three points: 1) He gives proofs that the promises in the O.T. apply to Jesus; 2) that Jesus whom the Jews put to death has fulfilled these promises; 3) He demonstrates that both Scripture and reason prove Jesus to be the promised Messiah; The Jews impartially considered, London, 1754; the writer explains that the Jewish people is not to be considered in the same category with the rest of mankind "but as a People now dispersed abroad by the Hand which at first collected them together, and under correction of that Hand for a very flagrant Enormity (p.3). They must thus remain monuments of God's displeasure till they "acknowledge the divine Mission of Jesus"; Richard Parry, The Genealogies of Jesus Christ in Matthew and Luke explained; and the Jewish objections removed, London, 1771; J. Bicheno, A Friendly Address to the Jews, London, (about 1787); the writer gives Scriptural proofs for the Messiahship of Jesus and also an answer to a letter by a certain Mr. Levy in connection with the letters by Dr. Priestley addressed to the Jews (see ib. pp. 70ff); The Case of the Jews, considered with Respect to Christianity, anonym., London, 1755 (the same writer is the author of another tract called Deism Refuted: or, the Truth of Christianity Demonstrated, London, 1755); for further literature, see Roi, op.cit.
I, p. 423.

148. Paul Lewis, A Treatise of the Future Restoration of the Jews and Israelites to their own Land...Adress'd to the Jews, London, 1747; The writer frequently speaks of the Messiah, but avoids mentioning the name of Jesus Christ; he calls the Jewish people to cleanse themselves from their iniquities and to make themselves worthy of God's wonderful promises to His people; Joseph Eyre, Observations on the Prophecies relating to the Restoration of the Jews (1777); Charles Jarram, An essay tending to show the grounds of Scripture for the future restoration of Israel, (1796). A literary curiosity is the strange story told by S. Bret, a supposed eye-witness of a council of Jews to examine the Scriptures concerning the Messiah: A True Relation of the Proceedings of the Great Council of the Jews, assembled the 12th of October, 1650, in the Plains of Ajayday, in Hungary, about 30 leagues distant from Buda, to examine the Scriptures concerning Christ. (The Account is incorporated in a little book called, A looking-glass for the Jews: or, The Credulous Unbelievers, London, 1753; it contains the story of Shabbethai Zevi and a brief account of 21 other false Messiahs); William Pinchion of Springfield, N. England, wrote: The Jews Synagogue, or a Treatise concerning the ancient Orders and manners of worship used by the Jews in their Synagogue-Assemblies, London, 1652; The writer proves that the "Synagogue-Assemblies" were true visible Churches of Jesus Christ and thus some of their customs before their "Apostasie", may prove profitable for Christianity, such as prayer and preaching without any levitical ceremony, weekly lectures, the use of the common tongue, etc; the Monthly Magazine, 1796, published an article by a certain Meiron, putting forth the theory of blood­ relationship between the Old Britons and the Hebrews.

149. Esdras Edzard is held by some to have been of Jewish descent, but this is doubtful.

152. The Dutch Church has made an early contribution to the missionary cause amongst the Jews. Her Synod was the first to propose the training of missionaries and the creation of an adequate missionary literature. In its missionary zeal, it went as far as removing pictures from Churches which might appear offensive to the Jews. It also instituted special prayers for the conversion of the Jewish people and Israel's salvation became the topic of many sermons. The University of Leyden created a chair for Jewish controversy. The most outstanding champion of the missionary cause was the famous Arminian Hugo Grotius (1583 - 1645), a personal friend of Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel. (cf. Roi, I, p.147f). Another Leyden professor, Simon Episcopius, an ardent Arminian, took an anti-Trinitarian view, holding that this doctrine was the greatest obstacle to Jewish conversion.

154. Richard Kidder, A demonstration of the Messiah in which the truth of the Christian Religion is proved especially against The Jews; in two parts, London 1684 & 1699. In the second part, the author sets out to give reasons why the Jews ought to believe in Jesus: "it is not my business to speak in diminution of Moses, or to question his Divine Mission, but only to show, that the Jew hath the same reason to believe Jesus sent from God, and greater reason also". (ib. Vol.II, p.17). Eisenmenger includes "die allzu grosse Freiheit, welche den Juden gegeben wird" (?) and "derselben Beförderung zu Ehrenaemtern" (?) amongst the obstacles which hinder Jewish conversion. (op. cit. p.990).

156. This tract, reprinted by L.J.S., in 1812.

158. Sigismund Hosmann wrote a tract: Das schwer zu bekehrende Judenherz (1701) in which he advocates coercion as the only means of breaking Jewish opposition to Christianity. Julius Stahl, (1802 - 1861), himself a convert from Judaism, professor of Law & Philosophy and leader of the conservative party, was opposed to the idea that Jews should hold public office in a Christian State. (Der Christliche Staat und sein Verhältniss zum Deismus und Judentum, Berlin, 1847; cf. Roi, II, pp.236ff).

159. Modern Jewish writers still complain of unworthy methods employed by missionaries in order to make converts. In a letter to the editor of the Times (April 26th, 1902) C. G. Montefiore, complains of the missionary activities of the Church in the East End of London. He calls it "a remarkable thing that the proselytising activities of the various conversionist societies seem to limit the sphere of their operations to the poorer and less cultivated class of Jews". Israel Cohen alleges that missionary work is carried on by means of cunning enticement and prying on Jewish misery and poverty. (cf. Jewish Life in Modern Times, p.272ff). A similar allegation is made by S. Daiches (cf. Aspects of Judaism, pp.132ff). That missionary societies have tended to concentrate their effort upon the poorer Jews cannot be denied (cf. Dalman, Church & Synog. Quart. Vol.IV, p.99); that missionary work has a philanthropical side to it is inevitable, but the Jewish contentions are not only exaggerated, but also unfair. The Gospel message was from the beginning primarily for the poor and needy.

160. The great champion of this new understanding of the Jewish national tradition was undoubtedly the French professor A. P. Pétavel (1791 - 1870). In his Discourse prononcé dans l'assemblée générale des missions (1834), he insists that converted Jews be encouraged to remain in close touch with their people. Hebrew Christians must not be an offence to their brethren and continue their life within Jewry. Roi calls these "sonderbare Ideen"(?)(cf. Roi, op.cit.II,p.280f), but Pétavel's views have quickly gained recognition. A few sentences from a sermon by the great Jewish missionary, Gustaf Dalman may be quoted: "We have not to Germanise or to Anglicise, but only to Christianise them...Jewish missionaries are called upon to endeavour to preach the gospel in as Jewish a shape as its essence permits, and so to respect the peculiarity of the Jewish nation...At all events, let us not help to kill the spirit of Jewish nationality by our missions!" (Church & Synog. Quart. Vol.IV,p.101f) Charles Kingsley, in a letter to Adolf Saphir says: "I would, therefore, intreat you, and every other converted Jew, not to sink your nationality, because you have become a member of the universal Church..." (Church & Synag. Quart. Vol.VI, p.75).

161. Cf. The Christian Approach, p.19: "In the religion of Israel there are ideas of culture and principles of morality which are not to be found in other non-Christian religions".

162. In this respect German writers have been more cautious than their English counterparts. J. Fr. Buddeus has already stressed the difference between Judaism and Christianity in the conception of sin which makes a Saviour to the Synagogue superfluous. (cf.Roi,I,p.232). Gustaf H. Dalman fully appreciating Judaism, was convinced that "true evangelical Christianity must be placed in opposition to Judaism, without any watering down and without disguise". (Christianity & Judaism, transl. by G. R. Box, London, 1901, p.25f). English writers on the other hand, have tended towards reconciliation at the price of toning down Christian doctrine. Another feature is the appeal from modern Judaism to

163. Dalman, in an address delivered in Scotland in Jan., 1902, severely censured missionaries who speak to the Jews, "as if they were addressing non-Jewish Christians, without importing into their words anything specifically Jewish or calculated to appeal specially to Jews as such". (Church & Synag. Quart. Vol. IV, p. 95). Lukyn Williams pleaded for a scientific study of Missions to the Jews and his programme includes a thorough knowledge of Judaism (cf. Church & Synag. Quart. Vol. IX, p. 11); cf. also The Christian Approach, p. 41, parag. IIc.

164. Cf. The Christian Approach to the Jew, p. 18f: "Our message to the Jews is the love of God revealed in Jesus Christ..."

168. cf. ib. p. 7: "the Jew, as never before, has been discovered to be reachable - we believe, gloriously reachable". At the Conference at Atlantic City in May, 1931, under the auspices of the Internation/Missionary Council, a resolution was passed in the form of a "unanimous acceptance of a statement on the supreme Christian responsibility of sharing with the Jew the faith in Christ and knowledge of God in Him which is the supreme treasure of the Christian Church". (Intern. Rev. of Miss., Vol. XXI, 1932, p. 344).

169. The influence of men like Graf Nicolaus Ludwig Zinzendorf (1700 - 1760) and Prof. Franz Delitzsch (1813 - 1893) upon the Protestant Church cannot be overestimated. Thanks to the spirit of Zinzendorf, the Herrnhutters were the first to introduce prayers in their litany for Israel's conversion; to pray for the Jews on the day of Atonement; to insert special hymns in their hymnary remembering the Jews. Their finest missionary was Samuel Lieberkühn (1710 - ?), who may be called the first modern missionary to the Jews. He adapted himself to those to whom he preached to such an extent that the Dutch Jews called him Rabbi Samuel (cf. Roi, I, p. 566). Prof. Delitzsch, by his example and his writings, has stimulated to missionary activity not only the Lutheran, but the Protestant Church at large. (cf. Roi, II, p. 132).

171. Cf. A. Fürst, p. 60.

175. Newman mentions, Victor von Carben, Emmanuel Tremellius, Jochanan Isaac and his son Stephen, as Luther's special friends. To a former Rabbi Jacob Gipher, called Bernhard, Luther sent his trat, That Jesus was born a Jew. With Matthew Adrian, Hebrew professor at Wittenberg and Johann Boeschenstein, Luther came to grief. (cf. Newman, op. cit. pp. 625ff.)

176. Quoted by Adler, Auto de Fé, p. 49; cf. also Roi, op. cit., pp. 404ff. A notable exception was the convert Dr. Carl Anton, a former pupil of Eibeschütz, who defended the Jews against Eisenmenger (cf. ib., p. 403). Newman mentions also Martin of Lucena as friendly disposed towards the Jews (cf. op. cit., p. 371). But such were exceptions. What the Jew expected from the converts we can guess from the Chassidic story about the baptised Jew who becomes a bishop but is brought back to the fold by the mystic power of Baalshem. The former bishop confesses: "I was filled with hatred against my own belief, and this grew every day. But in the nights, when I was defence­less, the shame of my apostacy came upon me. In the day I took revenge for the unrest of my nights, and persecuted my people". (M. Buber, Jewish Mysticism, p. 108). Anti-Judaice ex Judaei (cf. Elk an N. Adler, About Hebrew Manuscripts, 1905, p. 118).

178. Neander's Jewish name was David Mendel. Already in 1805, on leaving school, he made a Latin speech deploring the difficult position of German Jewry and pleading for equality (De Judaeis optima conditione in civitatem reciendi). He remained a friend of the Jews all his life: "He emphatically denounced the Blood Accusation in 1840" (Valentine, J. E., p. 457b).

179. Veith, who was a great preacher, a prolific writer and a good physician, defended the Jews in the Damascus Blood Libel of 1840, as Neander had done. According to the Jewish press, he was supposed to have taken a solemn oath from the pulpit with the Crucifix in his hand, denying the use of blood by Jews for religious purposes. (cf. A. Jürst, p. 289f; Adolph Kohut, Berühmte israeli­tische Männer u. Frauen, II, p. 357).
Paulus Stephanus Cassel (Selig Cassel) is described as "an active opponent of anti-Semitism" (Valient, J.E. p.132b). At the time of the rise of anti-Semitism in Germany, Cassel raised his voice with great effect on behalf of his people. He wrote: "Wider H. v. Treitschke für die Juden"; "Die Antisemiten und die Evangelische Kirche", and many articles against Adolf Stöcker. Roi disapprovingly remarks: "Alle seine Kundgebungen auf diesem Gebiete sind mit der vollsten Einseitigkeit der Partei behaftet" (II,p.191). But Roi's judgement is in itself biased, though in the opposite direction. He denies the Jews the right to citizenship (cp.ib.II, p.259) and defends Stöcker's anti-Semitic activity. (cp.ib.II,p.263).

Cf. A. Fürst, p.60: "In dieser Beziehung sind unsere modernen Juden um kein Haar besser gesinnt als ihre Vorfahren". J. Lichtenstein, bitterly complains that religiously indifferent Jews are his most ardent opponents. (Eine Bitte, p.9f).

There are, naturally, laudable exceptions. Dr. Blau of Frankfurt /M, in an attack upon apostatised Jews and those who maintain social relations with them, makes it plain "that he has no quarrel with persons who may become converted to Christianity from conviction". (Jewish Chronicle, March 26th,1909).

The insistance upon the significance of the individual as against the nation (Judaism) is one of the main denationalising causes of Christianity. "Historically", says J. H. Oldham, "the creation of this sense of the value of the individual was largely the work of Christianity", (Christianity and the Race Problem, p.221). It is the belief of the Church, that in Jesus Christ there is established a new human relationship which transcends all human divisions. (cp.ib.p.283f).

Lukyn Williams. Missions to Jews: A Historical Retrospect (S.P.C.K.,1897), p.54: "If a Jew is converted, he, from want of sufficient choice among Jewish women, marries a Gentile, while his children for a certainty, and even he himself for a probability, become assimilated to Gentile surroundings, and practically become indistinguishable from the English, Germans or French among whom they dwell".

A. Hastings Kelk, in an article on A Hebrew Christian Church, admits the fact that the rapid assimilation of the Hebrew Christians to their surroundings is "a great hindrance to their brethren of the Synagogue". (Church & Synagogue Quarterly, Vol.IV, p.143).

An Ukase signed by Czar Alexander I on March 25, 1817, ruled that 1) all magistrates ecclesiastical and civil afford protection and assistance to all Jews seeking baptism; 2) that settlements of such Jews be facilitate\text{d} with sufficient land provided by the Government; 3) that a Society of Christian Jews be established; 4) that a board be formed to supervise these settlements; 5) that this board report periodically to the Czar.

The rules respecting the Society of Christian Israelites provide:

1) Free land provided by the Crown to Christian Israelites and their posterity.
2) On these lands they may organise their communal life in perfect freedom.
3) Full and perfect liberty of confession regardless of denomination to all Jewish Christians entering the Society.
4) Apart from the Committee in Petersburg, nobody is to exercise any authority over them.
6) All civil rights granted to them throughout the whole empire.
10) Members of the Society are dispensed [ sic] all military and civil service and this applies both to them and their posterity.
12) Members of the Society of Christian Israelites are exempt from all kinds of duties and taxes for the space of twenty years.
13) Foreign Jews who have embraced Christianity and desire to become members are given all rights and privileges granted to the Society.

(For the full text in English, see Three letters to the Hebrew Nation, Anon., London, 1817, pp.117ff).

189. One of the early missionaries in Calleenberg's Institute, Johann Georg Widmann, was the first to conceive the idea of a Hebrew Christian settlement in Palestine. His plan was to settle on the land with a group of converted Jews in order to await the Lord's Return which he expected to be imminent. (cp. Ro1,1,p.285). Most of the missionary literature in the subsequent period had a similar eschatological bias.

190. G. H. Box: "So long as Christianity is presented to the Jew in such a way that its acceptance involves severance of racial ties and ultimate absorption, it can hardly be wondered at if the great mass of Jewish people refuses to consider such a possibility. In the face of such a phenomenon as present-day Zionism...it is hardly necessary here to insist on this point further" (Church & Synag. Quart. Vol.III,p.53). G. H. Dalman, referring to the discussion of a Jewish Christian Church, explains that it is not the missionary purpose to make Jews into non-Jews or Gentiles, but rather "bad Jews into true Jews" for God "wills not that Israel should be absorbed among the nations". (Church & Synag. Quart. Vol.III, p.109).

192. Montefiore admits that Judaism is a national religion de facto though not de jure (cf. Liberal Judaism, p.286) E. Bevan has described Judaism as "a strange survival in the modern Western world - a survival of a type of community which in primitive times was general". (Intern. Review of Missions, Vol.XXII, 1933, p.490).

197. op.cit.p.477.

200. Cf. Felsenthal, p.212: "Judaism' and 'Jewish religion' are not synonymous terms..."Jewish religion is only part of 'Judaism'... "Judaism is the sum total of all the manifestations of the distinctively Jewish national spirit".

pp. 91 and 94; Dr. Gaster categorically declares: "There cannot be Christian and Jewish Jews".

204. Felsenthal, p. 214; cf. ib. pp. 233f; 256.

205. Edwyn Bevan in his answer to S. S. Cohon's plea against Christian interference with Judaism, finds it difficult to see "why a member of the Jewish community who embraces it (Christianity) should be considered to have abandoned Judaism". (Intern. Review of Missions, Vol. XXII, 1933, p. 490). E. Bevan apparently uses the word "Judaism" as synonymous with the Jewish community (?).

207. We say de jure first, because active missionary endeavour has largely ceased, and secondly, because we hold with Felsenthal and others, that in the Rabbinic view, even the ger zedek, was not a Jew in the true sense of the word (cp. Felsenthal, p. 221, parag. VIII). Cf. infra pp. 399 ff.

208. Harnack, Mission, p. 43.

210. J. Singer, Sollen die Juden Christen werden? pp. 36, 38; The assimilationist tendency of the tract is obvious. It is a plea for unity between Jews and Christians and was occasioned by the intermarriage dispute in the Hungarian Parliament. The writer is in favour of intermarriage. A somewhat similar attitude was taken by the founder of the New Israel movement in South Russia, Jacob Prelooker (1860 - 1935). Cf. S. Dubnow, History of the Jews in Russia and Poland, II, p. 344; J. E., IX, p. 345; Valentine's J. E. p. 460b.

211. Singer differentiates between Christianity and Church. Church is a corruption of Christianity: over the ruins of the Church, Christianity can find its way back to its old mother - Judaism, who will be willing to forgive. In essence both Judaism and Christianity are identical, for did not Lord Beaconsfield say: "Christianity is Judaism for the multitude, but it still is Judaism"? (ib. p. 24 and note; cf. also p. 34).

218. Cf. Rabbi J. Lichtenstein, Judaism & Christianity, Engl. by Margaret M. Alison, with a preface by John Alison, convener of the Jewish Miss. Comm. of Church of Scotland, Edinburgh, 1893, p.21: "I felt myself peculiarly and wonderfully taken possession of. A sudden clearness, a light flashed through my soul...I looked for thorns and gathered roses, I discovered pearls instead of pebbles - heavenly treasure..."
The old Rabbi makes the following confession: "Surely, whoever knows Him must love Him, whoever loves Him must honour Him, whoever honours Him must adore Him, and whoever adores Him understands Him when He says, 'I and my Father are One'" (ib.p.104).

219. N. Gorodetzky, The Humiliated Christ in Modern Russian Thought, London, 1936, p.90; Aptekman, however, was in sympathy and outlook a Russian rather than a Jew, cp. ib.p.87f).

220. Pastor R. Faltin's missionary interest in the Jews was due to the faithful witness of a pious old woman. When Rabbi Gurland became a Christian, it appears that the same woman had been praying for his and his wife's conversion for 18 years; Frey who is the actual founder of the London Jews Society was converted through the witness of a Christian tanner called Michaelis.

222. Cf. Roi, I, p.430; von Clausberg is reported to have humbly remarked: "Allein das wahre Leben habe ich noch nicht erfahren gehabt, darin bin ich jetzt noch ein kleines Kind".
223. Gustaf Dalman revealed the story of a union of secretly baptised Jews in Amsterdam about the year 1770. At one time the famous Rabbi Jonathan Eibeschütz (1690 - 1764) is supposed to have stood at the head of this movement (cf. Saat auf Hoffnung, 1890, pp.18ff). Roi thinks that the movement began somewhere about 1680 - 90 and was the sequence of the Shabbethai Zevi (1621 ? - 1676) fiasco. Only recently a secret union of believers in Palestine was recorded by Abram Poljak, cf. The Cross in the Star of David, London, 1938, pp.41ff. The evidence for this, however, is very slender. The present writer has occasionally met and also heard of Jews who were secret believers.

224. Lichtenstein, after attaining full conviction, never hid his views from his congregation, yet he remained within the Synagogue to the end. The Rabbis at a conference at Pesth tried to induce him to recant his views or to leave the Synagogue, but he firmly refused to do either.

225. A remarkable case is that of Philipp Jaffe (born in 1819 near Posen, d. 1870). He taught history at the Berlin University. Roi says that he belongs to the most outstanding scholars of the history of the Middle Ages. Jaffe was near to the Christian faith, but refused baptism out of fear that he might be accused of ulterior motives. Finally he accepted baptism, but committed suicide two years later under the delusion that he was being persecuted as a result. (cf. Roi,II, p.218ff).

226. T. W. Gidney, History of the London Jews Society, p.222. The present writer knows of at least two instances when Jews have baptised themselves in the name of the Messiah Jesus, one of them in the Vistula, and the other in a bath.

228. The story of Navrazky is unusual. As a child he was forcibly baptised in the R. C. Church and was kept by a Polish nobleman under appalling conditions. In the end he was exchanged for a dog and became the property of a Saxon officer. His new master was a kind and religious man and Navrazky himself became "ein wahraft frommer Christ". (Roi, I, p.370).

229. After the early death of her first husband, the sculptor Michael Grünbeck, Magdalene Augusta Navrazky married the Hebrew Christian, David Kirchhoff (1716 - 1789), and received from Zinzendorf the additional name of Esther.

236. It is believed that Prelooker's ultimate intention was to "unite a reformed synagogue with the dissenters from the Greek Orthodox Church - the Molokans, Stundists, and Dukhobortzy" (Peter Wiernik, J.E., Vol.IX, p.343).

239. Roi records that the Jewish community in Jerusalem was a great disappointment to Rabinowitsch; he also relates that Rabinowitsch, before leaving Jerusalem, went up the Mount of Olives, and as he looked down upon the ancient city, he was subject to a strange experience; he was suddenly seized by the conviction that "the keys to the Holy Land lie in the hands of our brother Jesus".

240. Church & Synag. Quart., I, p.47.

242. It is interesting to note, that Delitzsch, the Gentile scholar, speaks disapprovingly of Rabinowitsch's attitude to the Talmud and the Midrashic literature; cf. ib.p.48.
245. The work of Pastor R. Faltin in Kishineff, however, must not be underestimated. (cf. Gidney, p.442f). His greatest success was the conversion of the Rabbi Rudolf Gurland, who was baptised together with his wife on Easter Sunday, 1864. Faltin's work was financially supported by the London Jews Society.

246. He was only given permission to maintain a prayer-house, where he had the right to lecture and carry on mission work. According to Prelooker, the reason for the official disfavour was Rabinowitsch's baptism in the protestant Church. Pobiedonostzeff, the procurator of the Holy Synod, regarded this an ungrateful act. (cf. Prelooker, Under Czar, p.150).

247a. Opinion amongst those keenly interested in missionary work amongst the Jews, was divided. It is, however, noteworthy that men like Godet in Switzerland; Delitzsch, Faber, Müller and Pastor Wiegand in Germany; G. Kröger, Nogar and Eynard in France, were all keen advocates of a Hebrew-Christian Church. On the other hand, De le Roi and to some extent G. Dalman, were opposed to the idea. (For the controversy between Roi and Wiegand, and other material, see the interesting article by A. Bernstein, The Formation of a Hebrew Christian Church: is it desirable? Jew. Missionary Intelligence, May, 1902.

249. Church & Synag. Vol.III, p.59; with regard to the latter suggestion, Dr. P. P. Levertoff's Order of the service of the Meal of the Holy King, has laid the foundation for a future Communion Office in the Hebrew Christian Church.

256. Cf. Christians & Jews, p.91; Olga Levertoff, The Wailing Wall, p.119; For Dr. Levertoff's attitude to the question, see Olga Levertoff's article, The Jewish Christian Problem, Judaism & Christianity, ed. by L. Gillet, p.98f.

257. Christl. T. Lipszytz, Der Ebionitismus in der Judenmission, oder Christentum und national-jüdisches Bewusstsein (Ein Vortrag gehalten auf der Internationale Judenmission-Konferenz zu Stockholm am 9 Juni 1911); Schriften des Institutum Judaicum in Berlin, Nr. 41; the last point is important, as few Christian writers have paid attention to it.

259. H. Poms, Thoughts on Hebrew Christianity, The Hebrew-Christian Quart., April, 1944, pp.12ff; this important point has entirely escaped the notice of Lev Gillet.

261. Against L. Gillet, who, for unexplained reasons, holds that "the adhesion of a Jew to one of the Gentile Churches" is neither normal nor desirable. (Communion in the Messiah, p.191).

264. Shalom Spiegel, appreciatively says of I. E. Salkinson that, "he translated the Gospels, Milton and Shakespeare into magnificent Hebrew". To Spiegel, it is a matter of surprise "how incredibly deep and genuine a love for Hebrew the baptized minister still had in his heart". (Hebrew Reborn, p.175). For a fine criticism of Salkinson's literary merits as a translator, see C. P. Sherman, Milton & Salkinson, Church & Synag. Quart. Vol.XI, pp.84ff.

265. Cf. O. Levertoff, The Wailing Wall, p.120f.

266. Eisenmenger, op. cit.p.990: "Die Verlassung der Bekehrten, indem man ihnen nicht mit nöthiger Hülffe an die Hand geht".
267. Cf. Lichtenstein's introduction to the English transl. of Judaism & Christianity; Lichtenstein, in self-defence says: "It is indeed an open secret to all my acquaintances, that my former happy, prosperous circumstances were overcast directly after the publication of my writings, and rapidly got worse". (ib. p.12)

269. Cf. Parkes, The Jew in the Med. Community, p.143f; The Church has tried to remedy the situation, but with little success. Pope Alexander issued a Bull ordaining that baptised Jews should no more forfeit their property, but the custom continued for some time.

270. Cf. H. P. Stokes, Short history of the Jews in England, pp.37f; a similar home was established at Oxford.

279. Gidney, p.76f.

281. ib. p.534.
282. In the now sadly depleted library of Church Missions to Jews, we have found a number of books bound at the Institution. Some of these were most expertly done.

284. Constitution and Bye-laws of the International Hebrew Christian Alliance, (no date) parag.II.

292. Legacy of Israel, p.313f.

296. Dr. M. I. Schleiden truly says: "Without Hebrew no Reformation; without Jews no Hebrew, for they were the only teachers of the language". (The Importance of the Jews, p.30).

297. Box, op.cit. p.338; the Hebrew Text for the Complutensian Polyglot (1574-1577) printed by Covadonga Reina, was arranged by three learned Trent Christians; Cf. Roi, I, p.194. [cf. Breuer, op. cit. p.57 n.1.

301. "Neander war nicht nur eine tieffromme Persönlichkeit, -nchezT ^uch ein durch und durch vornehmer Charakter". (Schweitzer, Geschichte d. Leben Jesu Forsch., p.102, note).

308. Kohut remarks with amusement that it was left to two converts from Judaism, Neander and Stahl, to become the classical defenders (Träger) of ecclesiastical orthodoxy in Germany. (op.cit, p.297).

312. A. Fürst, p.274.

313. Roi, III, p.19; Roi, who never praises Jews undeservedly, holds that it is only thanks to Frey that there exist modern Missions to Jews. (cp.ib, p.10).

314. For an estimation of the importance of the London Jews Society (Church Missions to Jews), see Roi, III, p.249; For Palestine Place, see Gidney, pp42f, 279f.

316. The Barbican Mission to Jews owes its existence to a Hebrew Christian, P. J. Warschawski; some other missionary Societies, have been founded by Jewish Christians.

319. Frommann's N.T. was prefaced with a few words in Latin to the Christian reader, dated Halle, 9th July,

321. The present writer found a MS. in the library of the late Joseph I. Landsman, written by Janash, which has never been published.

322. Dr. Kalkar became president of the Danish Missionary Society in 1861 and held the post to the end of his life. He is the author of several important books on the history of Missions. His valuable work, Israel og Kerken, Copenhagen, 1881, is often quoted.

326. A. Frank, Zeugen aus Israel, p. 41f.

328. Quoted by Gidney, p. 105.

335. The present writer, on a visit to Lwow, had occasion to meet personally a few of Lucky's former disciples.

336. We notice that the greatest Roger Bacon (1214 - 1292 ?), as in so many other things, anticipated a more modern his Opus Majus, III, parag. 13, he stresses the importance of preaching to the Jews in their own language and interpreting the Scriptures according to their literal meaning.

337. "Instruction of the Chosen of the Lord" has seen several translations and many editions. It was last published by L.J.S. in 1820.

339. Sebastian Müntzer (1489-1552), professor of Hebrew at the university of Basel, was the first to translate a part of the N.T. in Hebrew, namely the Gospel of St. Matthew which appeared in Basel in 1537, (cf. Legacy of Israel, p.354); according to A. Neubauer, there was a Hebrew transl. of the N.T. made by Shem-Tob ben Shaprut (cf. Expositor, 3rd Series, VII, p.194).

341. It was the L.J.S. edition of the Hebrew N.T. which brought Samuel Isaac Schereschewsky and Joseph Rabinowitsch in touch for the first time with the Christian message.

342. Of nine members on the committee, at least six were Hebrew Christians: The Rev. John Henry Brühl (1823-1893), Dr. R. Neumann (1788-1865), Bishop Alexander (1799-1845), S. Hoga, Dr. Biesenthal, and the Rev. J. C. Reicardt (cp. Gidney, p.535). Roi attributes the translation to Thomas Fry (Frey ?) and Dr. Collyer, both honorary secretaries of L.J.S. between 1810-1814; but cf. Gidney, p.55.

343. Delitzsch in his transl. of the N.T. relied upon the help and advice of Jechiel Lichtenstein.

345. The book appeared under the nom de guerre of Gabriel Jehuda ibn Ezra, the writer being a descendant of the ancient family, under the title: Chrześcijańskiego Żyda—wspomnienia i myśli, Poznań, 1929, pp.256; For a review, see Der Weg, Sept/Oct, 1929, (Yiddish).

346. The Hebrew Christian & his National Continuity, p.142f.

Sun Goddess of Japan, pp. 149f.

Notes to Chapter VII.

2. Cf. Trattner, op.cit.p.180 (end); cp. also John Cournos, "Hear, O Israel," London, 1938, pp.17, 22, etc.

3. ib.p.XV.

4. Rabbinic Anthology, p.XCIX: "Judaism stresses the message but neglects the messenger".

5. Cournos, op.cit.p.15.

6. On Lev Gillet's attempt to construct such a theology, see p.

14. Cf. Loewe's introduction to the Rabbinic Anthology, p.LXIX; the difference between orthodox and reform Judaism has undoubtedly been overemphasised by some writers. (cf. Church & Synag. Quarterly, XII, p.36).

15. Dr. Hertz says of Jewish Christians, they "darkened the sky of Israel's monotheism by teaching a novel doctrine of God's sonship, by identifying a man born of a woman with God, and by advocating the doctrine of a Trinity". (Affirmations, p.17).

16. Kaufmann Kohler, The Origins of the Synagogue & the Church, 1929, p.140: "The absolute Unity of God, the fundamental and central belief of Judaism, became the question of life or death for the Synagogue from the time when the Christian Church placed Jesus, her Messiah, upon the throne of God, either as His son or His equal."

17. Isaac ben Sheqhet's Responsa, 119.
18. Kaufmann Kohler, Jewish Theology, 1918, p.427; cp. also p.329.

21. * It appears to us that even in the case of those Ebionites, of whom Hippolytus records that they saw the significance of Jesus in his absolute fulfilment of the whole Law, and that they themselves, if they fulfilled the commandments could attain to the same dignity, they still assigned to the Messiah a unique and singular position. (cf. Hippolytus, Philosophumena, Bk.VII, ch.22).
23. "Der Mangel an der Erkenntnis, dass Gott in der Heiligkeit die sich selbst mitteilende, entgegenkommende, dem Anderen einwohnende Liebe ist, hinderte die Erfassung des trinitarischen Gottesbegriffs" on the part of the Synagogue. (Weber, op.cit.p.149). The classical definition of the מ"א מ"ח comes from the Master of religious Jewish philosophy, Maimonides: "This God is One God; He is neither two nor more than two but One to whose Unity there is no comparison among the individual units in the universe; not like the unit of a genus which embraces many individual units, nor like the unit of a body which is divisible into parts and particles, but a Unit to Whose Unity no other unit in the universe is like". Yad Hachazakah, יד חצקה, I,7. (Engl. by Rabbi Simon Glazer, New York, 1927).
24. Isaac Husik, A history of Medieval Jewish Philosophy, p.XLV; the otherness of God as conceived by Maimonides, in some ways resembles Barthian theology, but the difference is immense. Barth knows about the Deus Abconditus from underneath the Cross, Maimonides from philosophical reasoning.

27. This is essentially different from the famous cogito, ergo sum (Cartesius). Thought presupposes existence, and existence determines its mode and substance.

29. The emphasis must be placed on the "one". Judaism, and especially Liberal Judaism, does not hesitate to ascribe a measure of divinity to the whole human race. This is an inevitable result of the over-emphasis of the Imago Dei concept.

30. O. Lazarus explains that "the gulf between the divine and the human", in the Jewish view, "can never be closed". And yet the gulf must be bridged if communion with God is to become possible. Her answer is: "Judaism believes that the gulf is bridged by man's prayers and study, by his thoughts and his actions". (Liberal Judaism & its Standpoint, p.66).

31. The writer heard Buber lecture on Judaism and Christianity in Frankfurt/M, in Spring 1933. The citation is a free rendering from memory.

33. ib.p.95.

33a. Though the views of the Rabbis on the subject have varied, the assertion of freedom of choice is predominant. Cp. Strack-Billerbeck, I, 583ff; Vol.IV, pp.4ff.

34. A saying accredited to R. Chanina (ci.225 A.D.); Berakh. 33b.

35. Maimonides, in Yad Hachazakah, says: ו shalt not be free, and shall not be in possession of the land which thou art entering: thou shalt have no personal rights whatever in the land of Israel.

38. To the question how human freedom can be reconciled with divine sovereignty, Maimonides replies, that it so pleased God to endow man with this gift. As it is inherent in the nature of fire and air to ascend, and of water and earth to descend, so is it inherent in human nature to be free.

40. R. Akiba already said: "Everything is foreseen but free-will is given". (Aboth III, 15).
41. Cf. Lukyn Williams, The Doctrines of Modern Judaism Considered, p. 70 and references.
42. Al Khazari, V, 20.
43. Dienemann, op. cit. p. 38.
44. Dienemann, p. 49f.
48. Sanh. 97b; Pesikta 103b: If the whole of Israel unitedly performed one day of repentance, would deliverance come through the Messiah; Shabb. 118b: If Israel kept two Sabbaths properly they would be delivered at once; according to Wajikra Rabba ch. 2, even one Sabbath would suffice. For other references, see A. Cohen, Everyman's Talmud, p. 373.
49. Hermann Cohen, op. cit. p. 245.
50. Yoma 8, 8.
54. J.E., Vol. X, p. 379a. His whole article on Repentance is important.
57. Yad Hachazakah, "כְּלַמֶּנָה הָיָה עָצָיו, כְּלַחֲמַת הַשׁוּבוּת".
58. Yoma 8,8.
59. Leo Baeck, op. cit. p.169.
60. op. cit. p.50. Dienemann's own italics.
64. Cp. J. H. Hertz, Jewish View of the "Fall of Man", op. cit. p.196.
65. Cf. Strack-Billerbeck IV,9 and references; cf. also Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.517.
66. Cf. Montefiore & Loewe, Rabbinic Anthology, p.22; p.311f; and the important note, p.689f.
68. The Rabbis, however, held that יִנְהַ יְמָךְ is older than the יָנִי יְמָךְ, for while the first begins with the earliest youth, the latter appears at a later stage. (cp. Strack-Billerbeck, Vol.IV, 468f; For the question how early יִנְהַ יְמָךְ appears, cp. Gen R. 8,21.
69. Dienemann, p.22.
70. Tanhuma, Bereishit 4b; cp. also ib.10a; Bereshit Rabba 21; Niddah 16b; Maimonides Hil. Teshubah 5,4.
71. Dienemann, op. cit. p.19; cf. however, the article Yetzer hara in J.E.; Vol.XII, pp.601f.
75. op. cit. p.219.
76. ib. p.222.
It is for this reason that mysticism has always met with considerable opposition on the part of the Synagogue.

Baeck, op. cit. p.79.

ib. p.81.

W. W. Simpson, Jews & Christians to-day, p.76.

Friedrich Nietzsche expressed a sentiment which may well serve as a commentary to the enticing words of the serpent: "wenn es Götter gäbe, wie hielte ich's aus, kein Gott zu sein! Also gibt es keine Göttcr". (Also sprach Zarathustra, Taschen-Ausgabe, Leipzig, 1906, p.124).

Leo Baeck, op. cit. p.164: "The word 'sin' to Judaism is not a word of fate, but a word of judgement, of judgement concerning human action".

Strack-Billerbeck, IV, p.6; Rabbi Dienemann observes that Christian piety begins with the sense of sin. Jewish piety begins "durch das stete AnkniSpfen an die Kraft des Menschen". (op. cit. p.25).

Lindeskog, op. cit. p.84.

Baeck, op. cit. p.50; "Judaism is not merely ethical, but ethics constitutes its principle, its essence". (ib. p.52)

Baeck, p.165.

ib. p.164.

Tos. Sanh. XIII,2; cf. Rabb. Anthol., p.603f; cf. also Maimonides, Mishneh Torah, to Sanh.10,2; cf. the references given by Morris Joseph, Judaism in Creed & Life, 1903, p.154; Strack-Billerbeck,III,p.142; Maimonides, however, adds the clause: "provided they do not observe them, as mere precepts of nature, but as laws specially revealed by God".

Cf. Baeck, op. cit. p.64f; Hermann Cohen, op. cit. p.388f; and others.

Baeck, p.166.

ib. p.39.

Cf. C.H. Toy, Judaism & Christianity, London, 1390, p.90f. But Toy remarks on p. 228f: "This idea of mediation for the sinner by men or angels, though a perfectly natural one, does not find frequent expression in the Old Testament or in the Apocryphal books". It appears to us, however, that mediation is an underlying principle of the O.T. The Priesthood, the Temple cult, the prophetic Office are all closely connected with the idea of mediation; cf. Oesterley, The Jewish & the Christian Doctrine of Mediation, Church & Synag. Quart. Vol.X, (1908) pp.34ff.

95. Cf. Strack-Billerbeck,III,p.556; cf. also Oesterley, The Doctrine of Mediation in Rabbinic Writings, op. cit.pp.98-116; but Oesterley observes: "in spite of the clear enunciation of the doctrine of Mediation to be found in the Old Test., the Apocrypha, and Pseudepigraphic writings, and even the Targums, yet there are pointed instances in which this doctrine is combated in Talmudic writings..." (ib.p.115).

96. That there was external influence need not be denied, op. Toy, p.451, note.

98. Montefiore explains that Judaism "brings together in close relation man and God, and it declares that there is, and need be, and can be, no other being or thing to act as bridge or go-between or intercessor". (Outlines of Liberal Judaism, p.306).

100. H. Cohen, op.cit.p.121f.

101. The close proximity between Judaism and Unitarianism is revealed in the question of mediation. R. T. Herford, in a small booklet entitled, Jesus Christ, London 1901, says: "The supposed necessity of a God-man to be the means of communication between God and man only arises when God and man are supposed to be unlike each other, unable to communicate with each other directly". (p.23).

105. Ziegler, op.cit.p.87; Oesterley has shown that the idea of Mediation has been dropped by the Synagogue as a result of its controversy with Christianity; cf. Church & Synag. Quart. XI,(1909), p.120; for the modern Jewish attitude, op.ib.Vol.XII,pp.17ff; 68ff.
106. O. Lazarus, op.cit.p.87.

107. There is a similar view expressed by the Rabbis: in R. Eliezer's opinion: "all charity and kindness done by the heathen is counted to them as sin, because they only do it to magnify themselves". Baba Bathra,10b.

108. This is the underlying thought of Anselm's Cur Deus Homo.
Prof. T. W. Manson, writing on the question of forgiveness as Jesus conceived it, remarks: "It may be observed that there is no suggestion of the debt being paid by a third party. It is simply cancelled. Whatever view we take of the Atonement, it must be confessed that the notion of the payment of man's debts to God by a third party is one which finds no support in the teaching of Jesus himself. That teaching is perfectly plain, and it is that the debts are not paid by anyone, but wiped out by God's free grace". (The Teaching of Jesus' p.310, note). Prof. Manson's interpretation of 'Son of Man' which includes both Jesus and his followers makes such a statement necessary. On his own evidence the connection between the Son of Man and the Passion in the second part of Jesus' ministry, is well attested (cp. ib. p.227). But it occurs to us, that even allowing for a wider interpretation of 'Son of Man' vicarious suffering may still be within the scope of Jesus' teaching. Prof. Manson's references to the Pauline Epistles would bear this out.

109. Though K. Kohler's view is biased by his liberal outlook, his assertion that the final redemption and the establishment of the Kingdom of God is not the work of the Messiah but God's, is essentially a Jewish view. (cf. op. cit. p.144).

110. Maimonides' 13 articles of faith are to be found in his Introduction to his Commentary on the 11th chapter of Mishnah Sanh.; also in the various Jewish Prayer Books. The 12th art. reads:

(Singer, p.90)

Hasdai Ben Abraham Crescas, however, does not include faith in the Messiah amongst the six fundamental dogmas of Judaism, (cp. Husik, p.392), but amongst the non-fundamentals (ib. p.402), so unless also Joseph Albo (Husik, p.415).

Bousset gives two reasons for this: 1) the widening of the Jewish horizon so as to conceive the eschatological hope in terms of a general catastrophe, 2) the priestly ascendency at the time of the Maccabees which put the tribe of Judah with whom the Messiah was associated in the shade.

114. Cf. Rabbinic Anthology, p. 232; (p. Taan. 58d.)

117. J.E., Vol. VI, p. 401b; Without throwing doubt upon Epiphanius' account, we hold that here two distinct persons are involved, in Epiphanius' case, the reference is to the Patriarch, Hillel II (330-365) who was the son of Judah III; the author of the adage was the son of Gamaliel III and the brother of Judah II.

121. Cf. ib. III, p. 577. S.-B. remark: that the phrase יִנְשָׁע עֲתֵלָותָה they have only met once!

125. S. Schechter observes: "The statement by some moderns, to the effect that Rabbinism did not hold the belief in a personal Messiah essential, is unscientific and needs no refutation for those who are acquainted with the literature". (Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, p. 101, note 2).

127. Ibid. p. 469.

131. These passages have been collected by Montefiore and Loewe in their Rabbinic Anthology, pp. 584-586; cp. also Montefiore, Rabbinic Literature & Gospel Teachings, pp. 306 ff. The likeness between the Christian and Jewish conceptions regarding the Suffering Messiah is so great that George Foot Moore has suggested that we have here an "appropriation of Christian doctrine for a Jewish Messiah". (Judaism, Vol. I, p. 551).

136. Hermann Cohen's conception of the Messianic Kingdom strikingly approaches the Christian view on this point: the relationship between present reality and messianic future is that of opposition. The Messianic hope (Messianismus) puts in place of the present world-order (sinnliche Gegenwart), "eine neue Art von Übersinnlichkeit...nicht eine überirdische, sondern die der Zukunft. Diese Zukunft schafft eine neue Erde und einen neuen Himmel, also eine neue Wirklichkeit". (op. cit. p. 342).

139. Dienemann, p. 61.

140. Baeck, p. 126.

141. O. Lazarus, op. cit. p. 89: "The liberal Jew believes "that it is within man's power to bring God's kingdom upon earth".

143. In the Festschrift, Hermann Cohen, p. 103.

144. ib. p. 107; L. Treitel, however, appears to deny Philo's influence upon Rabbinic thinking, cp. ib. pp. 177ff.

145. Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, p. 117; for the meaning of אֶלֶה as "religion" see M. Friedländer, The Jewish Religion, p. 4.

149. Baeck, op. cit. p. 50; Kiddushin 40b: R. Tarphon and the Elders were at a meal in Lud where the question arose: Is study great or is the deed great? R. Tarphon said: The deed is great. R. Akiba said: Study is great. Then all present rose to their feet and said: מַדָּא הַדּוּדִים רַבּוּ הַדּוּדִים (Study is great for study leads to deeds). cp. Oesterley, Church & Synag. Quart, Vol. VIII, (1906), p. 158.

151. ib. p. 92f.

152. Cf. A. Cohen, Everyman's Talmud, p. 150; Albo regards the superiority of Moses over against the other prophets as one of the eleven principles every true Jew must hold. (cp. Husik, p. 415).

158. The central place which the Scrolls of the Law occupy in the Synagogue expresses the centrality of

159. Cf. Jewish Chronicle, Dec. 24, 1943, (Fundamentals of Judaism). S. Daiches has shown that Kant misunderstood Judaism by asserting that reward was its main motive for keeping the commandments, whereas the Rabbis said: דעומת הflation (Aspects of Judaism, London, 1928, p.60f).

163. Rom. 7, 22.

165. Outlines of Liberal Judaism, p. 309.

167. Kaufmann Kohler, Jewish Theology, systematically and historically considered, New York, 1918, p. 6.

171. H. Cohen's position may be judged from the following sentences: "Die Religion hat Eigenart, keineswegs aber der Ethik gegenüber Selbständigkeit. Der Anteil, den sie an der Vernunft hat, bindet sie an die Ethik. Der methodische Zusammenhalt mit der Ethik war immer der Kompass der jüdischen Religionsphilosophie". (op. cit. p. 497). The Kantian postulate of the categorical imperative subordinates religion to ethics.

173. Dienemann, p.69.

175. Origins of Synagogue and Church, p.141.

176. H. Loewe regards the words in the Yigdal prayer: "God will never alter nor change His Law, to everlasting, for any other", as a polemical reference to Christianity. (cf. Rabbinic Anthology, p.LXIX).

179. Chagigah, 3b.

182. Cf. H. Cohen, pp. 262, 468 etc.

184. Rosenzweig who traces back the Christian dualism to a consciousness of God's love and God's justice, makes the revealing remark: "Jene blitzschnell unerwarteten Umschläge aus dem Bewusstsein der göttlichen Liebe in das der göttlichen Gerechtigkeit und umgekehrt, wie sie für das jüdische Leben wesentlich sind - der Christ kennt sie nicht..." (Op.cit.p.440). If Rosenzweig is right, the reason for it lies in the fact that the Christian knows about God's love and justice, not from his consciousness, but from the Cross.

186. Dr. J. H. Hertz speaks of a "psychic experience of a direct communion with God" vouchsafed to Moses and the whole people at Sinai (The Pentateuch, p. 403).
Felsenthal regards "natural religion in the soul of man" as "the kernel of Judaism". (B. Felsenthal, Teacher in Israel, p. 250; cf. also ib. p. 269f).

188. Montefiore, Outlines of Liberal Judaism, p. 317.

189. Rabbinic Anthology, p. LXIX. That God is bound by his own laws is an important premise in Spinoza's philosophy, cf. Will Durant, The Story of Philosophy, London, 1926, pp. 187ff.

190. Rabbinic Anthology, p. LXVI.

191. ib. p. LXXIII; cp. M. Friedländer, The Jewish Religion,
p. 46f.

192. ib. p. LXXVII.

193. ib. p. LXX.

194. ib. p. LXXI; S. Schechter, To Anders q. Neo-Orthodoxy expresses a similar view

195. ib. p. LXVI; Dr. J. H. Hertz, who repudiates the notion that human reason or the human personality is the source of revelation, does not seem to differ essentially from Loewe's view. The Chief Rabbi explains revelation as the result of the "close spiritual relationship between God and man" and the "interplay of 'spiritual forces and energies, whereby the human soul responds to the Self-manifesting Life of all Worlds..." (The Pentateuch, one vol. ed. p. 402).

197. In uniformity with this function assigned to history,
H. Loewe explains that the survival of the dietary laws seem to indicate that they serve a purpose.
(ib. p. XIII).

199. Gamaliel's wise words, Acts 5, 34ff, express a deep-seated Jewish conviction, cf. Aboth, V, 17.

200. The Christian view regarding the O. T. has been admirably restated by G. L. S. Sloan in his recent controversy with Sch. Ben-Chorin (Das christliche Verständnis des Alten Testaments und der jüdische Einwand, Jerusalem, 1941).

Macmurray, The Clue to History, p. 42.
Gustaf Dalman, in an essay on Judaism and Christianity, (transl. by G.H. Box, London, 1901), has a note on the relationship between the Old and the New Test. He explains that in older times the O.T. "was put on the same level with the N.T. The plan which was possible then can no longer be pursued, now that the O.T. is understood in accordance with its own special spirit, and merely serves to illustrate the New". (ib. p. 37). These words reveal the inroads the idea of evolution has made upon the mind of so positive a Christian scholar as Dalman. The R.C. writer, Prof. B. Barthmann takes a similar view, disrupting the connection between the Old & New Test: "Jesus denkt und operiert nicht geschichtlich, sondern prophetisch-vertical"; "Er (i.e. Jesus) weiss sich als absoluter Anfang" (Hartmann, Der Glaubensgegensatz zwischen Judentum und Christentum, Paderborn, 1938, p. 74f; cp. ib. p. 78f).

Martin Buber, Die Stunde und die Erkenntnis, Berlin, 1936, p. 154; M. Buber in Ich und Du, has a few remarkable sentences which at first sight create the impression of an affinity with the Barthian view regarding revelation. But on closer examination there appears an important divergence. Buber observes regarding Revelation: "Der Mensch empfängt, und er empfängt nicht einen 'Inhalt', sondern eine Gegenwart, eine Gegenwart als Kraft..." (ib. p. 127). And again: "Das ist die ewige, die im Jetzt und Hier gegenwärtige Offenbarung...Ich glaube nicht an eine Selbstbenennung Gottes, nicht an eine Selbstbestimmung Gottes vor den Menschen...Ich bin der Ich bin...Das Offenbarende ist das Offenbarende...Das ewige Du kann seinem Wesen nach nicht zum Es werden". (ib. p. 129). The main difference between Buber and Barth is in their attitude to the historical element in revelation. For Barth, "die im Jetzt und Hier gegenwärtige Offenbarung" cannot be anchored in the subjective experience of the believer, but in history. Schoeps is quick to notice the meaning of the a-historical conception of revelation, and warns against it. (cp. Schoeps, op. cit., p. 140f).

Baeck, p. 37.

211. Cf. Montefiore, Rabbinic Literature, p. 100.

213. Cf. Strack-Billerbeck, Vol. I, pp. 924ff; but cf. Ch. Guignebert, The Jewish World in the Time of Jesus, 1939, p. 157. The writer, referring to Mt. 23, 15, says: "Our evidence, however, for the alleged zeal of the Pharisees is very slight, and it is probable that the Palestinian Jews of that day, even the least bigoted of them, could only conceive of a universalism which was compatible with their own deep-rooted particularism".

213a. Prof. W. Curtis makes the interesting suggestion that the name for the Greek transl. "Seventy" (LXX) is not a reference to the legendary translators, but to the Rabbinic notion of the seventy nations of the world for whom the book was meant. (cf. Jesus Christ the Teacher, 1943, p. 24).

214. Klausner's remarks on the pre-Christian propaganda of Judaism are very important. (cf. From Jesus to Paul, pp. 29ff; 162; and throughout).

215. Klausner holds, with good reason, that the concern for the nations of the world is no exclusive right of Christianity, "it was anticipated by Judaism, even by Palestinian Judaism..." (From Jesus to Paul, p. 177).

216. Cf. Rabbinic Anthology, pp. 52f; 465.

Verhalten gegen einen israelitischen Volksgenossen...” (ib. Vol. I, p. 358; cf. also Schechter, Some Aspects, p. 120).

222. Moore, Judaism, I, p. 332.

225. ib. VIII, 1.

228. The date of this work is the 8th or 9th century, though it may contain old traditions.

229. Accepting the alternative reading instead of "owners", cf. G. Friedländer, p. 83, note 6. Klausner remarks in connection with this passage: "without a sympathetic and more than sympathetic attitude toward the proselytes on the part of Israel, it would be impossible to explain the success of Judaism among the Gentiles". (From Jesus to Paul, p. 37.)

231. Some Aspects, p. 106.

235. Sc. Schechter quotes an interesting sentence from R. Saadia: "Because our nation is only a nation by reason of its Torah"). Some Aspects of Rabb. Theology, p. 105.

236. Though Schechter remarks: "even those Rabbis who tried to establish Israel's special claim on their exceptional merits were not altogether unconscious of the insufficiency of the reason of works in this respect, and therefore had also recourse to the love of God, which is not given as a reward, but is offered freely". (op. cit. p. 61).

237. Cf. Schechter, Some Aspects, p. 131f. and references; it is interesting to note that J. H. Hertz speaks of a "predisposition in the nature of the Jewish people to receive the message of Sinai". (Pentateuch abridged ed., p.403 parag.V).

238. The Rabbis thought of a double relation between God and humanity. "He is the Lord of all nations, while his name is specially attached to Israel". (So Schechter, op.cit.p.63; cp. also note 2). "God is in a special sense the God of Israel; but He is unequivocally, too, the God of all flesh", (Abrahams, Judaism, p.41).

239. Cf. Schoeps, p.128; "Judaism for the Jew may almost be claimed as a principle of orthodox Judaism". (Abrahams, Judaism, p.42); for Scheckter's view, see Bentwich, S. Schecher, pp. 304-347.

241. The whole Mishnaic tractate Abodah Zarah reveals the extent of Jewish aversion to idolatry.

242. Gerald Friedländer, Pirké de Rabbi Eliezar, p.208; Cf. Sanh. 94a.

243. ib.p.208. Another reading is: "as though he were eating with a dog". G. Friedländer, for some curious reason, refers to Phil.3,2 and Eph.2,11, as "parallel N.T. teaching". Does the translator imply that Paul refused to eat with Gentiles? For further strange use of the N.T., see ib.pp.208 note 7 and 209 note 1.

248. ib.p.79; Hoennicke, op.cit.p.77: "Nur durch Israel bekommen die Heiden am Heil Anteil. Das ist der Grundgedanke".

249. Saul Lieberman, has tried to show that there existed a closer relationship between the Rabbis and the Gentile world than is usually assumed. But he admits that "the learned Rabbis were conscious of their great task of guarding the true faith, the high ethics and the pure family life of the Jews against any outside contamination; they made hedge upon hedge around the Law in order to protect it and to preserve it in its entire purity". (Greek in Jewish Palestine; Studies in the life & manners of Jewish Palestine in the II-IV Centuries C.E., New York, 1942, p.89f).

251. Cf. Bousset, op.cit.p.92: "Ihre Grundforderungen sind in erster Linie darauf gerichtet, das Volkstum in seiner Sonderheit zu bewahren". The interdiction to marry heathen, the insistence upon circumcision for proselytes, the restrictions upon social intercourse on the grounds of ritual defilement, interdiction to learn Greek, etc., all served the national purpose, according to Bousset.

253. Cf. Singer, p.5f and note p.XVII.

255. Montefiore, Rabbinic Anthology, p.XXXII.

257. Hoennicke, p.76.

258. Cf. Bousset, op.cit.p.92; cf. also Hoennicke, pp.60ff; cf. also Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.177ff.

259. "The Covenant made the Jew self-confident and arrogant, but these very faults were needed to save him". (Abrahams, Judaism, p.11).

262. Weber, op.cit.p.76: "Während so Einzelne aus der Heidenwelt bald in geringer, bald in grösserer Zahl durch freiwilligen Anschluss an Israel gerettet werden, hat die Völkerwelt als solche keine andere Zukunft, als die des Gerichtes".

266. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p.203; cf. pp.178, 188; p.205: "Christianity took elements from Judaism and Hellenism and of the two compounds something new which was neither one nor the other" came into existence. Cf. also Ziegler, op.cit.p.75: "nur mittels Konzessionen" was the new religion able to succeed.
Particularism was the great weakness and defect of the Rabbinic religion, though it was accompanied by qualities too commonly overlooked or denied in the customary descriptions of Judaism.

Jacques Maritain, Antisemitism, p. 18.

Cf. Singer, p. 227: " partici made a merit non nosso, or de by Deuter. 10, 15; 14, 2 etc.

Schechter, ib. p. 57.

Cf. Deuter. 7, 6; 10, 15; 29, 13; 32, 9; 33, 29; and the many passages where Israel is spoken of as God's people; His people; My people, etc.

Ruth Rabba, introduction, ( " ינוש "), R. Simeon ben Yochai taught, etc. (27c); English transl. by Rabinowitz, p. 3.

Sanh. 10, 1.

Moore, Judaism, II, p. 95.

Rabbinic Anthology, p. 225.

Rabbinic Anthology, p. 351.

H. Cohen, however, denies this. Translating הֶדֶנְו with "Vorbild", he regards Israel as a "Symbol der Menschheit". (op. cit. p. 174). Israel exemplifies in himself what Monotheism could mean for humanity.

Al Khazari, IV, 23.

Ziegler, op. cit. p. 75.

ib. p. 76. Ziegler's italics (fat).

Cf. ib. p. 79; cf. also pp. 84ff; Martin Buber, in the introduction to his small volume on Jewish Mysticism, says: "The longer the exile lasted, and the more terrible it became, the more necessary did the maintenance of religion seem to be for the maintenance of the race; and so much the stronger grew the power of 287. Rabbinic Anthology, p. XCVI.

288. Baeck, p. 278.

290. Baeck, p. 278. This peculiar sentence is strangely reminiscent of Jesuit thinking!

291. Ziegler, op. cit. p. 78; cf. pp. 80, 82, 86, etc.

293. ib. p. 156ff.

295. Cf. Schoeps, p. 73; commenting on Rosenzweig's attitude, Schoeps explains that Israel's election is based on God's promise to Abraham: "die laut gnädiger Zusage des Ewigen physisch geknüpft bleibt an den Samen Abrahams" (ib. p. 127); a similar view is taken by Isaac Breuer, who regards both the Jewish people and Erez-Israel as integral parts of God's revelation to men. (cf. A. Lichtigfeld, Twenty Centuries of Jewish Thought, London, 1937, p. 150).

296. K. Kohler, Grundriss einer systematischen Theologie des Judentums, Leipzig, 1910, p. 6; Schoeps, therefore, contends that the comparison ought not to be between Church and Synagogue, but between Church and the people of Israel. (cf. Schoeps, ib. p. 149).

298. Franz Rosenzweig, Der Stern der Erlösung, pp. 376ff; cf. also pp. 377ff.

299. Cf. p. 505; the gravitation of Jewish life is inwards: "weil sie sich ewig aus sich selbst ernährt, sammelt sie die Glut zugleich ins Innerste zu Höchstem imbrünstigem Brand".

300. ib. p. 413.

301. ib. p. 416.

303. ib. p. 511.
Christianus fit non nascitur; it is the opposite with the Jew, says Rosenzweig (cf. ib. p. 497); H. Loewe protests against the racial interpretation of Judaism. He says: "Nationalism is the declaration that racial descent is equal to belief in God as a test of Judaism". (Rabbin. Anthol. p. LXXX). But we doubt whether he would be prepared to emancipate Judaism from its peculiar national connection.

Rosenzweig, p. 496f.

Cf. Klausner, From Jesus to Paul, p. 526 and throughout.

Rosenzweig, p. 496.

Moore, II, p. 95.

Klausner has fully recognized the implications of Pauline teaching. It was due to Paul that Israel's position of "splendid isolation" was broken down. (cf. From Jesus to Paul, pp. 531ff).

"Judaism as a theology stood or fell by its belief that man can affect God". (Abrahams, Judaism, p. 47).

The influence of Rom. chch. 9-11 upon the Christian attitude to the Jews can hardly be overestimated. Origin, who like the vast majority of the Church Fathers, does not hesitate to appropriate all the promises given to Israel, for the Church, remembering, however, the Apostle's words concerning his own people, still clings to the hope that at the last hour all Israel shall be saved. Origin entreats God on Israel's behalf, that finally he may attain to salvation. (Comm. in Ep ad Rom. VIII, 1).

The Roman Catholic, Prof. Bernhard Bartmann, in answer to Scheer's book, affirms that St. Paul regarded the promises given to Old-Israel transferred upon the New-Israel, i.e. the Church. (dp. Der Glaubensgegensatz zwischen Judentum und Christentum, p. 30f). But this is unwarranted as it cannot be deduced from his epistles. However: the Church Fathers may have interpreted Israel's position, for the Apostle only hardening in part had befallen Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in (Rom. 21, 25). Dr. Bartmann's position is conditioned by the R.C. view concerning the O.T. which apart from its prophetic-testimony ("Weissagungsbeweis) appears to be of no further significance (cp.ib.pp.70ff).

314. Lev Gillet pleads for a proper Christian understanding "of Israel's function in the divine economy", (Communion in the Messiah, p.183). But Israel's significance as far as the Church is concerned is not independent of or outside the Communion in the Messiah. The admission of a double relationship, in view of the Pauline Epistles, is impossible. God deals with man and not with Jews and Gentiles.

316. Chame, op.cit.p.341f.

317. Cf.p.16f.

318. Cf. Dial. ch.68; cf. also Harnack, Texte u. Untersuchungen, XXXIX, p.75 note 5.

319. Antinomian excesses must have often compromised the Church in the eyes of the Synagogue, (cf. S. Baring-Gould, The Lost & Hostile Gospels, 1874, pp.26ff; 40f). It may be, however, that the author is exaggerating the antinomian effect of Pauline preaching.

320. Dial., ch.8.

322. We have already referred to the discussions between Rabbis and Minim on the subject, who is true Israel, cf.p.249f. cf. also H. Loewe's note, Rabbinic Anthol. p.161f.

324. For the discussion itself, see Schoeps, pp.120-134.

325. "Wenn neues, sachbezogenes Denken etwas lehrt, dann doch wohl dieses, dass geschichtliche Wirkung nur von geschichtlicher Wirklichkeit ausgehen kann und es un-sachlich ist, ein Ergebnis—zumal ein heiliges — anders erklären zu wollen, als es sich selber erklärt". (Schoeps, p.147).

326. Schoeps, op.cit. p.146f.
331. ib.p.150.
332. ib.p.29.
333. Schoeps, p.149.
336. Leo Baeck, Wege im Judentum, Berlin, 1933, p.211.
339. Sloan & Ben-Chorin, p.29f: To Klausner, the basic principle of Judaism is: "nationality for the sake of universality". (From Jesus to Paul, p.536).
341. ib.p.425f.
343. ib.p.517: "Hass gegen die eigene Unvollkommenheit, gegen das eigene Nochnicht".
344. ib.p.436.
The Unknown Sanctuary. A Pilgrimage from Rome to Israel, New York, 1928.

347. Schoeps, p.128; Montefiore has, however, recognized the inconsistency of such an attitude, for Monotheism involves universalism and missionary expansion. (cf. Liberal Judaism, p.285f; Truth in Religion,p.19f).

350. Dial., Ch.64.

352. Cf. Danby, The Jew & Christianity, p.61; A somewhat similar story, but with a different application is contained in the Hasidic Anthology, arranged by L.I. Newman, p.46 parag.2.

353. Quoted by Schoeps, p.145.

356. ib.p.475.

358. Rosenzweig, p.436.

359. Israel's mission is fulfilled "in a calm and dignified silence". (The Chief Rabbi, quoted by Montefiore, Truth in Religion, p.26); cf. also Felsenthal, op.cit. p.247.

362. Schoeps, p.11.

364. Salis Daiches' argument against Christian missions to Jews, is based not on the essential difference between Israel and the world, but on the fact that Christianity is alien to the Jewish disposition. (cp. Aspects of Judaism, p.135); cf. also H. Loewe: "Judaism and Christianity have, each of them, that conception of God that is best suited to their spiritual mentality". (In Spirit & in Truth, p.262).

366. It is here that we differ fundamentally from L. Gillet. To him, "the negation of Jesus' Messiahship commonly associated with Judaism is super-added to the few articles of the authentic Jewish creed, but forms no part of it". (Communion in the Messiah, p.196). To us the denial of Jesus' Messiahship is implicit in the Jewish creed; Judaism as it devolved in the Christian era is the result of the controversy with the Church, particularly with Hebrew Christianity.

369. We have expressed similar thoughts in the little book, Is it nothing to you ? p.63f.

370. Amos 3,2.

372. Jewish writers, like Rosenzweig, Schoeps and others, who define Judaism in terms of race, introduce a mechanical element which is at variance with spiritual life. Against it must be placed the Pauline definition of "Jew". Dr. J. H. Hertz' conception of Judaism as a "religious civilization" lacks the individual element of all true religion. (cf. Affirmations, p.35; cf. also Bernh. Felsenthal, Teacher in Israel, p.212; but Felsenthal, with characteristic emphasis of the Liberal Jew breaks the traditional limitations of Judaism: "Gladly we admit", he says, "that Judaism is not confined to a particular country, nor to a particular people, nor to a particular period and stage of culture", ib.p.130; Felsenthal, however, is divided in his views, as his definition of Judaism indicates; cf.ib.p.232f).
Bibliography.

Baldensprenger, Die messianisch-apokalyptischen Hoffnungen des Judentums, Strassburg, 1903.

Bartmann, Bernhard, Der Glaubensgegensatz zwischen Judentum
Ben-Chorim, Shalom, and George L. B. Sloan, Das christliche Verständnis des Alten Testaments und der jüdische Einwand, Jerusalem, 1941.

Bergmann, J., Jüdische Apologetik im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter, Berlin, 1908.

Beveridge, W., (Hastings Encycl. of Rel. & Ethics, Vol. V).

Biesenthal, Joachim, Auszüge aus dem Buche Sohar, 1837.

Bloch, Joseph, Israel und die Völker, Berlin-Wien, 1922.

Brandes, Georg, Jesu-Sage, Berlin, 1925.

Brandt, Wilhelm, Elchasai, Leipzig, 1912.

Chajes, H. P., Markus-Studien, Berlin, 1899.

Charue, André, L'Incrédulité des Juifs dans le Nouveau Testament, Gembloux, 1929.

Chwolson, D., Das letzte Passamahl Christi und der Tag seines Todes, St. Petersburg, 1892.

Cournos, John, Hear, 0 Israel, London, 1938.

Curtis, W. A., Jesus Christ the Teacher, 1943.

Danziger, Adiph, Jewish Forerunners of Christianity, London, 1904.

Deutsch, David, Befestigung im Glauben, Sohrau und Breslau, 1873.

Dienemann, Max, Judentum und Christentum, Frankfurt/M, 1919.

Der Weg, (Yiddish), bi-monthly magazine founded by J. I. Landsman in Warsaw, Poland, in connection with the work of the Church Missions to Jews, Jan., 1927-Aug. 1939.

Edersheim, A., The Life & Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols 1907.

Eisenmenger, Johann Andreas, Entdecktes Judentum etc. Königsberg/Pr., 1711.

Eisler, Robert, The Messiah Jesus & John the Baptist, according to Flavius Josephus' recently rediscovered 'capture of Jerusalem' and other Jewish

" The Jewish, 12 vols., 1901-06.

" Of Missions, 1904.

Ewald, F. Ch., Abodah Sarah, Nürnberg, 1856.

Felsenthal, Emma, Bernhard Felsenthal, Teacher in Israel, New York, 1924.

Fleg (Flegenheimer), Edmond, Jesus: told by the Wandering Jew, London, 1934.

Frank, Arnold, Witnesses from Israel, Life-stories of Jewish Converts, ed. by, Edinburgh & London, 1903; (Zeugen aus Israel, Hamburg).

Frenkl, David, She'elot u-Teshubot ha Ribash ha-Ḥadashot, Munkács (Hebrew): (The Responsa by Isaac ben Sheshet Barfat [Ribash]).

Fürst, A., Christen und Juden, Strassburg, 1892.

Graetz, H., History of the Jews from the earliest times to the present day, Engl., 5 Vols., London, 1891/92.

Grayzell, Solomon, (Vallentine's Jewish Encyclopedia).

Gressmann, H., Der Messias, Göttingen, 1929.

Güdemann, M., (Jewish Quarterly Review, Vol. IV.)

Guignebert, Ch., The Jewish World in the time of Jesus, Engl. by S. H. Hooke, 1939.

Sprüche und Reden Jesu, Leipzig, 1907.

Die Apostelgeschichte, Leipzig, 1908.

Untersuchungen zu den Schriften des Lukas, Leipzig, 1908.

Hoenicke, Gustav, Das Judenchchristentum im ersten u. zweiten Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1908.

Herford, Travers R., Jesus Christ (small pamphlet) London, 1901

Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, London, 1903

Pharisaism, its Aim and its Method, London, 1912

The Pharisees, London, 1924

(Christianity in Jewish Literature (Hastings Dict. of Christ and the Gospels, Vol. II.)

(Jewish Studies in Memory of Israel Abrahams, New York, 1927).

Hilgenfeld, A., Die Ketzergeschichte des Ueurchristentums, Leipzig, 1884.

Hooke, S. M., (Judaism and Christianity, Vol. I)

Hoskyns, E. C., Jesus the Messiah, (Mysterium Christi, ed. by O. K. A. Bell and Adolf Deissmann, 1930).

Hyamson, A. M., (Vallentine's Jewish Encycl.).

Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography, 3 vols. (no date)

International Review of Missions (various numbers).

Isaac ben Sheshet Barfat, see Frenkl.

Isaac of Troki, перевода на арабский, ed. by David Deutsch, Sohrau and Breslau, 1873, 2nd ed.

Jastrow, M., Dictionary of the Targumim, etc., 1926.

Jehuda Halevi, ספרה שלו ותרום, ed. by Dr. Zifrinowitsch, Warschau, 1926.

Jewish Chronicle, Organ of British Jewry, established Nov. 1841.

Joël, M., Blicke in die Religionsgeschichte zu Anfang des zweiten christlichen Jahrhunderts, I - II, Breslau, 1880.

Judaism and Christianity:
   Vol. II: The Contact of Pharisaism with other Cultures, ed. by H. Loewe, London, 1937

Jung, Leo, Yoma, London, 1938.

Kayserling, Moritz, (Jewish Encycl. Vol. III.)

Kellermann, B., (Festschrift zu Hermann Cohens siebzigstem Geburtstage, Berlin, 1912)

Jesus of Nazareth, his life, times and teaching, London, 1925.

Klostermann, E., Das Markusevangelium, Tübingen, 1926.

Das Matthäusevangelium, Tübingen, 1927.

Knox, W. L., (Judaism and Christianity, Vol. II.)
Kohler, Kaufmann, (Judaism at the World's Parliament of Religions, Cincinnati, 1894) (Jewish Encycl., 1901-6)
   Jewish Theology, systematically and historically considered, New York, 1918; (Grundriss einer systematischen Theologie des Judentums auf geschichtlicher Grundlage, Leipzig, 1910)
   The Origins of the Synagogue and the Church, ed. with a biographical essay by H.G.Snelow, New York, 1929.

Kohut, Adolph
   Berühmte israelitische Männer und Frauen in der Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit, Leipzig, (no date), 2 vol.
   (International Review of Missions, July, 1941).

Laible, Heinrich, Jesus Christus im Talmud, Berlin, 1891.

Lake, Kirsopp, (Jewish Studies in Memory of I. Abrahams).

Lazarus, Josephine, (Judaism at the World's Parliament of Religions)

Lehrman, S. M., (Vallentine's Jewish Encycl.)

Lestschinski, (Encycl. Judaica II.)

Leszynsky, Rudolf, Die Sadduzäer, Berlin, 1912.

Levine, Ephraim,  (The Parting of the Roads).
Lichtenstein, J.,  Judaism & Christianity, Engl. by Margaret M. Alison, Edinburgh, 1893.
Lieberman, Saul,  Eine Bitte an die geehrten Leser, Budapest, (no date).
Lightfoot, J. B.,  Greek in Jewish Palestine; Studies in the Life and manners of Jewish Palestine in the II-IV centuries C.E., New York, 1942.
Lindeiskog, Gosta,  Die Jesusfrage im neuzitlichen Judentum, Uppsala, 1933.
Lipshytz, C. T.,  Der Ebionitismus in der Judenmission, oder Christentum und national-juedisches Bewusstsein, Schriften des Institutum Judaicum in Berlin, No. 41.
Loewe, Herbert,  (In Spirit and in Truth)
(Judaism and Christianity, Vols. I & II)
(Vallentine’s Jewish Encycl.)
(A Rabbinic Anthology) see Montefiore.
Lublinski, Samuel,  Das Werdende Dogma vom Leben Jesu, Jena, 1910.
Manson, T. W.,  (Judaism and Christianity, Vol. III)
The Teaching of Jesus, Cambridge, 1935, (2nd. ed.)
Manson, W.  Jesus the Messiah, London, 1943.
(London Quarterly & Holborn Review, July, 1935)
Mattuck, Israel I., What are the Jews? London, 1939. (In Spirit and in Truth)

McCaul, Alex., The Old Paths; or a comparison of the principles & doctrines of Modern Judaism with the religion of Moses and the Prophets London, 1846.

Meyer, Arnold, Die moderne Forschung über die Geschichte des Urchristentums, Freiburg/B., 1898.

"Nathaniel" A missionary magazine founded by Prof. H. L. Strack in 1883.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Niven, W. D.</td>
<td>The Conflicts of the Early Church, London, 1930</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>(The Jewish &amp; the Christian Doctrine of Mediation, Church &amp; Synagogue Quart., Vols. X-XII)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oldham, J. H.</td>
<td>Christianity and the Race Problem, London, 1925</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pearlson, Gustav</td>
<td>Twelve Centuries of Jewish Persecution, Hull, 1927.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Perles, Felix, (Festschrift, Hermann Cohen, Berlin, 1912)
Preuschen, Erwin, Die Apostelgeschichte, Tiibingen, 1912.
Reider, Joseph, (Valentine's Jewish Encycl.)
Resch, Gotthold, Das Aposteldekret nach seinem ausserkanonischen Textgestalt, 1905.
Rosenzweig, Franz., Der Stern der Erlösung, Frankfurt/M., 1921.
Sabatini Raphael, Torquemada and his Spanish Inquisition, London, 1913.
Salvador, J., Jesus-Crist et sa doctrine; histoire de la naissance de l'Eglise, de son organisation et de ses progrès pendant le premier siècle, Tome 1-2, Paris, 1838.

(J. Q. E. Vol. X).

Schlatter, Adolf, Die Tage Trajans und Hadrians, Gütersloh, 1897
Die Kirche Israels vom Jahre 70-130, 1896.
Geschichte Israels von Alexander dem Grossen bis Hadrian, Stuttgart, 1925.

Schmidtke, Alfred, Neue Fragmente und Untersuchungen zu den jüdisch-christlichen Evangelien, Leipzig, 1911, Texte und Untersuchungen, XXXVII.

Schoettgen, J. Chr., Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae in universum Novum Testamentum, Leipzig, 1733.

Schwaab, Emil, Historische Einführung in das Achtzehngebet, (Beiträge zur Förderung christl. Theologie, herausg. A. Schlatter u. W. Lütgert, Heft 5, 1913.)

Silver, A. H., A History of Messianic Speculation in Israel, From the First through the Seventeenth Centuries, New York, 1927.

Simkhovitch, V. G., Toward the Understanding of Jesus, New York, 1937.

Simon, Leon, (Aspects of Hebrew Genius)

Singer, Charles & Dorothea, (The Legacy of Israel)
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sloan, G. L. B.</td>
<td>see Ben-Chorin.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Smith, R.</td>
<td>see Kosmala.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stanton, V. H.</td>
<td>The Jewish &amp; the Christian Messiah, Edinburgh, 1886.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Jesus, die Häretiker und die Christen nach den ältesten jüdischen Angaben, Leipzig, 1910.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The Primitive Church, London, 1929.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trattner, E. R.</td>
<td>As a Jew sees Jesus, New York &amp; London, 1931</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Volz, Paul</td>
<td>Jüdische Eschatologie von Daniel bis Akiba, Tübingen und Leipzig, 1903.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Der Prophet Jeremia, Leipzig, 1928.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wagenmann, Julius</td>
<td>Die Stellung des Apostels Paulus neben den Zwölf in den ersten zwei Jahrhunderten</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wagenseilius, Ch.</td>
<td>Tela Ignea Satanae, etc.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Weiss, Johannes</td>
<td>Das Urchristentum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Werfel, Franz</td>
<td>Barbara oder die Frömmigkeit</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, A. Lukyn</td>
<td>Missions to Jews: A historical Retrospect</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Tractate Berakoth, Mishna &amp; Tosephua, London, 1921.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Windisch, H.</td>
<td>Der Hebräerbrief</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Judaism &amp; Christianity, Cincinnati, 1883.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>World Dominion and the World to-day, An International Review of Christian Progress</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wünsche, August</td>
<td>Pesikta des Rab Kahana</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>York-Steiner, H.</td>
<td>Bibliotheca Rabbinica, Eine Sammlung alter Midrash</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ysander, T.</td>
<td>Die Kunst als Jude zu leben, (Minderheit verpflichtet), Leipzig, 1928</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Studien zum Bästischen Hasidismus</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Note: Brackets indicate the author's contribution to composite works.