Abstract

At the beginning of the twenty first century, thousands of adult Europeans are playing Scotsmen. They dress up in kilts and tartan, parade in military-style bagpipe bands, toss tree trunks at Highland Games, commemorate Scottish soldiers of the past, and re-enact their vision of Scottish history at ‘Celtic’ and medieval fairs. Their largest festivals attract more than 25 000 people each year, and their more elaborate clubs are recognised by Scottish Clan chiefs.

The ‘Scots’ of Europe do not usually claim to be Scottish – neither by birth, descent, or residence. Their performances are Scottish masquerades, and openly declared so. Unlike their cousins in North America and Australasia, the European impersonators only very rarely insist that their Scottish performances express their ‘ethnic’ identity.

And yet, the European masquerade is a quest for roots and ancestors, too. This study demonstrates that by playing Scotsmen, the ‘Scots’ of Europe attempt to reconnect with their Celtic, Nordic, or otherwise pre-modern heritage. They feel that their own customs, songs, games, and tribes were lost to the forces of modernisation – but that some of it survived in the Scottish periphery. They employ Scotland as a site of memory, as ersatz history.

This thesis is a study of European nostalgia. It examines the many men and women who attempt to rediscover their traditions and histories. It is concerned with what Jay Winter calls the ‘memory boom’; the growing public preoccupation with history and its remembrance. It argues that Scotland – or rather, dreams of Scotland – have a special resonance in the European memory boom.

This study touches upon the fields of public history, memory, and festive culture. In order to understand how the past is remembered and re-imagined in Europe today, the author left the archive and questioned the commemorators. This study relies on original fieldwork conducted in Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Scotland during 2009 and 2010. The thesis’ focus is a qualitative one.

INTRODUCTION: THE SCOTS OF EUROPE

1.1 The festive calendar

The Scottish year begins on 25 January. The birthday of Robert Burns (1759-1796) is Scotland’s unofficial national holiday and a set date for the Scots of Europe. Ritual dinners honour the Scottish poet all over the continent; the Caledonian Society of Norway (established 1946) holds its Burns Supper at an Oslo Military Club, the Barcelona Burns Club (est. 2007) assembles some 100 people (half of them Catalan) in the mountain town of Viladrau, and the self-professed Gordon Highlanders (est. 1994) address the haggis in full military regalia in a private cellar bar in Donnerskirchen, a town in Austria’s Burgenland vineyards. Spectacular Burns Nights are also held by international business associations who use the Scottish theme for a night of costumed networking, lubricated by malt whisky. In the capitals of Latvia and Lithuania, Burns Nights were set up by the British Chamber of Commerce, and in the Ukraine, the Kyiv Lions Club invites more than 600 guests to a night of tartanry and charitable fundraising since 1995.¹

February sees the first Scottish stirrings in Flanders. The indoor Schotse Beurs (or Scottish Fair) is held in the city of Ghent since 1978 and attracts more than 10 000 people each year with its Highland dancing, whisky tastings, and a fashion show called Dressed to Kill(t). Behind the fair stands the Vlaams Caledonische Society, a club of 650 ‘Scots-minded’ Flemings.² February also is the time for one of Europe’s premium bagpipe events. In Denmark, dozens of pipers and drummers muster at Copenhagen Winter Competition (est. 1973).³ Kilted musicians also take the streets of Paris in February during the Ecosse à Montmartre festival (est. 2001).⁴

In March, the observer may spot wild Highlanders wearing demonic masks in the Swiss city of Basel. Schotteclique is a carnival crew with a Scottish theme that some consider a highlight of Basler Fasnacht, Switzerland’s most lively weekend of carnival. The revellers adopted kilts and self-made bagpipes in 1947, apparently inspired by a Scottish regimental pipe band stationed in South-Western Germany after World War II.⁵ In April, France Celtic Tartan Day is held since 2002; the 2009 edition took place at Tréport, a coastal town in Haute-Normandie. The festival attracted several thousand spectators and featured a beauty pageant for male kilt wearers (‘championnats de France de porteurs de kilts’). The French Tartan Day – inspired by the American Tartan Day, a newly invented celebration of Scottish culture and heritage (est. 1998) – is promoted by Breton nationalists who wear registered Breton tartans and seek to imbue their ‘Celtic’ nationalism with Scottish energy.\(^6\)

In May, the Highland Games season begins. One of the largest events is Highland Gathering Peine (est. 1995), a Scottish spectacle held in the flat lands of Lower Saxony, Germany. It regularly draws crowds of 20,000 people.\(^7\) Peine is one of more than 130 Highland Games which take place across Northern and Western Europe every year. The games are mostly found in rural areas, and organisers include leather-clad motor bikers from Austria’s Styrian mountains (Kammerner Highland Games, est. 2008), fellows of a Dutch provincial Rotary Club (Velsen Highland Games, est. 1998), cattle farmers in Eastern Germany (Schottisches Weidefest Prießnitz, est. 1999), and an eccentric Norwegian blacksmith who holds the world’s northernmost Highland Games in the town of Snefjord (est. 2006), in Finnmark county, far above the Arctic circle.\(^8\)

The summer months see a flurry of Scottish activity. One important event is Scotfest in Tilburg, Netherlands (est. 2005), a festival that commemorates the Scottish soldiers who helped to liberate the Netherlands from Nazi occupation in 1944. The non-ticketed event had more than 30,000 guests in 2008. It featured Highland Games, pipe bands, medieval re-enactment shows – ‘everything one can associate with Scotland’, as the organisers explain.\(^9\) But the will to remember historical links to Scotland also reaches into the depths of the more distant past. The Fêtes Franco-Ecossaises (est. 1990) in Aubigny-sur-Nère, France, have musicians, re-enactors and city officials parade in kilts to proudly commemorate their town’s special position in the Auld Alliance, the medieval military pact between France and Scotland.\(^10\) In the Hessian town of Schotten, Germany, a Schottisches Mittsommerfest (est. 2003) recalls the Irish-Scottish missionary presence in Europe which presumably gave the town its name.\(^11\) And at Schotse Dagen in Ooidonk, Belgium (est. 2000), Flemish Clan societies remember their ancestors who, they insist, were among the Norman invaders who colonised Scotland in the eleventh century.\(^12\) To them, the modern Scots are their descendants, and they express this conviction by wearing kilts and tossing cabers.

The Scottish year calms down in October. The fine mercenaries of Mackay’s Regiment of Foote (est. 2002, Germany) may be seen re-fighting the Thirty Years’ War in belted plaid. The Malta Military Tattoo (est. 2004) is held at the Malta Fairs and Conventions Centre at Ta’ Qali, featuring Malta’s own Wallace Pipes and Drums (est. 1999).\(^13\) In November, the Warsaw Caledonian Society (est. 1996) hosts a Caledonian Ball in the Polish capital which draws expatriates of all kinds. In December, an Italian pipe band marches through Firenze’s old town, calling people to the Mercato Scozzese on Piazza Santa Maria Novella. In Austria, the First Carinthian Highlanders (est. 1984) go skiing in their kilts.\(^14\)

1.2 The Scots of Europe

At the beginning of the twenty first century, thousands of adult Europeans regularly impersonate the Scots. They dress up in Scottish costume, play Scottish music, engage in Scottish athletics – they adopt Scottish folklore. In 2010, more than 130 Highland Games were held throughout Northern and Western Europe, and at least 230 kilted pipe and drum bands marched proudly at village festivals and in military parades. The ‘Scots’ of Europe also re-enact selected moments of Scottish history in armour and chainmail, and they campaign for the commemoration of the historical links between Scotland and their own countries. Some join Scottish Clan societies or invent their own Clans, designing new tartans and heraldry. Some approach Clan chiefs in Scotland and North America with requests for recognition. The Scots of Europe\textsuperscript{15} are quite visibly crazy about Scotland.

The Scottish playacting phenomenon began after World War II and intensified since the late 1980s. It is not indicative of a new Scottish presence in mainland Europe. Only a tiny fraction of the European enthusiasts consider themselves Scottish by birth, residence, or ancestry. Their performances are Scottish masquerades, and openly declared so. Most Europeans are happy to concede that there are ‘real’ Scots out there, somewhere across the North Sea, and some would even be interested in meeting them.

In general, however, the Scots of Europe care remarkably little for modern Scotland, the place on the map. Only very few playactors re-enact modern Scotland; the Royal Bank of Scotland’s downfall in the recent economic crisis, British devolution politics, the North Sea oil rush of the 1980s, or everyday life in Glasgow council houses.\textsuperscript{16} The Scotland that is on their minds is a Scotland of the past. It is a Highland land of Celts, kilts, Clans, and bagpipes. It is the Scottish dreamscape, a well-established romantic fantasy of Scottish history.\textsuperscript{17} Even if some playactors are interested in the twentieth-century Scottish regiments who fought in Europe in both World Wars, it is usually their pseudo-historical Highland uniforms and pipe bands which inspire them.

The Scots of Europe are looking for history. They are agents in what the historian Jay Winter calls the ‘memory boom’ – a growing public interest in the past and its commemoration.\textsuperscript{18} To be sure, nostalgia has been a key feature of Western thought for the past 250 years. The conviction that something important was left behind with progress and modernisation is at the heart of modernity itself.\textsuperscript{19} And yet, there is evidence that nostalgia, the formerly rather exclusive privilege of the rich and idle, has grown into a mass sentiment in the second half of the twentieth century.\textsuperscript{20} As is explored in more detail in Chapter 2, the past decades have seen a spread of public interest in history, its remembrance, and conservation. Many thousands in the West and beyond turn towards the past to re-inform themselves about who they are and were. They seek to stabilise and root their identities – identities which they perceive have suffered in the recent turbulent times. The agents of the memory boom cast mooring lines into the past. They summon the past as a back-up archive.

Such identity rooting comes in both escapist and aggressive forms. Many history enthusiasts dream up worlds of warmth and safety. They recreate the assumed communal snugness of ‘traditional societies’, tribes and clans. They reactivate a lost spirituality. But others invoke history in more militant ways. They recall the past to defend it. They fight what they feel is an obliteration of cultural diversity by the forces of globalisation. They oppose a society or nation state which they feel does not acknowledge their historical difference. The soaring right-wing parties of Northern and Western Europe rely in important ways on invocations of history and historical uniqueness. In twenty-first century Europe, the memory boom often becomes a rearguard action against the perceived loss of identity.

The memory boom is also about money and pleasure. Only the high degree of post-war affluence allows thousands of men and women to pursue their historical interests, be it as consumers of history films and magazines, as tourists, collectors, and re-enactors, or as amateur genealogists and historians. History has become a commodity (often labelled ‘heritage’) in the leisure market.\(^21\) Interestingly, anti-modern yearning and advanced technology often fuse; historical counter-worlds are created with sophisticated special effects, local culture is marketed in thoroughly global ways. Nostalgia is a mass demand, and the past is commodified to meet it.

For many or most Europeans, the search for roots and history proves surprisingly difficult. The past may turn out to be lost, forgotten, no longer taught at school. It may also look different than expected, less reassuring than is wished for. And it may come with historical baggage, if its heroes and myths have been misused by monstrous politics in the past.\(^22\) Many Europeans feel the urge of the memory boom but have nowhere to turn to. They require a substitute, ersatz history.

In Northern and Western Europe, a stunning number of Europeans claim to recognise their own lost history in the costumes and customs of the Scots. In mythologies of kinship, they turn the Scots into relatives, guardians of a shared European past. The Scots of Europe feel that their ancestors’ songs and rituals may have been lost to the forces of modernisation, urbanisation, and secularisation – but they insist that some of their heritage survived in the Scottish periphery. Scotland becomes a reservoir of history, a place where Celtic, Nordic or otherwise pre-modern traditions stood their ground. By playing Scotsmen, the Europeans hope to recover and reactivate something of their own identity. The Scotland of their imagination serves as a site of memory.\(^23\)

This study examines why so many Europeans choose to re-root their identities in the Scottish dreamscape, of all possible historical counter-worlds. Three hypotheses lead the way:

\(^{22}\) Such ‘difficult heritage’ can have its own place in the memory boom, see Sharon Macdonald, Difficult Heritage. Negotiating the Nazi Past in Nuremberg and Beyond (London: Routledge, 2009).

Chapter 1 – Introduction

1) The Scottish dreamscape is familiar. It does not need to be re-invented or dug out of dusty archives. It may be sapped from a variety, some would say: an exuberance of novels, films, plays, poems, paintings, photographs etc. Invented or not, the Scotsman with his kilt, bagpipe, and tartan is an internationally familiar figure (on Scotswomen, see below). The Scottish dreamscape was spread by two of the most powerful forces of the past two centuries; the British Empire and American popular culture. From the poems of Ossian (1760-63) and Sir Walter Scott’s historical novels (c. 1814-1824) to the celluloid magic of Brigadoon (1953) and Braveheart (1995), Scotland has been internationally re-imagined for more than 200 years – while real Scotsmen, embodiments of the myth, fought for Britain with kilts and pipes at Waterloo (1815), the Crimean War (1853-56), Passchendaele (1912), and the beaches of Normandy (1944). The Scottish dreamscape is a thoroughly globalised fantasy of a local identity.

2) The Scottish dreamscape is fun. To impersonate a Scot means to adopt his noise and colours, to stun and awe audiences, to be a marching, martial spectacle. Scottish costume – with its bright tartans, regimental splendour, and the vaguely erotic kilt – causes excitement with its extravagant mixture of militarism and comedy. There is something highly theatrical about the Scots – a fact that was and still is appreciated by many Scots themselves. Scots have dressed up ‘as themselves’ in the past when styling their Highland regiments for the military market in the eighteenth and nineteenth century, and they continue to do so when taking the stage as ‘Scotch’ entertainers or attending football matches with the costumed Tartan Army. The Scottish costume also conveys license. To wear it means to reconnect with one’s ‘inner Scot’ – a loud, wild, and happy chap, unconstrained by trousers and the civilising process. The Scottish dreamscape is a place to go wild.

3) The Scottish dreamscape is heroic. The philosopher Charles Taylor identifies the loss of a heroic dimension to life as one key malaise of modernity. Scottish masquerade is an antidote to this malaise, a re-enactment of lost heroism. More importantly, Scottish heroism is underdog heroism, ‘charged’ with myths of victimhood, innocence, and just defence. Most European playactors see Scotland as a culture that had to heroically protect her historical distinctiveness against foreign dominance and colonialism since at least the Middle Ages. Quite often, they can relate to this experience. They, too, feel marginalised by their governments, their fellow citizens, even by non-European immigrants, globalisation, American popular culture, and the dissolving of ‘traditional’ gender roles. The Scottish warrior-ancestors they summon and impersonate are spirits of defence. At the beginning of the twenty first century, old Europe – rich, overweight, aging, and scared by immigration from the South and East – is receptive for mythologies of victimhood and defence.

1.3 Scope and aims

This is not a study about Scotland, but one about dreams of Scotland. If there exists a ‘more real’ Scotland than the neverland of kilts, Celts, and Clans (and some authoritative Scottish scholars doubt it), it will not be dealt with in these pages.

This thesis has a qualitative focus. Who are the Scots of Europe? When did they begin to perform as Scotsmen? What is the nature of their games and festivals? What is it that they gain by playing Scotsmen? Why did they choose Scotland?

This study documents the history of Scottish playacting in continental Europe. The self-professed Scots first appeared after World War II. They were largely inspired by the kilted regiments who fought in Western Europe or were stationed there after 1945. The first continental Scots were pipers and drummers who imitated British (and Canadian) military bands. We find the first European pipe bands in Switzerland (1947), the Netherlands (1953), Flanders (1950s), Western Germany (1960s), and Scandinavia (1960s/1970s). Scottish piping intensified with the folk music revival of the 1970s and fused with newly established historical re-enactment clubs, Clan societies, commemorative efforts, and Highland Games in the 1990s. Popular enthusiasm for Scotland was boosted by successful Hollywood films such as Highlander (1986) and Braveheart (1995) and by Romance novels like Diane Gabaldon’s Outlander series (1991) (see Chapter 4). Also, the internet bound hitherto marginal interests into substantial subcultures.

The Scots of Europe are no pan-continental movement but at home in the North and West; almost no Scottish masquerade can be found south of the Alps and east of the Polish-German border.27 Scottish playacting thus is a largely German-, Dutch-, and French-speaking phenomenon. Why does the North-West take a special interest in Scottish warrior dreams? Germany and the German-speaking world have a special need for ersatz history. The Nazi misuse of Germanic folklore has tarnished German heroic heritage and made its celebration problematic for most Germans. As this thesis demonstrates, the Scots provide a substitute. Furthermore, the North-West is Europe’s most affluent, secular, and technologically advanced area. It is furthest removed from the pre-modern wildness popularly associated with Scotland. If there is a ‘disenchanted’ Europe in the sense of Max Weber, it is here.28 The Scottish dreamscape – with its promise of ritual, tradition, and Clan sociability – strikes a special chord in the North-West, while in the South, familial networks and the Church perhaps still provide a rest of communal warmth and ritual. This is a crude generalisation, and the author is well aware that a tower block in Athens or Madrid can be far less cosy than a Bavarian village. Still, there seems to be less demand for new tribes in the South.

Who are the Scots of Europe? To be sure, they are a motley crowd. In the course of research, the author has come across grey-haired military veterans and teenage girls, dangerous-looking biker-types and evangelical missionaries, militaria collectors and hippies in pseudo-medieval robes, chain-smoking private bankers from Paris and pitchfork-wielding farmers from Tyrol, local politicians and local anarchists, as well as butchers, policemen, 27 Scandinavia is a special case. While there are many kilted pipe bands and some commemorative festivals, there is hardly any interest in Highland Games and historical re-enactment. See Chapters 5 and 6.

publicans, and artists. The two characteristics they all shared were that they dressed up as Scottish Highlanders and that they had enough time and money to do so. They also were an overwhelmingly white community; the crowds at their festivals did not reflect the multi-ethnic populations of North-Western Europe.

This study examines the European memory boom. It explores practices of remembrance, re-enactment, and celebration – how history (and dreams of history) are approached in the public domain. What other national histories then are celebrated and appropriated in Europe? Is there anything like the Scots of Europe?

Curiously, it appears that there is not. There is no Irish, Swiss, Latvian, or Catalan equivalent to Scottish playacting. No other living European people are imitated the way the Scots are. True, Irish pubs are copied in thousands of towns and cities, and German Christmas markets and Oktoberfests are set up on an increasingly global level. However, these themed restaurants and fairs lack the participative thrill of Scottish playacting, its year-round inspirational force and symbolic complexity. Yes, there are St Patrick’s Day parades and Irish music festivals in Europe, but their usually plain-dressed audiences are nothing which would equate 20 000 Flemings wearing kilts, tossing cabers, and singing ‘Scotland the Brave’. The Scottish dreamscape has a unique resonance in Europe.

The situation changes if we turn to outer-European peoples. The Scots of Europe recall the many Western impersonations of allegedly ‘primitive’ peoples. The practice of ‘ethnomasquerade’ – the imitation of non-European peoples by whites for reasons of entertainment and/or colonial control – has a long pedigree both in Europe and North America. Africans, Native Americans, and Middle Eastern people have been copied by Western stage comedians, hobbyists, soldiers, and children since at least the eighteenth century. There is a complex interplay of adoration and destruction in such mimesis, as Homi K. Bhabha and Edward Said have noted. The exotic nature of the primitive is a reason for both excitement, praise of the noble savage’s naturalness and purity, but also for subjugation and forced civilisation.

Do the Scots of Europe constitute a case of ethnomasquerade? They do so partly. Yes, they consist of white, affluent amateurs who impersonate an exotic warrior culture for pleasure and with the hope of reconnecting to their own lost heroic roots. Yes, they strongly remind of the Indian hobbyists described by Christian F. Feest and others (see Chapter 2.3). And yet, Highlandism differs from Orientalism and Indian playacting in at least one important point: The Scots are indigenous primitives, European savages, white Indians. There is a strong tendency of introspection among the Scots of Europe. The European playactors are convinced that their memories of savage freedom need be found not out there (from where the immigrants come) but at home, in Europe. Consequently, we find the Scots of Europe 29 Stunningly, the global history of the Irish pub still needs to be written. Such a work would have to note that a German company appears to be the world’s largest producer of Irish pub fittings, and that the Russian mafia laundered money through Irish pubs in Moscow and Saint Petersburg in the 1990s.

much more often among medieval, Viking, Celtic, and Roman re-enactors than at the surviving Native American clubs and Wild West fun parks.\(^{33}\)

The Scots of Europe’s closest relatives live in North America and Australasia. There, large groups of enthusiasts regularly dress up in Scottish costume, participate at Highland Games, play in kilted pipe bands, join Clan societies.\(^{34}\) These are \textit{roots re-enactors}. Like their European cousins, they are not too interested in modern Scotland. They cherish dreams of Scottish history. The main difference is that the Americans and Australians \textit{consider themselves Scottish}. While Europeans consciously engage in a masquerade, their overseas counterparts claim to express their ‘ethnic’ identities by wearing kilts and tossing cabers. They are agents in what Matthew Frye Jacobson calls the ‘white ethnic revival’, a thriving interest in ethnic roots and identities among white Americans (and Canadians, Australians, New Zealanders, South Africans etc) that has intensified since the 1970s.\(^{35}\)

And yet, this distinction may be less dividing than it appears. Some of the most splendid Highlanders at U.S. Highland Games and bagpipe festivals have no ancestral links to Scotland. Documented Scottish ancestry is no requirement for joining the Scottish-American community, as the work of Rowland Berthoff and Celeste Ray shows.\(^{36}\) Even those who \textit{do} have documented roots in Scotland must choose to celebrate these roots (and to ignore their other ‘ethnic options’).\(^{37}\) Scottish performance and play does not evolve ‘naturally’ out of an ethnic background. It requires effort. As will become apparent again and again in this study, a successful Scottish performance is always an issue of commitment, not blood – and this on both sides of the Atlantic. The world of North American roots re-enactors will serve as a comparative canvas in the subsequent chapters.

The Scots of Europe are playing Scotsmen. The Scottish dreamscape is gendered, the Scottish dreamscape is male. There are no costumes for female Scots. The kilt is a male garment, the bagpipe a military instrument, Highland Games a world of manly athletics, Clans a sociality of patrilineal authority. At all European Scottish festivals, the kilted male is at the centre of attention. And yet, this does not mean that women are absent. They are there, impersonating Scottish men in pipe bands and wearing military uniforms in re-enactment clubs. They also invent their own female costumes and identities, expanding the Scottish dreamscape. And they dress up their men, encouraging them to perform as manly Highlanders for their pleasure. The Scottish dreamscape is a site of male heroism, but women participate in its re-enactment.

1.4 Methods

In order to examine both ongoing phenomena and the past to which they connect, this study employs a mixed methodology, a combination of ethnographic fieldwork (observation, participant-observation, interviews) and text-based research.

Fieldwork was essential to capture the present-day Scottish playacting reality. To find out how history (and myths of history) are remembered, imagined, and re-enacted in the public domain at the beginning of the twenty first century, the researcher left the archives and approached the commemorators. This study insists that the qualitative research methods of ethnography may be fruitfully employed by historians. 38

In the twenty-first-century memory boom, history is increasingly performed and practiced. History enthusiasts exhibit the past in museums, campaign for monuments, march in commemorative parades, even re-enact the past theatrically. As is demonstrated in Chapter 2, there is a strong performative dimension to the surging public interest in the past. So far, these cultural practices are only very rarely studied by historians. While oral narratives of past events have become a valued source for the historical discipline 39, present-day practices of remembrance are still largely ignored and left to sociologists and social anthropologists. This is a pity. In a time when many thousands of amateurs celebrate, re-enact, and commemorate the past in public, historians could contribute to the analysis of this phenomenon by stepping into the 'theatres of memory'. 40 Ethnography offers a toolkit to record and interpret the cultural practices of the memory boom.

The Scots of Europe are a prime example of public history. 41 This is not a study of the many people who hold Scotland dear in private. The Scots of Europe celebrate the Scottish dreamscape loudly and visibly. Festivals are their main activity and purpose. To play Scotsmen means to partake in Highland Games, bagpipe contests, commemorative events, street parades, and battle re-enactments. It means to exhibit looks and skills in front of an audience. True, many playactors practice in private for their shows, and the author did attend, in no systematic way, a number of non-public band rehearsals, dance workshops, and costume-making sessions. Still, it is at festivals where the Scots of Europe truly come alive. In order to understand what playing Scotsmen is about, the author attended eight multi-day Scottish festivals, six in Europe and two in Scotland. More than 80 interviews were conducted at these events.

40 Winter, Remembering War, 289.

Fieldwork took place in the Netherlands (Keltfest, Dordrecht), Germany (Machern Highland Games, near Leipzig, Saxony), France (Fêtes Franco-Ecossaises, Aubigny-sur-Nère, Cher), Belgium (Schotse Weekend Alden Biesen, Bilzen, Flanders), Switzerland (Basel Tattoo and Pipefest, City of Basel), and Northern Italy (South Tyrolean Highland Games, Pfalzen) during the summer of 2009. The attended events are indicative of the festival circuit; the sample includes long-established (Belgium, Germany) and newly created events (Italy, Switzerland), urban (Switzerland, Netherlands) and rural celebrations (France, Belgium, Germany), large-scale (Belgium, Germany, Switzerland), medium-sized (Netherlands, France), and intimate festivals (Italy), and the three main language-groups which engage with Scottish playacting (German, Dutch, French). The events are located both in traditionally protestant (Flanders, Netherlands, Switzerland) and in catholic areas (France, Italy), and they include the four major forms of Scottish playacting; music (Belgium, Switzerland), athletics (Italy, Germany), historical commemoration (France), and re-enactment (Netherlands). The two festivals attended in Scotland were The Gathering in Edinburgh during the Homecoming Scotland campaign in July 2009 and the much more intimate Mackenzie Clan Gathering in Strathpeffer, Easter Ross, in August 2010. Both events attracted European participants.

The author decided against producing a neatly focused study of only German Scots, Flemish Scots, or Swiss Scots. The intention was not to produce the definitive work on Highland Games in Upper Austria, 1995-2010, because such a study, while perhaps more complete in its understanding of the community in question, would miss one of the Scottish playacting scene’s essential characteristics; its transnational spread. Not to approach the Scottish festival circuit as a European phenomenon would mean to ignore its very nature.

The author employed the methods of a ‘multi-sited’ ethnography. He conducted research in a field that was neither a geographically bound single site nor a place where a community engaged in everyday life. Like his informants, he travelled to selected sites of celebration, observed, interviewed, and interacted for a limited amount of time, and then returned home. The encounter was brief, but intense. He studied festive outbursts, not daily routine. His fieldwork took place in a ‘liminoid’ zone (Victor Turner), a place beyond the boundaries of normality. There was no ‘living’ with the Scots of Europe.

In the multi-sited field, the author approached his informants from several angles, namely with participant-observation, silent observation, and qualitative interviews. He chose this strategy to obtain both experiential knowledge (how do they celebrate Scotland, how does it feel?) as well as intellectual knowledge (why do they do it, when did they begin?). Participation in the field was limited, observation extensive; the fact that most celebrants wore costumes and constantly posed for photographs greatly facilitated a more or less uninvolved observation.

45 ‘observation can, like participation, be carried out covertly. For a social scientist to observe crowds in this way, say at football matches, seems unobjectionable’. Bechhofer & Paterson, Research Design, 93. For examples, see
In order to obtain background information, oral histories, and self-explanations, the author conducted some 80 semi-structured qualitative interviews which were held before, during, and after the festivals. Informants included musicians, athletes, commemorators, re-enactors as well as Clan chiefs, Highland dancers, society presidents, souvenir vendors, and bagpipe competition referees. The author usually contacted the festival organisers in advance but then approached other informants spontaneously, reacting to their performances. The interviews lasted between 20 and 80 minutes and were held in English, German, French, and Russian. Questions concerned the origins of the informants’ enthusiasm (why Scotland, how did it begin?), the form of their commitment (what is it that you do? how often do you become a Scot?), and the meaning of their doing (what is the pleasure of being a Scot? how would you describe a Scot in three words?).

The interviews were recorded digitally, and written permission to use them in this thesis and in related academic publications was granted. Sound files and transcripts are in the possession of the author and may be accessed upon request. In due time, the materials will be deposited at the University of Edinburgh’s Institute of Governance archive.

Most interviews were conducted one on one, although several group interviews took place with pipe bands and re-enactment units. The interviews were on the unstructured side; while the author had prepared questions, the discussions often veered away from them. The interviewer aimed at being non-directive; he encouraged the informants to talk freely and intervened rarely. Apart from the 80 ‘official’ interviews, the author also held an uncounted number of non-recorded fieldwork conversations which helped him to better understand the events he attended. Only interviews actually cited in this study are listed in the bibliography.

To ensure that the fieldwork sample would not miss essential patterns, the author obtained a control sample via an online questionnaire. The link to the 40-question-survey was sent via e-mail to some 300 festival organisers whose events the author was unable to visit in person. In total, 120 questionnaires were filled out. A sample questionnaire is reproduced in the appendix. In addition to the questionnaires, the author had some 100 e-mail conversations with Scottish activists who preferred to write freely rather than to fill out a structured form. The total of some 220 written statements assured the author that his fieldwork sample was indicative of the transnational playacting phenomenon. Finally, the author also analysed a wealth of printed flyers, programmes, leaflets, brochures, souvenirs, and self-published books which he picked up at the festivals or which organisers and activists sent to Edinburgh via electronic and physical mail.

The author’s own relationship to Scotland was of great interest to almost all his informants. Many were disappointed when I confessed that I am in no way Scottish or of Scottish descent. I grew up in the city of Zurich, my mother is Swiss, my father of German extraction. Not even a twig in my family tree points towards Scotland. However, being heavy-set and wearing a reddish beard, I was often presumed to be a Scot when attending Scottish festivals. In South Tyrol, Italy, I was made an ad-hoc member of the jury at a ‘Mister Highlander beauty pageant’ and announced, before I could help it, as ‘a true Scotsman from...

Edinburgh’. Whenever I had the chance to explain my non-Scottishness, I was asked (with a degree of suspicion) why I cared to study the Scots and the people who play Scots. I replied that I was fascinated by ideas so strong that they create communities, even large-scale celebration, and that I did not care about blood, but about commitment. Sometimes I admitted that I was not without fondness for dreams of a world more colourful, a life less ordinary.

However, it should be made very clear that this is not a study of my friends. I have never been a member in a Scottish Clan, never active in a re-enactment group, never been an athlete at a Highland Games competition, and never been spotted wearing a kilt. (Nor, for that matter, have I ever in my adult life dressed up as a Native American, a medieval knight, or as William Tell.) I faced the Scots of Europe as an outsider. Also, I did not attempt to become one of them, as perhaps a social anthropologist might have done. Instead of becoming a Scot, I consciously (and not without pleasure) played the nerdy researcher; the man who could not toss the caber, the guy in plain clothes, the student who did not know a thing about the passion of being Scottish. In this position, I was able to ask questions I would not have been able to ask had I been a Scot, a real or an imagined one. This state has been called ‘the stranger’s licence to ask questions’.48

This study treats the Scots of Europe as musicians, re-enactors, commemorators, and athletes. However, they are German, Austrian, French, even Flemish, Bavarian, and Parisian, too. Almost everywhere the author went he ended up discussing local politics and history.
Being Swiss, I understood my informants from the Alpine world rather quicker than the ones from central France or Flanders. Also, I was able to address the Germans, Swiss, French, Austrians, Russians and some of the Belgians in their mother tongues, while with most of the Dutch, Flemish, Czech, Danish, Finnish, Norwegians, and Swedish I had to resort to English.
These limitations in mind, I would still like to argue that the Scots of Europe have a number of transnational features and local peculiarities which this study was able to identify.

All this said, fieldwork was not enough. The contemporary enthusiasm for the Scottish dreamscape has a deeper history which could not be uncovered with fieldwork or in interviews. While the continental pipe bands and Clan societies described in this study do not predate the year 1945, the ideas which inspire them are much older. Twenty-first-century Scottish playacting draws depth and energy from a European and Western tradition of dreaming Scottish dreams, and this tradition dates back to at least the late eighteenth century, to the beginnings of European Romanticism. This study explores how contemporary celebrations of Scotland build upon historical Scottish fantasies. It relies on the rich and interdisciplinary body of scholarly literature that deals with the international representation of Scotland, today and in the past. Chapters 3 and 4 evaluate this literature.

1.5 Structure

Chapters 2 to 4 rely on text-based research. Chapter 2 establishes the cultural context in which the Scottish playacting phenomenon evolved – the memory boom. It makes use of some of the seminal texts on memory, nostalgia, celebration, and ethnomasquerade, particularly the imitation of Native Americans in Europe and America. It is important to understand that Scotland – the Scottish dreamscape – is one of several heroic counter-worlds. This study employs much scholarly literature on self-proclaimed Native Americans and medieval knights, Orientalism and ‘Celticism’. It also bears in mind that nostalgia for roots is not limited to Europe and that forms of Scottish playacting may be found in many parts of North America and Australasia. This study maintains a comparative dimension throughout.

Chapters 3 and 4 examine the ‘Scotland’ which is on the European playactors’ minds. It is hardly ever modern Scotland, the place on the map, but much more often a fantasy of the Scottish past – the Scottish dreamscape. Chapter 3 examines the Scottish dreamscape’s history. It approaches the eighteenth and nineteenth-century process best known as Highlandism; the association of Scotland with the aesthetics and supposed characteristics of her Highland periphery. It is crucial to see that poets and politicians declared Scotland a land of history and tradition at a time of rapid industrialisation, urbanisation, and social change. From the beginning, the Scottish dreamscape was designed as a site of memory, a remedy against progress and civilisation.

Chapter 4 explores how the dreamscape was spread via the channels of the British Empire and American popular culture. It employs some of the seminal works on Scotland’s representations and includes fresh readings of original sources. The chapter identifies four key carriers which helped to disseminate the Scottish aesthetic across the world, namely literature, the Highland regiments, music hall entertainment, and Hollywood film. A fifth section addresses the issue of female agency in the creation and spread of the Scottish Highland aesthetic.

Chapters 5 to 9 document the Scots of Europe. The chapters rely on original fieldwork conducted in 2009 and 2010. They shed some light on the different forms of Scottish playacting, on musicians, athletes, commemorators, and historical re-enactors. Chapter 5 approaches the world of piping and drumming. It presents the many kilted pipe bands which are active on the European continent at the beginning of the twenty first century. It first examines how the bagpipe came to be internationally associated with Scotland. It assembles some key figures and dates for the continental pipe bands. And it finally turns to two of the main motivations behind Scottish piping in Europe, the imitation of soldiers and the search for European traditional music.

Chapter 6 explores the continental Highland Games circuit. It first provides some historical background on the Highland Games tradition, how it evolved and spread over the past centuries. It then presents key data for the European Games and asks about the main differences and similarities between Scottish and continental Games. It then demonstrates that many of the European Highland Games athletes seek to rediscover their own Celtic or tribal tradition by performing as Highlanders.
Chapter 1 – Introduction

The pipers and athletes examined in Chapters 5 and 6 do not imitate the past. They perform in what they hope are old but living Scottish traditions. Commemorators and historical re-enactors have a different aim. They seek to recreate the past in the present. Chapter 7 investigates commemorations of Scottish history. It provides two case studies from France and Flanders as well as an overview of the many European commemorative events which usually attempt to remember historical links between Scotland and North-Western Europe. It specifically asks about the moments of Scottish-European history which are most commonly commemorated and considered meaningful.

Chapter 8 turns to the practice of historical re-enactment. It first traces the historical re-enactment hobby back to the late 1960s. It then turns to the Scottish genre, the dozens of continental groups which specialise in Scottish history. It finally addresses the thorny issue of authenticity, the re-enactors’ efforts to separate myth from fact. Most re-enactors strive to reconstruct the past ‘as it really happened’ – a creed which leads them into trouble when falling in love with the Scottish dreamscape.

In Chapter 9, the Scots of Europe come to Scotland. The chapter first examines the official Scottish approach towards international fans of Scotland, in particular the Scottish Government’s recent efforts to connect with the Scottish ‘diaspora’. It explores the 2009 Homecoming Scotland campaign and the concept of ‘Affinity Scots’. The chapter then turns to Clanship as a zone of contact and interaction. It emerges that there are zones of ‘real’ Highlandism in Scotland, places where playactors may authenticate their pseudo-historical Scottish fantasies. Chapter 9 then focuses on The Gathering, the Homecoming campaign’s centrepiece festival which took place in Edinburgh in 2009.

Chapter 10 identifies some of the main reasons for the Scottish dreamscape’s special resonance in Northern and Western Europe. Why do the continental history enthusiasts direct their playful energy towards the Scottish dreamscape, and not towards any other pseudo-historical fantasy? Why Scotland? This chapter argues that the Scotland of popular imagination is ‘charged’ with four key themes which have a particular currency in Northern and Western Europe at the beginning of the twenty first century. These are the themes of tradition, resistance, victimhood, and masculinity.
Chapter 2

CONTEXT: PLAYING THE PAST

The post-war European fascination with Scotland emerged in a specific context. This chapter examines the broad cultural currents which inspire and shape Scottish playacting. The Scots of Europe are 1) agents in the memory boom, a time of heightened public interest in the past and its commemoration. They 2) strive for physical and affective experience; they have a sensuous approach to history. And they 3) choose to appropriate someone else’s past; their performances are a masquerade.

2.1 Memory Boom: Rooting the Present

The Scots of Europe are Scots from the past. They uphold musical, athletic, and sartorial traditions which they believe are rooted in distant Scottish history. They honour the memory of a historical Scottish presence in Europe, and they re-enact selected moments of the Scottish past, from Iron Age Celts to twentieth-century British soldiers. Their interest in contemporary Scotland is limited. The Scots of Europe are agents in what the historian Jay Winter calls the memory boom; a public preoccupation with the past, its preservation and interpretation that has intensified and spread at the end of the twentieth century.¹

The memory boom is manifest in a variety of forms. It shows in the Unesco listings of world heritage sites, the growing numbers of museums and historical exhibitions, their importance in cultural tourism.² It works through the pseudo-historical fantasylands enjoyed by millions of readers and moviegoers in the age of Harry Potter.³ It is evident in the countless commemorative plaques and memorials, watches and marches, minutes of silence – rituals of remembrance which may concern the recent and distant past. It is manifest in the roots phenomenon, the still spreading fascination with ancestors and ethnic identities in North America and Australasia. And it shows in the many European quests for local and national histories, the flood of TV documentaries and cover stories which search for the origins of ‘the Germans’ or ‘the British’, or which try to recreate the lives of earlier generations.⁴

The memory boom is not about private recollections. It is a quest for ‘collective memory’, a shared past which both unites a community and sets it apart from others.⁵ Those active in the memory boom usually focus on what the historian Pierre Nora calls ‘sites of memory’ (lieux de mémoire); physical and metaphorical points of collective significance.⁶ Such sites are locations where a nation or a people can agree that their ‘memory crystallizes and secretes itself’.⁷ Nora produced an influential listing of French memory sites in the 1980s which inspired many other catalogues of regional, national, and transnational memory places in the past twenty years.⁸ These listings – sometimes jingoist inventories of national glory and sometimes careful analyses of the key historical moments, places, and ideas which occupy a national discourse – are both a symptom and a description of the European memory boom. Nora saw the West enter a new ‘era of commemoration’.⁹

The memory boom targets a past which formed communal identity in decisive ways. It searches for a history that has left an imprint, a legacy. ‘Heritage’ is thus at the core of the memory boom. Heritage denotes an ‘inheritance’ from those who lived before us; the legends, practices, and places which have made and still make a community unique.¹⁰ According to David Lowenthal, almost everything may be declared a part of heritage: ‘family history, buildings and landscapes, prehistory and antiques, music and paintings, plants and animals, language and folklore – ranging from remote to recent times’.¹¹ It is important that these things define the community, be it tribe, region, or nation. Of course, such defining heritage is largely constructed in the present, retrospectively, to fulfil its cohesive mission; it exaggerates, denies, and twists in order to ‘assert a primacy, an ancestry, a continuity’.¹²

Heritage and collective memory are key concepts for historians, social anthropologists, and sociologists at the beginning of twenty first century.¹³ While there remain some interesting semantic differences, both concepts seek to describe the same phenomenon; a meaningful past that is pursued and imagined by groups of people, usually non-historians, eager to stabilise and root their present-day identities.¹⁴

It is NOT used for the products of the ‘heritage industry’, the artefacts and souvenirs which seek to cash in on the demand for heritage. ¹⁴ ‘Heritage’, for instance, may be advertised as a tourist attraction ('Come and experience Ireland’s heritage'), while it would (as yet) be unusual to sell 'Ireland’s memory' to paying guests.
The memory boom is not an entirely new phenomenon. People have felt the need to reconnect with their past long before the late-twentieth-century. Certainly from the eighteenth century onwards, when the French and Industrial revolutions created a profound sense of change and acceleration in Western Europe, many of the writing intellectuals who left us testimony worried about the disappearance of tradition in an age of fast advance and progress.\(^\text{15}\) Karl Marx wrote that in periods of revolutionary crisis [men] anxiously conjure up the spirits of the past to their service and borrow from them names, battle cries and costumes in order to present the new scene of world history in this time-honoured disguise and this borrowed language.\(^\text{16}\)

When Max Weber diagnosed in 1919 that the price for modernity was the world’s ‘disenchantment’ (Entzauberung)\(^\text{17}\), there already existed a solid Romantic tradition of longing for lost times of magic, an enduring ‘Romance with the past’.\(^\text{18}\)

For the past 200 years, Europeans have attempted to discover the last traces of the past in the peripheries and less developed areas of the world. In the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century, folklorists set out into dark woods and lonely valleys to record the fading European languages, songs, and customs at the height of industrialisation.\(^\text{19}\) When the modern nation states were forged in the nineteenth century, these collected fragments of folklore were turned into national memory. New traditions were written for the accelerating world, bits and pieces of surviving custom woven into national mythologies of shared history, continuity, and difference.\(^\text{20}\) Jay Winter argues that the nineteenth-century age of nationalism must be understood as a first memory boom.

Where does the second memory boom (ours) come from? Winter thinks that it is a reaction to the crumbling of our nineteenth-century national identities: ‘In recent years many people have come to see in memory a way out of the confusion bred by the fragmentation of the very identities forged by and during the first “memory boom” [in the nineteenth-century].’\(^\text{21}\) The second memory boom is a nostalgic reaction to a spreading sense of instability, to a second wave of change and acceleration. Technological advance, the empowerment of women, decolonisation, the dissolution of ‘traditional’ family structures, the decline of religion, massive urbanisation, the ongoing shift from agricultural production to the service industry – post-war Europe and the world changed profoundly and with unprecedented speed.\(^\text{22}\) The new and widespread interest in tradition and heritage is a counter-movement.

Most scholars agree that some of the most fundamental post-war changes occurred in the realm of family and communal life. In a re-issue of his 1965 work on pre-industrial England (The World We Have Lost), Peter Laslett noted bitterly that we had kept losing the world since his book was first published: ‘the family group of legal spouses and children is no longer the exclusive site of reproduction now that some four English babies out of ten are born outside marriage ... [and] gender equality is the unchallenged norm’.23 Eric Hobsbawm saw the most disturbing transformation of the post-war period in ‘the disintegration of the old patterns of human social relationships, and with it, incidentally, the snapping of the links between generations, that is to say, between past and present’.24 The impoverishment of communal life has been explored in a variety of works (most memorably in Robert Putnam’s Bowling Alone).25 It may account for the memory boom’s frequent invocation of communal ritual, its collective and festive dimension (see Chapter 2.2). The past is imagined as a warm place, a place before anonymity.

In this reading, the hunger for the past is a compensation for our loss of it. Past and present drift apart, and dreams of a meaningful past are created to ease the loss. Pierre Nora notes that it is the loss of real memory which makes us cling so strongly to the idea of memory: ‘We speak so much of memory because there is so little of it left.’26

There is a second factor which fuels the memory boom, and this is affluence. Never before have so many men and women had the time and money to ‘speak about memory’, to pursue their interest in the past. Only the spread of wealth made it possible for so many thousands in the post-war West to spend time with and in the past.27 Without affluence, the 35-hour-week, and early retirement schemes, there would be no memory boom. The market for cultural tourism, museums, history magazines, books, films, and even re-enactment costumes and folk instruments has grown immensely. While nostalgia was the privilege of idle elites in the eighteenth and nineteenth century, it became a mass phenomenon in the second half of the twentieth century.

It is not without irony that a high degree of wealth inspires tens of thousands to elaborate on their uneasiness with modern consumer capitalism and contemporary society. At the end of the twentieth century, considerable funds are invested into nostalgia for a time before affluence. As Eric Hobsbawm remarks gleefully about the period from c. 1950 to 1990:

Paradoxically, an era whose only claim to have benefited humanity rested on the enormous triumphs of material progress based on science and technology ended in a rejection of these by substantial bodies of public opinion and people claiming to be thinkers in the West.28

It is a fascinating paradox that the memory boom is both an expression and a critique of modern consumer capitalism. Nostalgia for pre-modernity is expressed and experienced in thoroughly modern ways. Pseudo-medieval fantasylands are produced for the digital 3D-cinema screen, downloaded via broadband internet, and consumed on handheld gadgets. The 'ethnic' costume which should express local uniqueness and tradition in the face of globalisation may be tailored in a Chinese factory, ordered via a mouse-click, paid with a credit card, and delivered via ultra-fast global courier. The memory boom underlies the forces of global capitalism, even if it claims to oppose them.

Change and affluence aside, there is a third post-war development which inspires the memory boom; the rhetoric of recognition. The end of open colonialism saw the empowerment of formerly marginalised groups. These groups began to formulate their own histories and identities. This prise de la parole is what Stuart Hall calls the 'emergence of new subjects, new genders, new ethnicities, new communities, hitherto excluded from the major forms of cultural representation'.

The 'new ethnicities' campaigned for the recognition of their cultural difference and often demanded restitution for past sufferings. Claims for recognition also came increasingly from the victims of the Holocaust. After 1945, their voices had not been heard, as public remembrance of the War had focused on 'heroic narratives of resistance to the Nazis'. This changed with the civil rights movement in the United States and the student revolts of 1968 which (in Europe) sought to expose former Nazis and collaborators who had remained in elite positions. In the 1970s and 1980s, witnesses came forward with their accounts of the Holocaust and the concentration camps. Primo Levi, who had published his first memoirs in 1947 (Se questo è un uomo) without much reaction, became a figure of cardinal importance 30 years later. As Winter notes: 'The “memory boom” of the late twentieth century took on momentum and major cultural significance when the victims of the Holocaust came out of the shadows, and when a wide public was finally, belatedly prepared to see them, honor them, and hear what they had to say.' This process arguably intensified with the end of the Cold War in 1989 which ended what Dan Diner calls 'an epoch of more than 40 years of neutralisation'.

The memory boom was shaped in important ways by claims for recognition by 'ethnic' communities and survivors of the Holocaust. Perhaps surprisingly, these claims have inspired many non-marginalised people to demand recognition as well. The prise de la parole is no longer the exclusive strategy of the disenfranchised but one increasingly adopted by the formerly privileged. In the late 1960s, claims for 'ethnic' recognition were appropriated by large parts of North America’s white population, as Matthew Frye Jacobson shows in his study Roots, too. Most white Americans today are no longer content with being 'just white' but insist on ethnic hyphens, both in a response to the civil rights movement and its 'new and contagious idiom of group identity and group rights' – and to distance themselves from a homogenously white past and its slaveholding and colonial guilt. Jacobson calls this a ‘white ethnic revival’.

Memory is a tool in the quest for recognition. The white hyphen-communities in North America insist in their ‘ethnic’ status and demand the recognition of their ancestors’ Irish ghettos, Huguenot Diaspora, Highland Holocaust. Their allegedly painful memories and identities compete on an ‘ethnic’ market. The U.S. historian Peter Novick argues that we live in a ‘wound culture’ in which to have suffered is a moral asset, where there is ‘Holocaust envy’. Made-up misery memoirs are only the most obvious manifestation of this trend. Even in Europe, where self-ethnicisation is less openly encountered, narratives of victimhood and marginality play an important part in the memory boom. Since 1989, right-wing parties from Britain to Finland have built up large followings with slogans that suggest their voters might be pushed to the margins and become ‘strangers in their own countries’, ‘second class citizens’ because of non-European immigration or Brussels bureaucracy. These parties claim to protect national identity and its historical difference out of a position of defence. This is what Benedict Anderson calls the ethnicisation of political life. The memory boom has a militant dimension.

The post-war memory boom was shaped by a sense of profound social change, the spread of affluence, and the rhetoric of recognition. It is a rearguard action, an effort to retain stability and privilege. As the next section shows, it is also a quest for pleasure.

2.2 Sensuous History: Play, Performance, Celebration

This is not a study of the many men and women who privately hold Scotland dear, silently, at their homes, without telling the world about it. The Scots of Europe are loud and visible, they dress up in colourful costume and march down a high street, play the drums and pipes, make bystanders stop and marvel. The Scots of Europe are, without exception, performers. For a weekend or a tune, they become Scots, embodiments of the Scottish dreamscape. They are not satisfied with a mere cognitive meditation on Scotland, they want to feel its magic in the flesh. The Scots of Europe are celebrants.

Celebration has its firm place in the post-war memory boom. Folk festivals, battle re-enactments, commemorative events, the inauguration of memorials and museums – celebrations and festivals are key manifestations of a new public interest in the past. In North America and Australasia, the roots phenomenon is above all a surge of ‘ethnic’ festivals. In Europe, the memory boom shows in the ‘revitalisation’ of rituals.

The memory boom requires performance. Jay Winter notes: ‘[G]roups of people come together in public to do the work of remembrance. ... We all recollect the past, but remembrance is generated by action.’ Many agents in the memory boom pursue the past for reasons of sensuous experience. Remembrance has become a leisure activity, a form of pastime celebration that provides stimulus.

The nature of celebration

For decades, historians have interpreted celebration and festivals primarily as a display of political power. Medievalists and Renaissance scholars examined the carefully arranged entry of a King into a city, a coronation ceremony, church festivals etc. This research tradition is alive and continues to examine the theatricality of power. The totalitarian regimes of the twentieth century have attracted particular attention. However, under the influence of the Annales School and the publication of Mikhail Bakhtin’s long-delayed work on Renaissance carnival in the 1960s, historians began to re-approach festivals in the 1970s. Celebration was now interpreted as a prime site of popular culture. The emerging field of cultural history (Alltagsgeschichte in Germany) was keen to abandon the study of elites and to look at history ‘from below’. It embraced carnivals and festivals as moments in ‘ordinary’ people’s lives. Again, historians of the medieval and early modern period proved to be pioneers.

Today, celebrations are increasingly explored as sites of identity-making. Since the nation state and its myths of continuity came into the historians’ focus in the 1980s, festivals have been analysed as the main moments in which communities ‘remember themselves’. An impressive body of scholarly analysis now explores how national communities form and endure thanks to parades, festivals, national days etc. Festivals help to imagine a... community, to spread and validate the myths that bind it together. The sociologist Paul Connerton argues that all societies require commemorative ritual and celebration. Festivals make communities real. As Celeste Ray notes on Scottish celebrations in the U.S. South: ‘For the Scottish community [in the U.S. South], Highland Games and Gatherings have become temporary physical expressions of an “imagined” unity.’

What constitutes celebration? The anthropologist Frank Manning explains that celebration is performance, a dramatic presentation of cultural symbols. It is held for enjoyment, for pleasure, not out of necessity. Thirdly, celebrations are public events. There may be an admission fee, but no social exclusion. Finally, celebration is participant. To Manning, a strict divide between performers and audiences will make ‘real’ celebration impossible: ‘Increasing professionalism notwithstanding, celebration actively involves its constituency; it is not simply a show put on for disengaged spectators.

There is yet another dimension to celebration; it must be temporary. Celebrations have a beginning and an end, and when the music is over, the revellers go home. Celebrations usually last a day or two and end before routine catches up. They remain play-like, an interruption of normal life. As the Dutch historian Johan Huizinga (1872-1945) observed, play creates zones of extraordinary behaviour and pauses daily life. Celebrations often take place in designated play zones, fenced-off from normality. In its best moments, such play and celebration may open a door to the extraordinary state of creative detachedness that the anthropologist Victor Turner (1920-1983) called liminality. According to Turner, ritual celebration may take us beyond the frontier (lat. limen) of social structure. It is out there, in a state of communitas, where life-changing innovation and insight is produced. In its more mundane moments, celebration has people dance a little, drink a lot, and then go back to work on Monday morning.

Festive Times?

The second half of the twentieth century is rich in celebration. Yeoman et al. insist: ‘On a global basis, there is unprecedented interest in festivals and events – at international and national level, in cities and towns, villages and hamlets, and in rural and coastal areas. Everyone wants to celebrate their particular form of culture, tradition, difference, or similarity. The rise of popular music and its many open-air festivals and dance events are only one symptom of this will to celebrate. Certain scholars understand the Western interest in festive culture as nothing less than a counter-Reformation, a revenge for the painful losses that communal life suffered at the hands of the protestant work ethic. Barbara Ehrenreich sees the folk revival and rock’n’roll counterculture as a mass protest against the impoverishment of ritual and physical culture – an impoverishment that may traced back to the sixteenth and seventeenth century, when dance, rough sports, fairs, dress, and music were forbidden or regulated by Church authorities. This impoverishment has continued in the post-war West. Jeremy Boissevain writes:

Everywhere in Europe there is a growing awareness that the forty post-war years of industrialization, rationalization, centralized control, mobility, and hard work have exacted high social costs. One of the responses to this awareness has been the revival of public rituals...

Festive culture is read as an oppositional force here. Implicitly, Boissevain follows the Soviet scholar Mikhail Bakhtin (1895-1975), who (in Rabelais and His World) focused on early modern carnival and understood it as a counter-movement, a monde renversé in which the existing order is ridiculed; slave becomes master, man becomes woman, rich becomes poor, man becomes beast. Inversion, Bakhtin argued, is the protest of the powerless, and carnival must be understood as an expression of popular discontent. (The Soviet authorities took him seriously, delayed the publication of his book, and sabotaged his career.) To Bakhtin, carnivalists form a festive collective, a ‘chorus of laughing people’ to oppose authority:

For thousands of years, the people have used these festive comic images to express their criticism, their deep distrust of official truth, and their highest hopes and aspirations. Freedom was not so much an exterior right as it was the inner content of these images. It was the thousand-year old language of fearlessness, a language with no reservations and omissions, about the world and about power.

How tempting then to understand the post-war celebrants (and with them the Scots of Europe) as costumed rebels; neo-carnivalists who oppose the loss of memory in the clothes of their (presumed) ancestors, who wage Jihad against McWorld, who abandon their lifeless office blocks and join the communitas of ritual celebration. But are they rebels?

Victor Turner developed his vocabulary of liminality and communitas to describe religious trance in traditional societies. He was critical about the use of his concepts in mundane situations and only conceded that there might be ‘liminoid genres’ in modern industrial societies; artificial analogues to pre-modern liminality. Turner would not have discovered communitas at a Country & Western festival (or a Highland Games event). It may feel good to perform tribal dances (or the Highland fling) in a gymnastic club after work, but does it provide an entrance into a state of communal union? To the sociologist Paul Connerton, the answer is no. To him, the alleged ‘recovery’ of lost tradition is little more than a clumsy imitation without any depth or meaning. Our desperate re-enactments of past life-worlds are only ‘palliative measures, façades erected to screen off the full implications of this vast worldwide clearing operation [that is modernisation].’\(^\text{60}\) The world of communitas and ritual has died, and our recreations will bring back only dreams and shadows of what once was.

Dreams and shadows sell. Entertainment entrepreneurs worldwide have recognised the strong demand for ritual celebration. Festivals are set up as business ventures and tourist attractions throughout the world. Modernity has space and use for celebration. Marketing experts like Yeoman et al. argue that the spread of festivals must be ‘viewed as a new form of tourism in which to anchor economic prosperity and development’\(^\text{61}\). The Western celebrant may see himself as a costumed rebel or an advocate of ritual communion; to the entertainment entrepreneur, he is a solvent leisurer longing for cold drinks and a sandwich at the end of the day. There is a snack bar waiting beyond the limen.

Again, the spread of festivals in the post-war West would not be possible without affluence. Only leisure time and wealth allow tens of thousands to invest in festive pleasure, to express their longing for ritual community. The strong demand for celebration has led to a rich and permanent marketplace of festivals, and some commentators see the twenty-first-century West become an ‘event culture.’\(^\text{62}\) They rarely consider this development a meaningful re-connection with pre-modern tradition. Walter Leimgruber, Professor of European Ethnology in Basel, argues that festivals have lost their thousand-year-old function of interrupting normal time and turned into a permanent stream of shallow entertainment:

> For human beings in traditional societies, celebration constituted the arguably greatest contrast to everyday life – an inversion or supersession of the habitual order. ... But the event culture is so powerful and without intermission that it no longer marks an extraordinary state but has become part of daily life.\(^\text{63}\)

A permanent festival is nothing less than the end of celebration, as festivity must lose all extraordinary meaning when it becomes routine.

Finally, some scholars doubt that the festivals we long for today have ever existed. Instead of rejecting the modern-day recreations as bloodless copies, they argue that celebration never had the depth which Bakhtin and Turner dreamt into them. Critics of Bakhtin claim that carnival was (and is) a safety valve, a place for letting off steam – a necessary interruption of daily life that will guarantee its continuation. Authorities may allow their subjects to rebel for a limited amount of time in order to maintain the existing order. Carnival then is ‘a licensed and ultimately contained explosion of popular energies’.\(^\text{64}\)

\(^{63}\) ‘Für die Menschen in traditionellen Gesellschaften stellte das Fest den denkbar grössten Kontrast zum Alltag dar – eine Umkehrung oder Aufhebung der gewohnten Ordnung. ... Doch die Eventkultur ist so mächtig und pausenlos, dass sie nicht mehr einen Ausnahmezustand markiert, sondern Bestandteil des täglichen Lebens geworden ist.’ Walter Leimgruber, ‘Fest, Festspiel, Festival’, Schweizer Monatshefte 970 (July 2009): 37.

Umberto Eco argues that dictators have always given the masses clowns and carnival. He insists that carnival reinforces the rules it breaks. Where the norms are not forbidding, their transgression will not be meaningful. To Eco, comic and carnival represent paramount examples of law enforcement. They remind us of the existence of the rule.65 Interestingly, contemporary social scientists concerned with public health and alcohol abuse have (without citing Bakhtin and Eco) come to see the urban party zones of the West as areas of ‘bound hedonism’, as designated zones of weekend misrule.66

Celebration has its set place in the post-war memory boom; practices of public remembrance have a strong performative dimension. The pursuit of the past thus becomes a sensuous activity, a form of experience, related to athletic and otherwise physical leisure. As will become clear in the subsequent chapters, the Scottish dreamscape – with its rough sports, loud music, bright colours, and military marching tradition – satisfies the demand for physical stimulus particularly well.

2.3 Masquerade: Playing Ancestors, Knights, Indians

The Scots of Europe are no Scots. Only a tiny minority of the men and women portrayed in this study consider themselves Scottish by birth, residence, or ancestry. The self-professed Highlanders engage in a Scottish masquerade. Many are concerned or curious about what the ‘real’ Scots from Scotland might think of their imitation. The approval of their performance by a ‘real’ Scot is usually received with pride.

As examined above, agents in the memory boom strive for their roots. They demand recognition of their apparently unique historical identities, and they turn to the past to rediscover stabilising local traditions in a globalised culture. How may masquerade, the conscious appropriation of someone else’s customs, provide satisfaction in this context?

Difficult memories, chosen roots

Europeans may find that the search for memory is difficult. They may discover that their national and regional histories are lost, unknown, not taught at school, and not exhibited at local museums. Dedicated enthusiasts might embark on a research trip, spend time at libraries, even interview older relatives to learn about the past from first-hand accounts. Most, however, will not find the time or energy to do so and end up with little to remember and reactivate. This discovery of loss often confirms them in the urgency of their nostalgia.

Others face a different problem; they may learn that their culture lacks the songs, costumes, and heroes which would make remembrance exciting. They were eager to find their own Vercingetorix, William Tell, or William Wallace, but all they found was Dutch wooden shoes and songs about the weather. Not every national or regional history has the profile which would make it successful in the contemporary memory boom. Still others face the problem that their national and regional histories are occupied, claimed by the wrong people. Their past may have been misused for horrific deeds in the past. As is well established, Germanic mythology was claimed and tarnished by Nazi Germany in a way that makes its celebration highly difficult still today.67

Thankfully, even in Europe, the old continent, most people are the product of migrating ancestors and busy intermixing. They usually have more than one cultural affiliation to choose from. They, too, face what the U.S. sociologist Mary Waters calls ‘ethnic options’; different routes into the past, different roots to follow.68 The overwhelming majority of North Americans, Australians and New Zealanders have to go ‘ethnic shopping’ when they feel an urge for roots and hyphens. Quite similarly, many Europeans add ethnic flavour to their identities by elaborating on a particularly attractive ancestral line. The current mayor of London for instance, Mr Boris Johnson, likes to stress that he is the descendant of a Circassian slave.69

Choice is not limited to documented ancestral lines. If Europeans do not find what suits them in the more distant branches of their family trees, they can join their wife’s tribe, their neighbour’s clan, their hometown’s festival, their best friend’s history. Again, this is a common strategy for overseas roots enthusiasts as well; most ‘ethnic’ communities in North America and Australasia have substantial bodies of members who lack documented ancestry. As emerges from the work of Rowland Berthoff and Celeste Ray, some of the most dedicated U.S. Highlanders who celebrate Scotland passionately in Clan societies and pipe bands have no Scottish roots whatsoever.70 Like their European cousins, they have joined out of an affinity for Scotland.

It is worth stressing that the voluntariness of ‘ethnic’ identity, while well established in academia, is rejected by many roots enthusiasts in North America, Australasia, and Europe. Disturbingly, the rhetoric of blood has made a big comeback in popular debates about identity and culture since the 1970s. Excitement about the decoding of the human DNA and advances in genetic engineering has not helped; the assumption that everyone has a stable cultural identity inscribed into his or her DNA is now spread widely. A bestselling German work of non-fiction argued in 2010 that certain immigrant groups fit less easily into German society because of their genes.71 As David A. Hollinger points out, ethnic identities are seen as something non-negotiable again. In North America, it has become politically incorrect and rude to argue with someone who is convinced that his or her mentality is shaped by an ethnic identity. Ethnic identities are styled into ‘deep concepts’, and to be without ethnic affiliation is unacceptable as it means to evade responsibility.72

67 On Nazi appropriations of Germanic mythology, see e.g. Herfried Münkler, Siegfrieden: Politik mit einem deutschen Mythos (Berlin: Rotbuch, 1988).
71 Thilo Sarrazin, Deutschland schafft sich ab. Wie wir unser Land aufs Spiel setzen (München: DVA, 2010).
But there is nothing coercive about blood. Ancestors (especially dead ones) force no one to wear a kilt, to yodel, to have a flag tattooed. At the ethnic festivals of North America, Australasia, and Europe, it is the right set of clothes and the right sort of tune which makes the Scot, the Greek, the Zulu warrior, the Native American. The Scots of both Europe and North America make a decision, however conscious, to favour and express the Scottish ancestral line, to join the celebration of Scotland.

Most European memory searchers join the Scots because they consider their more obvious roots lost, dull, or complicated. As is examined in the following chapters, they justify their Scottish masquerade by turning the Scots into relatives – Celtic or Nordic cousins who have guarded what they themselves have lost. European playactors use elaborate mythologies of kinship which suggest that by playing Scotsmen, they can reconnect with their own lost heritage. The Scots serve as a site of memory.

Playing knights

There are other forms of playacting which provide a service similar to the Scottish one. While there is no other modern European nation which is imitated in the way of the Scots, there is a long-standing European tradition of playing and appropriating the exotic aesthetics of both outer-European peoples and the Middle Ages.

Knightly play has been popular since the Renaissance as a dimension of ‘medievalism’, the recurring recreation or re-imagination of the Middle Ages in the modern period. Since the 1960s, however, the imitation and re-invention of knights and princesses has evolved from elite leisure and stage performance to a mass hobby, an activity for tens of thousands of amateurs on both side of the Atlantic (see Chapter 7). Historical re-enactors, fantasy role players, and even extreme sport jousting athletes put on heavy armour and flowing robes to imitate historical battles, fight each other at tournaments, or to parade fantastical pseudo-medieval costume and weaponry.

Knights and Scots share several characteristics. Like the Scots, knights and princesses often hold views of their period which are not fully congruent with historical scholarship. Their ideas are shaped by novels, films, and several centuries of popular imagination and recycling. (Strikingly, some of the Romantic images they cherish may be traced back to the novels of Sir Walter Scott, a man who catered in both Scottish and medieval heroes and is responsible for a certain blurring of the boundaries between Rob Roy and Ivanhoe.) Like the Scots, knights have a strong interest in physical experience, in the authenticity of sensuous history. As is examined in Chapter 7, Scottish and medieval playacting often intersect, as Scottish clans will attend medieval fairs. However, the Scots of Europe are a much more varied crowd, and knights would look out of place at the majority of Scottish events.

There are other differences which set the knights apart from the Scots, from gender roles (are there Scottish equivalents to medieval dames and witches?) to politics (do the Scots refight battles like some knights repeat Grunewald/Tannenberg?). Most important, however, may be the fact that there is an actual country by the name of Scotland, that there are people who consider kilts and bagpipes their national symbols; in other words, that the Scots are still around. Medieval playactors only rarely have to discuss their imitation with the original knights and dames, but they also cannot usually enjoy the pleasure of being accepted by the ‘real’ people. It is the apparent reality of the Scots which makes Scottish performances so intense and satisfying in contemporary Western Europe.

White Indians?

The Scottish dreamscape also shares several characteristics with the popular mythology of Native Americans; from tribal organisation to images of primal masculinity and political resilience. There are also similar problems of congruency between these Romantic images and the modern-day realities in Scotland and North America. The proximity of the two dreamscapes is striking, as Scots and Indians have fought on different sides during much of the past 300 years – the ‘tribal brotherhood’ of Highlanders and Indians which is sometimes conjured by Scottish and American historians clearly ignores that the Scots were hardy British colonists rather than victims of genocidal extermination. Much more than a similarity of historical experience, the proximity of the Scottish and Indian mythologies indicates the Romantic preoccupation with archaic warrior societies and their colourful costumes and symbols.75

The practice of ‘playing Indians’ has been a constant feature of European Romanticism for the past 200 years. Rayna Green calls it ‘one of the oldest forms of affinity with American culture’.76 In the nineteenth century, at a time of widespread fears that European identities (and masculinities) might be impoverished by the effects of civilisation and urbanisation, Native Americans were mystified as noble warriors and natural tribesmen – a development which only became possible with their total defeat in combat. (Similarly, the Scottish Highlander could only be enchanted after his political neutralisation at Culloden, see Chapter 3.) Political destruction and Romantic idealisation occurred simultaneously; the cowboy entrepreneur William F. Cody aka ‘Buffalo Bill’ (1846-1917) enlisted 23 Lakota Sioux Ghost Dancers into his Wild West show – less than four months after they had been fought and arrested at Wounded Knee in December 1890.77

The Wild West shows and the novels of Karl May (1842-1912) caused enormous enthusiasm for Native Americans in Europe, most notably in England and Germany.\textsuperscript{78} Indian playing began in the late nineteenth century and evolved into a well-organised mainstream hobby.\textsuperscript{79} As Green argues, German (and other) playactors 're-enacted the scripts' given to them by Buffalo Bill and Karl May.\textsuperscript{80} Such playing continued throughout much of the twentieth century, after the War even in the German Democratic Republic.\textsuperscript{81} Organisations such as Westernbund e.V. have held Indian Councils in Germany since 1951. In 2010, the Westernbund still listed 131 active Native American clubs, from the Oglala Sioux e.V. Berlin to Tipi Gesellschaft e.V. München.\textsuperscript{82} Native Americans also became icons of the 1960s and 1970s counterculture, sages to the New Age movement of the 1980s, and an extremely fashionable 'ethnic option' for amateur genealogists in North America in the 1990s and 2000s.\textsuperscript{83} The Native American dreamscape – like that of the Scots – continues to be reworked, rewritten, and globally appropriated. Whites who 'go native' have featured prominently in the U.S. blockbuster films of the past decades, from \textit{Dances with Wolves} (1990) and \textit{The Last of the Mohicans} (1992) to \textit{The Patriot} (2000).

Still, with the end of colonial politics, the playing of Indians has lost some of its attraction. The practice of 'ethnomasquerade' – the 'performance of an ethnic identity through the mimicking of clothes, gestures, appearances, language, cultural codes, or other components of identity formation'\textsuperscript{84} – has been criticised as derogatory behaviour and an expression of colonial power.\textsuperscript{85} Also, the postcolonial \textit{prise de la parole} meant that Native American communities increasingly articulated their views on the 'tribe called wannabe', and many have made it very clear that they do not consider the performances flattering.

It would be wrong to speculate that postcolonial European playactors change their feathered headdresses for kilts – even if we will come across at least some Scots who used to be Indians before they became Scots. It is, however, safe to claim that the Romantic interest in tribal warriors and their impersonation has not diminished with decolonisation, and that the Scots offer a safe and politically innocent option. What has changed are the warrior's looks; the Scots are white Indians, 'native' Indians, European primitives. It is important to most European playactors that the Scot is one of their own, a Celt, a relative, a European.

Conclusion Chapter 2

Scottish playacting evolved in a time-specific context. The Scots of Europe are agents in what the historian Jay Winter calls the memory boom. Growing numbers of Europeans strive to rediscover the past and to re-root their identities. The memory boom has no simple cause and no linear development. It is simultaneously escapist and aggressive, a nostalgic flight into historical counter-worlds and a defence of a (mostly imagined) historical uniqueness in the face of globalisation. It is critical of modernity but reliant on modern consumer capitalism. Importantly, memory is summoned to demand recognition.

Celebration has its set place in the post-war memory boom. The past is commemorated and recreated in performance. This makes historical remembrance a highly sensuous activity, related to athletic and otherwise physical leisure activities. A variety of entertainment entrepreneurs cater to the wishes of the Western celebrants, assist them in the imitation of past societies’ rituals. Again, these imitations express discontent with modernity but do not necessarily endanger the project of modernity. The demand for sensuous history is both a protest against the perceived impoverishment of ritual culture in a sedentary modernity as well as an effect of the modern leisure industry and its constant praise of emotional and physical experience. In designated play-zones, celebrants outlive their ritual and communal fantasies and then return to work the other day.

The Scots of Europe have chosen someone else’s history for their commemorative effort. In mythologies of kinship, they turn the mythical Scottish clansmen and warriors into relatives, guardians of their own past. They do so because they consider their own national or regional folklores and traditions lost, blunt, or politically difficult. There is historical precedent for the impersonation of pre-modern warrior societies. Medieval knights and non-European peoples have been played by many Europeans (and Americans) who felt that these peoples had guarded what they themselves had lost. Decolonisation has rendered such ethnomasquerade politically dubious in the past decades. The Scots offer an innocent alternative.

The memory boom has shaped Scottish playacting – but it has not created it. The Scottish dreamscape has served as a historical counter-world for more than two centuries. The next two chapters investigate its formation and international spread.

THE SCOTTISH DREAMSCAPE: FORMATION

The people portrayed in this study are chasing dreams of Scotland. They do not usually celebrate modern Scotland, the place on the map, but a Romantic fantasy of Scottish history, a neverland of kilts, Celts, clans, and bagpipes. The Scots of Europe – much like their cousins, the roots enthusiasts of North America and Australasia – cherish the Scottish dreamscape.

The Scottish dreamscape was not invented by Hollywood – even if films like Annie Laurie (1927), Brigadoon (1954), Highlander (1986), and Braveheart (1995) have helped immensely to carry the image of the kilted Highlander into the far corners of the world (see Chapter 4). The dreamscape is older. It has been employed by artists, politicians, military men, and tourism entrepreneurs for more than 250 years. Its origins lay in the second half of the eighteenth century, when Scottish thinkers and writers re-imagined Scottish national identity at a time of drastic social and economic change. The image was perfected in Victorian Britain, during the high time of European Romanticism, and spread via the worldwide channels of the British Empire and its armed forces. By the twentieth century, the Scottish dreamscape had become a thoroughly global fantasy of a local culture.

The Scottish dreamscape has never been a totally stable set of images but was rewritten and re-imagined with each adaptation. And yet, some central themes recur ever since the Highland schoolteacher James Macpherson (1736-1796) crafted his faux-Gaelic bard Ossian in 1760 (see Chapter 4). These themes have to do with vanishing worlds, the clash of tradition and modernisation, heroic warfare, nature, and distinctiveness. They are still at the heart of what the Scots of Europe perform and celebrate today. While Chapter 4 takes a close look at the Scottish dreamscape’s international spread, this chapter recapitulates its historical formation.

3.1 Scotland the place, Scotland the dream

There is more than one mythology of Scotland. In early modern Poland-Lithuania and Prussia, for example, the many thousands of travelling Scottish pedlars and merchants left behind an impression of Scottish thrift and meanness. Among nineteenth-century homesick emigrants in North America and beyond, sentimental tales of Scottish village life were popular – a vision known as ‘Kailyardism’, after the Scots word for cabbage patch. And in the second half of the twentieth century, many Scottish filmmakers and novelists were preoccupied not with Highland warriors but with urban grit and industrial heroism – with ‘Clydesideism’, named after Glasgow’s river Clyde and its (now mostly unemployed) shipbuilders.

The most enduring and dominant vision of Scotland, however, is what Tom Nairn calls the ‘tartan monster’. At the beginning of the twentieth century, the Scotland of popular imagination is a land of kilts, tartan, bagpipes, clans, Celts, Highland Games, empty landscapes, mist, moors, brooding castles, and the Loch Ness monster. If children or marketing specialists around the world are asked to draw a Scot, they draw a kilted man who plays the bagpipes. Even if tales of gritty Scottish cities are revived in popular novels like Trainspotting (1993) and the Inspector Rebus series, it is the world of kilts and clans which dominates the international perception of Scotland. So powerful is this tartanry that Turnbull and Beveridge claim it ‘eclipses’ Scottish culture.

The formulation suggests that the Scottish dreamscape obscures a ‘real’ Scotland. There is widespread consensus among Scottish writers and thinkers that real Scotland, whatever it may be, is not represented by the kilt and bagpipe cliché. And indeed, a visit to modern-day Edinburgh, Glasgow, or Inverness may come as a shock to the Scottish dreamscape’s dedicated fans (see ‘Issues of Congruency’, Chapter 9). Many Scots reject the tartan monster as pseudo-historical kitsch which deflects attention from the nation’s realities and, worse, turns Scottish culture into something comical. One of the most-hated figures among Scottish intellectuals is the Scottish music hall singer Sir Harry Lauder (1870-1950) who impersonated the stereotypical Highlander on theatre stages from London to Melbourne and did much to cement the tartan image (see Chapter 4.3).

‘Real’ Scotland is not the topic of this study, but it will come as no surprise that it is hard to find. As David McCrone et al. have pointed out, this is not because ‘regressive Scotch myths’ obscure reality, but ‘because in modern, pluralistic societies it is increasingly the case that no single national culture is to be found’. There is no ready Scottish essence underneath the tartan monster.

Has there ever been a Scottish past that looked like the Scottish dreamscape? It appears that there has not. As Scottish and international historians have demonstrated at some length in the past 35 years, the Scottish dreamscape is an inadequate description of both modern and historical Scotland. The academic world has learnt that Scotland’s national symbols are ‘invented traditions’, that the modern kilt does not predate the nineteenth century, that tartan sets were linked to Clans long after the actual Clan system had disappeared, and that serious doubts exist about the ‘Celtic’ nature of the modern-day Scottish population. In the recent wave of deconstructionist historiography, the bashing of Scottish myths has become something of an academic niche.

7 McCrone et al., Scotland – the Brand, 195.
And yet, the Scottish dreamscape has survived this demystifying assault. The tartan vision of Scotland continues to fascinate novelists, filmmakers, tourists, politicians, and amateur genealogists around the world – even the Scots themselves. The impact of the film Braveheart (1995), the revitalisation of Scottish nationalism and the opening of the Scottish Parliament in 1999, and a zeitgeist-owed interest in folk culture saw the re-appreciation of kilts and tartan among the younger Scottish population in the 1990s. Internationally, the tartan monster continues to eclipse all other, more sober (or dull) visions of Scottishness. When the Scottish Government hosted a year-long ‘Homecoming Scotland’ campaign in 2009 to attract roots tourism, a Clan village and Highland Gathering festival were set up in Lowland Edinburgh to meet expectations (see Chapter 9).

The interesting thing about the tartan monster then, as McCrone et al. argue, ‘is not why much of it is a forgery, but why it continues to have such cultural powers.’ The people portrayed in this study – the Scots of Europe – are testimony to the Scottish dreamscape’s stunning longevity and international spread.

3.2 Tradition and invention

The Scottish dreamscape was formed in a process now often referred to as ‘Highlandism’, after Edward Said’s Orientalism. In the century between the creation of Ossian in 1760 and the publication of Queen Victoria’s first Highland Journal in 1868, Scotland became a Highland nation – a country which adopted the cultural symbols of its long-time marginal Highland periphery and turned them into national symbols. This process occurred in the context of both British integration and European Romantic nationalism. The British context will be considered first.

The Scottish embrace of Highland culture in the second half of the eighteenth century marked a drastic change in attitude towards the Highland region. For centuries, politicians, artists, and intellectuals in Scotland’s urban centres had looked towards the Highlands with little enthusiasm. At least since the late Middle Ages, the region was perceived predominantly as an unruly periphery of backwardness and poverty that needed a firm hand and integration into the Scottish and latterly British kingdom.

Such sentiment became more urgent after the Jacobite rebellions which sought to reinstall the Stuart monarchy after King James’ II and VII dismissal in 1688. The Jacobites relied heavily on levies from the Catholic and Episcopalian Highland clans, which gave the Highlands an increasingly violent reputation. The Jacobite rising of 1745 led to a veritable anti-Highlander hysteria in most of the Scottish Lowlands and in England. Highlanders were suspected of stealing babies and eating them at the time of their march towards the South. Their rebellion was halted at Culloden, in April 1746, a battle which saw the total defeat of Jacobitism. It also changed the Highlands forever.

After Culloden, British military presence was fully established in the Highlands. All men not serving in the British army were banned from bearing arms and wearing traditional costume in the Disarming Act of 1746. One government agent famously reported, in 1750, that ‘the disaffected and savage Highlanders need to be bridled and kept in awe by Garrisons and Standing Forces ‘till the present generation wears out’. True, the decline of traditional Highland society and Clanship had begun before Culloden, in the seventeenth century, when trade intensified and many Clan chiefs began to approach their land and people in profit-minded ways. Still, Culloden marked a violent turning-point in the history of the Highlands. The region was modernised with force; evangelical missionary work, the reorganisation of agricultural production, large-scale emigration, the establishment of a standardised education system, the subduing of the land through roads and bridges, and the beginnings of tourism transformed Highland society and culture.

The Highlanders’ political defeat also made their Romantic transformation possible. Following the universal pattern of first breaking the dangerous and backward savages and then praising their last survivors as formidable examples of tradition and authenticity, the Scottish Highlanders were turned into noble warriors, witnesses of an old but now necessarily passing world. Highlanders came to be seen as a vanishing race, the last of their kind, and Highland culture became the subject of protection, antiquarian study, and Romantic adoration. A mere 20 years after Culloden, James Macpherson’s epic Ossian (1760-63) was able to take the hearts of the reading public with a tale of a brave but now safely defeated Highland race. In 1778, the newly founded Highland Society of London advocated the preservation of Highland culture and called for the annulment of the Disarming Act. The Act was repealed in 1781.

This remarkably rapid shift from demonisation to adoration exemplifies what Sander Gilman called the ‘protean nature’ of stereotypes: ‘We can move from fearing to glorifying the Other. ... The most negative stereotype always has an overtly positive counterweight.’ The 13 The first decade following the overthrow of King James II and VII [Jacobus] in 1688 saw hardship and even famine in the Highlands – a fact that helped to form broad discontent with the new King, William of Orange (r. 1689-1702). Moreover, after the English-Scottish Union of 1707, the Jacobites could pose as ‘the champions of Scottish nationalism and the defenders of Scottish liberty’ and thus gather support. glorification of safely defeated enemies also is no Scottish peculiarity. Renato Rosaldo calls the phenomenon ‘imperialist nostalgia’ and detects it in the United States’ imperial venture to the Philippines: ‘people mourn the passing of what they themselves have transformed’. In nineteenth-century imperial Russia, Tolstoy and Lermontov wrote elegies about their beloved enemies in the Caucasian wars while fighting them, and the Chechen rebel leader Imam Shamil (c. 1797-1871) became a much admired noble savage in the salons of Saint Petersburg after his capture. Similarly, U.S. American interest in Native American culture intensified strongly after the decisive Wounded Knee massacre of 1890.

In the course of the nineteenth century, the urban, Anglophone elites of Edinburgh gradually adopted costume, music, and poetry of the Highlands and also created new symbols and rituals in what they considered to be a Highland tradition. One of the most famous ‘official’ rhapsodies on Highland culture was the colourful spectacle held in honour of King George IV’s visit to Edinburgh in August 1822. In many ways, Scottish playacting began not in Germany or the United States, but in Edinburgh, as Lowland elites ‘played Highlander’.

To a degree, the Scottish embrace of the Highland aesthetic followed international demand. Scotland was increasingly expected to look like a nation of Highlanders. Highland regiments had been incorporated into the British Army after Culloden and figured prominently on American and European battlefields. Their ‘ethnic’ uniforms were depicted in newspapers and the arts and aroused considerable interest throughout Britain and Europe (see Chapter 4.2).
Scottish writers like Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) and later RL Stevenson (1850-1894) created highly successful Highlander novels which made Scotland a place of interest in European Romanticism. Tourists travelled to Scotland in growing numbers, eager to see the wild Scots themselves. The most famous visitor of all was Queen Victoria (r. 1837-1901). Her Highland journals were published in 1868 and 1884 and further popularised the image of Scotland as a land of kilted warriors.

By turning the Highland symbols into a Scottish national culture, Scottish artists, politicians, and entrepreneurs catered to an international stereotype. However, there was another dimension to Highlandism, one that has to do with a Scottish need for distinctiveness. The Highland aesthetic provided difference from England.

3.3 Politics of difference, politics of longing

After the parliamentary Union with England in 1707, Scotland struggled with the concept of Britain and with English dominance in political and economic affairs. By the first decades of the nineteenth century, even Lowland Scots with a long standing distrust towards the Highlands clutched ‘at anything even remotely Scottish with the realisation that their Anglophile approach to respectability had failed’, writes Robert Clyde. With his array of distinctive symbols (kilt, tartan, bagpipes), the Highlander could become the mascot of a nation longing for visibility. The Highland aesthetic provided distinctiveness: ‘Highlandised Scotland was almost as different as it was possible to be from England’, notes Richard Finlay.25 Contemporary Scottish politicians consciously understood the adoption of the Highland aesthetic as an effort to protect Scotland from ‘Anglification’. In 1804, Sir John Sinclair argued that Scottish identity was in need of visible support as ‘Scotland becomes completely confounded in England’.26

Strikingly, these Scottish politics of difference were grounded on the symbols of a vanishing world. The images and traditions celebrated and re-imagined in nineteenth-century Edinburgh were practically extinct in the Highlands themselves. The foundation of 'Clan societies' was only an echo of Clanship as a form of social organisation. Highlandism had a strong antiquarian dimension, as Andrew Ross notes. He claims that the adoption of the Highland aesthetic was escapist, that it marks the Scottish elites’ inability to stand their ground in a progressive context and to make the British Union a Scottish project:

Since all causes deemed progressive were firmly hitched to the British star, the form of [Scottish] cultural nationalism took on a studied antiquarian air, as the cult of Highlandism descended on a Lowlands majority, hitherto scornful of things clannish and Celtic-sounding. Compulsory Celtification was adopted as the polar opposite of Anglican gentility, and as a fantasy foil to the starchy servility of native professional elites. This fake Gaelicism, entirely foreign to most Scots, brought on a plague of tartan kitsch for which there has existed no known antidote until recent times.27

But Scotland’s ‘compulsory Celtification’ has been treated as too singular a phenomenon. There was something profoundly Romantic and European about the Scottish adoption and reinvention of the Highlander, too. Similar processes may be found elsewhere in nineteenth-century Europe; romantic nationalism relied in important ways on interesting histories.

As the French and the industrial revolution enlarged the urban and literate societies of Europe, there arose a need for high culture narratives to provide cohesion and loyalty in a population no longer bound by traditional communal structures. To achieve this, pre-modern ancestors, folk songs, and indigenous languages were revived and invented throughout the continent and bound into new narratives of national union, distinctiveness, and continuity. Heroic epics were rediscovered or forged, national communities endowed with folk heroes. There is nothing unusual about the elevation of regional custom to the status of national 25 Clyde, Rebel to Hero, 186, Finlay, ‘Queen Victoria’, 150.

26 Cit. in Womack, Improvement and Romance, 145f.
It is now well established that the making of these national narratives did require some creativity; that communities were imagined (Benedict Anderson), traditions were invented (Eric Hobsbawm). This view is widely accepted, and it would be difficult to find primordialist academics who still argue that the national populations of Europe represent a natural order or have existed throughout the millennia. However, the insight that social construction did take place may be taken too far. National identities were not created out of the blue by political schemers and then forced onto whole populations. As Eric Hobsbawm himself explains in his famous essay, the ‘invention of tradition’ relies on bits and pieces of genuine custom which are then bound into new and meaningful forms. More explicitly, Anthony D. Smith stresses that nineteenth-century national myths had to be rooted in an ‘ethnic fund’ in order to be recognised and accepted by large populations. Patrick J. Geary recently provided a strong analysis of the European nations’ medieval roots.

The new nations’ older foundations have been neglected by many myth-destroying historians in the past decades. Clearly, Hugh Trevor-Roper was mistaken when he claimed: ‘Indeed the whole concept of a distinct Highland culture and tradition is a retrospective invention.’ His entertaining polemics have been debunked by a range of Scottish scholars who insist in the wealth of medieval and early modern Gaelic culture. It has also been established once and for all that Highlanders wore kilt-like garments and tartan long before 1800, and that the modern form of the Highland costume was much more defined by the nineteenth-century Highland regiments than by any English Quakers. Also, the faux-Gaelic poetry of Ossian was indeed a new creation which feigned antiquity – but it also made use of some genuine Gaelic oral tradition (see Chapter 4.1); a fact which Trevor-Roper was unwilling to accept. Like most other European national narratives, the Scottish dreamscape was made out of existing material. New and artificial was the assemblage, the combination, and its elevation to national status.

It is no coincidence that it was the peripheral Highlander who was made the mascot of the Scottish nation. He became the focus of a strong and international Romantic interest in untamed, wild, and allegedly ‘primitive’ people. Scottish (and British) attitudes towards Highland culture changed at a time when the European colonial powers grew preoccupied with the ‘savage societies’ they encountered and conquered throughout the world. As industrialisation and urbanisation altered life in many parts of Europe, Romantic minds feared that the past might be lost with the speed of progress. They declared primitive societies to be survivors, guardians of history. This is what happened to the Highlander: ‘The kilt and tartan came to signify the mystery of primitive society’, note McCrone et al. The Highlander became a man of pre-modern innocence and tribal belongings, seemingly not yet touched by the ground-shaking forces of modernisation. Of course, this perception ignored the many ways in which Highlanders already participated in the project of British modernity, both at home and throughout the Empire.

It has been pointed out that Scotland had a particularly urgent need for pre-modern innocence. By the mid-nineteenth century, Scotland had become an ‘industrial pioneer’, and large parts of the population had left their rural communities for employment in the manufactures of the Central Belt, in Glasgow or Edinburgh. Urbanisation, fast and disruptive social change, large-scale industrialisation, and increasing work migration made the Highland counter-world of nature and tradition highly attractive to many Scots. As TM Devine notes, nineteenth-century Scotland was an urban society that had ‘adopted a rural face.’

This rural face pleased the wider world. Highlandised Scotland became an object of desire in European Romanticism. Mythologies of kinship played an important role in this desire from the very beginning; when English, French, or Russian tourists travelled to Scotland in the nineteenth century, they often considered the Scottish Highlanders survivors of a shared European past, even ‘historical artefacts’. A female English visitor on the Hebridean isles noted in 1894: ‘... one may yet study, as perhaps in few other places in Europe, something of the childhood of the world.’

The Scottish dreamscape has its origins in the period from 1760 to 1868 and emerged in the context of both British integration and European Romantic nationalism. From the beginning, it was devised as a counter-image against modernisation and as a marker of distinctiveness.

Scottish officials adopted the stylised symbols of Scotland’s Highland periphery in order to achieve an aesthetic difference from England and to provide the highly industrialised nation with a mythology of pre-modern identity. To this day, Scotland is internationally associated with the Highland aesthetic.

The Scottish dreamscape’s production involved a large degree of creativity, and any claims of unbroken continuity between, say, a Highland Games festival of the year 2010 and the culture of medieval or ‘Celtic’ Scotland must be rejected. However, the dreamscape was not a total invention. The mythification of the Highlands in the late eighteenth century made use of established symbols and customs – and of established themes of wildness and difference associated with the region. The radical novelty was the transformation of these themes and images from negative to positive, and from regional to national identity. In this, Scotland followed the rules of European Romantic nationalism.

Strikingly, the Scottish dreamscape became an object of international desire and appropriation in the nineteenth and twentieth century. After his disarming in 1746, the Highlander was adopted threefold; as an embodiment of non-Englishness and national distinctiveness by Scottish politicians and entrepreneurs, as a wild relative by British tourists and military entrepreneurs, and as a European ancestor and template of difference by Romantic poets and nationalist thinkers throughout Europe. As the following chapter demonstrates, the Scottish Highlander became one of Europe’s own primitives, and Scotland was imagined to be one of the last pockets of pre-modern history in industrialised Europe. Chapter 4 investigates the Scottish Highland aesthetic’s remarkable international spread and longevity.
Chapter 4: THE SCOTTISH DREAMSCAPE: SPREAD

The Scottish dreamscape originates in the second half of the eighteenth century. How is it possible that it continues to inspire European playactors at the beginning of the twenty first century? Chapter 4 investigates the Scottish Highland mythology’s endurance and spread.

The image of Scotland as a wild Highland periphery was disseminated by two of the most wide-reaching forces of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries; the British Empire and American popular culture. The poems of Ossian (1760-63), Sir Walter Scott’s Waverley novels (c. 1814-1824), Queen Victoria’s Highland journals (1868 and 1884), and Sir Harry Lauder’s music hall shows (1890s-1920s) were followed by Hollywood films like Brigadoon (1953), Highlander (1986), and Braveheart (1995) and by fantasy novels like Diane Gabaldon’s bestselling Outlander series (from 1991). These artistic efforts disseminated the Scottish dreamscape – while real Highlanders, embodiments of the myth, fought and paraded as British soldiers in Waterloo (1815), Crimea (1853-56), India (1857), Flanders (1917), the Normandy Beaches (1944), and Hong Kong (1997, as the Union Jack was lowered). When Braveheart came to movie theatres worldwide in 1995, it was its familiarity, not its novelty, which made it so successful. Scottish rebel-heroes have fascinated readers and dreamers for more than 200 years.

Chapter 4 approaches the dreamscape’s spread from five directions. Section 4.1 looks at the poems of Ossian and their uses in early nineteenth-century nationalism. It homes in on the Russian reception to exemplify how the Highlander assisted in the creation of other nations’ histories. Section 4.2 explores the image of the Highland soldier. The kilted warrior’s frequent depictions in the arts and in early photojournalism after Waterloo (1815) and the Crimean War (1853-1856) lent the Scottish dreamscape an enduring martial quality. Section 4.3 discusses touring Scottish entertainers and especially Sir Harry Lauder in early twentieth-century North America. It stresses that Scots have used their own mythology to speak to international audiences, to markets of longing. Section 4.4 focuses on pseudo-Scottish Hollywood films. These movies feed back into Europe and re-shape the Scottish dreamscape. Section 4.5 finally discusses Scottish Romance novels and the erotics of the kilted Scotsman. It approaches the issue of female agency in the dissemination of the Scottish dreamscape.

Importantly, dreams of Scotland have a record of inspiring other nations and other people in the making of their own history and tradition. The Highland mythology has long served as a model, an archive, a site of memory.

4.1 Writers: Ossian in Russia (1792)

Exhibit number F671 at the Suvorov Museum in Konchanskoe, a hamlet in central Russia’s Novgorod area, is a copy of Ossian. The museum displays the surviving effects of Field-Marshall Alexander Vasilevich Suvorov (1729-1800) who spent several years of his life in rural exile in Konchanskoe. Suvorov read Fingal in the first full translation by Emil Ivanovich...
Chapter 4 – Spread

Kostrov, published in 1792 and dedicated to Suvorov himself. In the introductory poem, translator Kostrov expressed the hope that the famous Russian General (who himself enjoyed writing poetry in his idle hours) would recognise himself in the Scottish Highlander:

An enemy of flattery, of paperwork and lazy luxury,
A truthful and upright judge of efforts,
Heroic deeds for the love of fatherland,
Read Ossian, you will recognise yourself in him.

General Suvorov was stationed in Finland when Kostrov’s Ossian was published in 1792, but it appears that he received the book in the mail or was aware of earlier French translations. In October 1792, Suvorov wrote in a letter: ‘I wander through these barren, rocky lands, I sing of Ossian.’ A diary entry later in the same year reads: ‘Ossian, my companion, he inspires me: I see and hear Fingal in the fog, sitting on high crags.’

Ossian remained at Suvorov’s side. After a row with Tsar Paul I (r. 1796-1801) over what the General thought to be an unmanly redesign of the Russian army’s uniforms, Suvorov was discharged and ordered to leave St. Petersburg. On his run-down estate in Konchanskoe, he reportedly sang psalms in a peasant choir and showed some skill in ringing the church bells. He also dreamt of Ossian. In November 1798, Suvorov wrote to his long-time friend, D.I. Khvostov: ‘May I ask you to bring with you from St. Petersburg … a small book, Kostrov’s translation of Ossian.’ Suvorov was rehabilitated in the same year to serve in the Napoleonic Wars. Some of his admirers liked to think that the General carried Ossian with him when he crossed the Alps in 1799 to confront the French Revolutionary Army. During the spectacular alpine campaign that made Suvorov a ‘Generalissimus’, the poet G.R. Derzhavin (1743-1816) – the most famous Russian poet of his time and often dubbed Pushkin’s predecessor – imagined Suvorov to be marching through thin air and clouds, guided by Ossian himself:

What can it be? Is it not the shade of Ossian,
The singer of the mists and seas,
That shows me Moran in the moonlight
On his way to the king of kings

Unfortunately, on the other side of the Alps, the enemy had help by Ossian as well. To begin with, Kostrov’s Russian translation was made not from the original work, but from Letourneur’s hugely popular French adaption (Ossian, poésies galliques, 1777). French

2 ‘Враг лести, пышности и роскоши ленивой – Заслугам судия неложный и правдивый – Геройски подвиги painters envisaged Ossian as an ally; in 1802, Anne Louis Girodet de Roucy-Trioson created an Ossian who welcomed the fallen French Generals to a heaven of heroes, and in 1811, Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres was commissioned to paint the ‘Homer of the North’ for Napoleon's bedroom at the Quirinal Palace in Rome, a painting now known as 'Dream of Ossian'.

Napoleon Bonaparte (1769-1821) was deeply fond of the Highlander and compared Ossian to ‘the whisper of the wind and the waves of the sea’. Both Napoleon and Suvorov went to war with Ossian on their minds.

And they were not alone. In the period from c. 1774 to 1830, the poems of Ossian captured the imagination of a great number of European readers, poets, and politicians. The mythical Scottish bard became one of the most celebrated figures of European Romanticism. Ossian served as a model ancestor at a time that saw the rise of modern nation states and the formulation of national histories. Long before twenty-first-century playactors would direct their yearning for roots towards Scotland, Ossian inspired European intellectuals to imagine their past in a Scottish manner. As Kidd and Coleman note: 'Every nation, or aspirant nation, it seemed was on a quest to find its own domestic Ossian.'

The poems of Ossian were first published in Edinburgh between 1760 and 1763 and presented as a scholarly notation of Gaelic oral tradition, recorded and translated by the young Highland schoolteacher James Macpherson (1736-1796) with the support of prominent Edinburgh literati. The first poems appeared only 14 years after Culloden and the widespread anti-Highlander hysteria that had accompanied the Jacobite risings. In Britain, they marked the beginning of a new urban interest in Scottish Highland culture – exotic, pre-modern, and safely defeated (see Chapter 3).

Fittingly, Ossian was no fearsome irredentist rebel but a blind old bard recounting the tales of a dying warrior race.

Debate on Ossian’s authenticity began in the year of its publication, when Samuel Johnson and others expressed their doubts on the verses’ antiquity. Macpherson’s epics were soon unmasked as a largely fantastical imitation of ancient poetry. Bizarrely, the debate has never really ended since, as many scholars continue to disagree over what matters more about Ossian; Macpherson’s wilful deception or the bits and pieces of genuine Gaelic poetry he employed to create his hoax.

In any case, the eighteenth-century dispute remained largely academic and did little to hamper Ossian's international success. Ossianic poetry ran like 'a flood of lava through Europe', wrote Matthew Arnold, and its exceptional impact in European Romanticism has been studied exhaustively. Ossian inspired German writers like Tieck, Schiller, and Goethe, and guided Klopstock and Herder’s search for their nation’s soul in myths, fairytales, and folk rhymes. In Paris and Geneva, the Highlander was heralded a visitor from an innocent and natural pre-modernity. Ossian inspired Schubert’s Lieder and Italian Cantì. Ossian left a legacy in Portuguese and Galician literature, and even influenced Brazilian writers. He entranced North America, where Thomas Jefferson thought Ossian ‘this rude bard of the North’, was ‘the greatest poet that has ever existed’.

Ossian hit a Romantic nerve. His melancholy for a vanishing people stirred all those European thinkers who saw themselves confronted with industrial revolution, change, and acceleration (see Chapter 2). Spreading concern for the primitive found a formidable embodiment in Ossian – a European ancestor, a survivor from the past. All Europe believed that in the Highlands, if anywhere, poetry might be found’, notes GR Barratt. In the disguise of Ossian, the Scottish Highlander – and with him soon, in the time of Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832), Scotland as a whole – became a target for European nostalgia. Ossian disseminated first notions of Scotland as an old place, a reservoir of history, and when Scott published his Waverley novels, Europe was already familiar with the wild Scotland of Rob Roy and Redgauntlet. With his unwillingness to adapt and modernise, the Highlander entered the pantheon of Romantic heroes and came to stand next to ‘Napoleon, Satan, Shakespeare, the Wandering Jew and other trespassers of ordinary life’.

The most common form of adoration is imitation, and Ossian was copied throughout Europe. Their paraphrases often led to new national poems and epics. Ossian served as a template. In Russia, to remain with our initial example, Ossian facilitated the formation of a Russian national literature and identity in the years between 1792 and 1830, as has been observed by Yuri Levin in his seminal study on Ossian in Russia. Many Russian writers ‘recognised themselves’ in the poems of Ossian, just as translator E.I. Kostrov had intended. Kostrov helped to increase Ossian’s familiarity and turned the Gaelic epic into something approaching Russian folklore by rendering Ossian in a language laced with medieval Church Slavonic. This made the text more exotic and more Russian at the same time. Kostrov relied on rhythmic folk rhyme (sklad) to give the Scottish tale a Slavic swing. His work outlasted all later translation efforts and remains the authoritative Russian Ossian to this day. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, his Ossian was used for prize recitations in many Russian schools. It is likely that Alexander Pushkin (1799-1837) had his first encounters with the Highlander at school. His early poems Kol’na (1813) and Osgar (1814) are Ossianic rhapsodies. Pushkin’s youthful imitations were a fairly typical approach to Ossian. Major and minor Russian writers – among them V.A. Zhukovski, P.A. Vyzemski, N.M. Karamzin – copied the Scottish epic, borrowed its characters, re-created its mood, and used it to test rhymes. Kostrov’s translation of Ossian became ‘the source for all kinds of poetic variations and free imitations by Russian poets’, writes Levin, and Peter France suggests that many of Russia’s best-known Romantic poets went through a ‘brief and youthful “Ossian” period.

Kostrov’s russified Ossian arrived at a time of heightened intellectual interest in Russian as a literary language. Before 1790, the small and cosmopolitan elites of St. Petersburg and Moscow had conversed almost exclusively in French, while up to 97 percent of the population lived in a ‘self-contained, illiterate village-world’. Russian national literature was either hidden in monasteries or virtually nonexistent. This changed as the French Revolution with its slogans of equality irritated Russia’s elites. During the Napoleonic Wars, distaste for French language and culture became a patriotic duty, and it grew fashionable amongst noblemen to speak Russian, a thing which had been considered common for centuries. In St. Petersburg, so deeply immersed in French culture, the events of 1789 and the humiliating peace of Tilsit (1807) made the nobility exchange ‘Cliquot and Lafite for kvas and vodka’. Russian intellectuals shed their fixation on the Mediterranean classics and looked out for more ‘Russian’ tales. In 1795, N.M. Karamzin articulated the need for Northern difference in his epic poem Ilya Muromets: ‘We are not Greeks, not Romans. We don’t believe their legends … We heard different tales from our mothers. And now I shall tell one of them in the old way.’

Kostrov’s Ossian helped Russian poets to recall their mothers’ ‘different tales’. They employed the Highland bard as a guide into Russian history. Ossian had arrived in Russia before the Finnish folk-epic Kalevala (1836) and before the first popular editions of the Icelander Sagas. He became a singer for the North. Ossian helped to appreciate and perhaps discover one of the greatest epics of Russian literature – the Song of Igor’s Campaign, a poem that allegedly dates from the Kievan Middle Ages. The tale, like Ossian, is a song of defeat. It recounts how four twelfth-century Kievan princes travel forth to slay invading nomads but then suffer disastrous defeat and captivity. The manuscript was discovered in the 1790s by Count Pushkin-Mysin in a stack of bound manuscripts. From the moment of its discovery, Song of Igor was mentioned in one breath with Ossian. In 1797, Karamzin announced the find in a letter to the Hamburg-based Spectateur du Nord: ‘on a déterré, il y a deux ans, dans nos archives, le fragment d’un poëme, intitulé le Chant des guerriers d’Igor, qui peut être mis à côté des plus beaux morceaux d’Ossian’. As Levin states, the Russian epic never existed without a popular connection to Ossian.

There are remarkable textual similarities between Ossian and Igor, and it has been suggested that these indicate that one was inspired by the other one. But there are differing opinions. The Russian novelist Vladimir Nabokov argued that the similarities only prove that both Ossian and Igor contain authentic bits of Northern medieval poetry. Nabokov sees both epics spring from the same ancient root and suspects that there are ‘certain bridges or ruins of bridges [which] may be distinguished linking Scottish-Gaelic romances and Kievan ones’. Ossian and Igor were and continue to be linked in mythologies of kinship.

As with Ossian, the Russian epic’s antiquity is contested to this day. Speculation about Song of Igor’s authenticity is not likely to cease soon, mainly because the original copy was burned. Field-Marshar Suvorov’s alpine campaign was unsuccessful (another defeat), and when Napoleon marched into Moscow in September 1812, the city was burnt to the ground. ‘The beautiful and splendid city of Moscow exists no more’, wrote Bonaparte to the Russian Tsar Alexander I on 20 September 1812. The house of Count Pushkin-Mysin, discoverer of Igor, was not spared, and the original manuscript lost. Baptised in fire and refusing closer investigation, Song of Igor became a Russian national epic.

Napoleon’s invasion of 1812 proved a decisive moment for Russian national unification. During the battle of Borodino, where the Russian troops failed to stop the French from advancing towards Moscow, two Generals still read Ossian to each other to keep spirits high. But 25 years later, Mikhail Yurevich Lermontov (1814-1841) recalled the faithful battle in his own Borodino (1837), a poem which acquired ‘national’ status. The same fire that consumed the Song of Igor in Moscow did incinerate Karamzin’s personal library, but it could not stop him from publishing Russia’s first national history, in 1818. In retrospect, Napoleon did ‘launch the Russian nation’, as Pushkin realised in 1821. Like Pushkin, Lermontov had honed his skills with Ossianic imitations before he turned to Russian history. His 1830 poem Ossian’s Grave is an Ossianic reverie:

> Под занавесою тумана,
> Под небом бурь, среди степей,
> Стоит могила Оссиана
> В горах Шотландии моей.
> Under a covering of fog,
> On a moor under a stormy heaven,
> Lies the grave of Ossian
> In Scottish hills I call my own.

> Летит к ней дух мой усыпленный
> Родным ветром подышать
> И от могилы сей забытой
> Вторично жизнь свою занять!..
> And there my slumbering spirit flies
> To breathe the air that he inhaled,
> And from this now forgot ten grave
> To come alive again myself!..

Ossian’s Scotland serves as a reservoir of memories to the Russian poet. While Lermontov’s relationship to Scotland was peculiar in so far that he and his family claimed descent from an (unproven) seventeenth-century Scottish mercenary by the name of George Learmonth, there is something generically Romantic in the poet’s yearning for a Scottish home.

Conclusion 4.1: James Macpherson’s Ossian (1760-63) became a key text of European Romanticism. With its praise of old ways and untamed nature, Ossian could be employed as a European noble savage and model ancestor. Ossian inspired many formulations of national history and tradition. In Russia, Ossian’s impact may have been particularly profound, as the lack of literacy, literature, and standardised literary language made E.I. Kostrov’s translation (1792) a model text for the (re-)creation of Russian folk epics. But throughout Europe, Ossian was widely read and imitated. When Sir Walter Scott published his Waverley novels, he could build upon a familiar notion of Scotland.

4.2 Soldiers: Highlanders at Waterloo (1815)

In May 1815, the 79th Queen’s Own Cameron Highlanders travelled from Belfast to Brussels to fight Napoleon with Wellington’s army. After the victory at Waterloo, they became something of an attraction in Paris. In his diary, Sergeant Thomas Campbell of the Grenadier Company recalls being scrutinised – along with Private John Fraser and Piper Kenneth Mackay – by the Russian Tsar Alexander I in the Elysée Palace, on 17 August 1815:

> The Emperor made a very minute inspection of us, and his curiosity led him to call upon me, as being the most robust of the party, to step to the front, when he ordered the rest to sit down. As soon as I stepped to the front I was surrounded by astonished nobility, and the Emperor commenced his inspection and questions as follows ... he examined my hose, gaiters, legs, and pinched my skin, thinking I wore something under my kilt, and had the curiosity to lift my kilt up to my navel, so that he might not be deceived. The questions were: If I was present at the actions of the 16th, 17th, and 18th of June? Whether I was in Egypt? If I wore the kilt in winter, or, if I did not feel the cold in that season? If I was married? If my parents were alive?

The Emperor then requested Lord Cathcart to order me to put John Fraser through the ‘manual and platoon’ exercise, at which performance he was highly pleased. He then requested the pipers to play up, and Lord Cathcart desired them to play the Highland tune ‘Cogue na Shee’ [sic, really: côgaidh nà sith, gael. war or peace], which he explained to the Emperor, who seemed highly delighted with the music.

After the Emperor had done with me, the veteran Count Platoff came up to me, and, taking me by the hand, told me in broken English that I was a good and brave soldier, and all my countrymen were. He then pressed my hand to his breast, and gave me his to press to mine. After all this was over I was ordered to take the party to Lord Cathcart’s quarters, where we had refreshments, and received a piece of money each from his lordship, and also his approbation for our appearance.

Sergeant Campbell’s account gives an idea of the unusual sight kilted soldiers made on the European continent at the time of the Napoleonic Wars (1803-1815). Indeed before 1815, even British citizens sometimes failed to recognise Highland regiments as their own troops. A soldier by the name of Allan Macpherson of the 42nd Highland Regiment of Foot noted on his return from North America, in 1762:

I arrived from America in the year of 1762 (at Bristol). I was dressed in the uniform of the 42nd or Royal Highlanders, to which I then belonged: a great crowd of people came round me and a respectable looking man asked me, ‘Pray, Sir, forgive me for asking whether you be with us or against – for I never saw such a dress before’.44

Such confusion was washed away by the victory at Waterloo. In 1815, the kilted Highland regiments became celebrated heroes, defenders of Britain, and their colourful uniforms were depicted by numerous artists and newspapers. In the course of the nineteenth century, the Highland soldier became ‘one of the principal icons of the [British] imperial enterprise’45. He also became an international symbol for Scotland. For the past 200 years, Scotland has been widely associated with tartan-clad, kilt-wearing, bagpipe-playing, fighting males. The Highland soldier is at the heart of the Scottish dreamscape. This chapter examines how martial images of Scotland were spread through the global channels of Empire. It pays particular attention to the fact that many of the men who made the kilted soldier famous were neither Highlanders nor Scots.

To be sure, Scottish soldiers served on the European continent long before Waterloo. Lowland and Highland mercenaries fought for the French monarch in the Hundred Years’

War (c. 1337-1453), acted as his personal bodyguards (the garde écossais) from 1449 to the early 1600s, enlisted with the Swedish King Gustavus Adolphus and various other parties in the 'Thirty Years' War (1618-1648), and served in the armies of Poland-Lithuania, Prussia, and the Russian Tsar.\footnote{Philippe Contamine, 'Scottish Soldiers in France in the Second Half of the Fifteenth Century. As is examined in Chapter 7, some of these medieval and early modern Scottish soldiers are being rediscovered and remembered by the Scots of Europe today. This said, the Highland regiments which proved so decisive for the making of Scotland’s modern image and identity were not raised before the second half of the eighteenth century.\footnote{Only one Highland Regiment was raised before Culloden; the 42nd Regiment of Foot (the Black Watch) was set up in 1739 and shipped to India right away. In short-lived Highland Companies which served the Crown before 1707, see Diane M. Henderson, The Scottish Regiments (Glasgow: Harper Collins, 1993), 27, 40-5. Stephen Wood, The Scottish Soldier (Manchester: Archive, 1987), 29.} They are profoundly British regiments. The raising of Highland regiments for Britain began after Culloden (1746), for only the safe defeat of Jacobitism and the Highland clans which had supported it made Highland soldiers in British ranks politically acceptable. After Culloden, the formerly feared rebels were turned into tragic tribal soldiers, their loyalty to Clan leaders and luckless Bonnie Prince Charlie into a laudably old-fashioned martial ethos, and their alleged primitive nature into the stuff that made natural born warriors.\footnote{Robert Clyde, From Rebel to Hero. The Image of the Highlander, 1745-1830 (East Linton: Tuckwell, 1995).} In 1766, British Prime Minister William Pitt justified his employment of Highland men in the Seven Years' War with a famous speech: ‘I sought for merit wherever it was to be found. It is my boast, that I was the first minister who looked for it, and I found it in the mountains of the north. I called forth, and drew into your service, an hardy and intrepid race of men!’\footnote{Cited in Henderson, Highland Soldier, 12, n.23} Pitt made the Highlands a reservoir of pre-modern martial spirit that could be tapped into by the ingenious British politician.

The integration of Highland soldiers into the British army occurred in the context of a wider European interest in ‘ethnic’ warfare, ‘primitive’ peoples, and, in the nineteenth century, ‘martial races’.\footnote{Thomas S. Abler, Hinterland Warriors and Military Dress. European Empires and Exotic Uniforms (Oxford, Berg, 1999). Heather Streets, Martial Races. The Military, Race and Masculinity in British Imperial Culture, 1857-1914 (Manchester: Manchester UP, 2004).} Furthermore, eighteenth-century British politicians also valued Highland soldiers for their availability. General Wolfe, who had fought the clans at Culloden, employed Highlanders at the battle for Québec because he saw ‘no great mischief if they fall’.\footnote{WT Waugh, James Wolfe: Man and Soldier (Montreal: Louis Carrier, 1928), 101.} David Horsbroch thinks that Highlanders were enlisted and sent abroad to the colonies ‘where they would not be a threat’. Recruitment served as a tool for control, and not all Highlanders joined the British army voluntarily. Diane M. Henderson suggests that one aim of the large-scale Highland recruitments was to depopulate and weaken the region.

In the Highlands, the economic situation after Culloden made a career in the British army attractive to many. Overpopulation and the re-organisation of agricultural production had lead to a scarcity of work and income. TM Devine identifies the army as an ‘escape route ... from the irresistible forces of agrarian modernisation.’ The rise of the Highland soldier occurred parallel to the impoverishment of large parts of Highland society. In the years from 1756 to 1815, recruitment became a veritable business in the Highlands. 48 300 men were raised from a population of less than 350 000 to serve in 23 British line regiments and 26 fencible units. Ten Highland regiments were raised between 1756 and 1765 alone.

In the late eighteenth and nineteenth century, many observers understood recruiting practices in the Highlands as a continuation of pre-modern Clan tradition – as a summoning of loyal Clansmen by their chiefs. This was not the case. If anything, the landowning elites who raised Highland regiments imitated the old Clan traditions in order to endow their regiments with an aura of Highland spirit and brand image. Devine argues that the ‘military entrepreneurs’ who enlisted Highlanders acted behind a façade of clan loyalties. Such strategies of self-ethnicisation were also evident in the Highland uniforms, which were designed in increasingly elaborate ways to achieve a maximum theatrical effect. Highland dress and bearskin caps summoned an image of ancient Clan warfare and were an essential asset in the military market. Often, the uniforms were of great personal concern to the commanders. In the Highland regiments, a degree of playacting was involved from the start.

Scottish soldiers played important roles in both the Seven Years’ War and the American War. However, it was the Napoleonic Wars and Waterloo which made the Highland soldiers heroes in the eyes of the wider British and later European public. During the Napoleonic Wars, the Highlanders’ pipers became symbols for the British advance. From Arroyo de Molinos in Spain (1811) comes report of the Gordon Highlanders:

> The 71st and 92nd led in the storming of the village, and it is said, though I do not vouch for it, that the first intelligence the French commander had of our being near him, was hearing our pipers playing ‘Hey, Johnnie Cope, are you waukin’ yet?’

Waterloo made the Highlanders even more visible – both in Britain and in Europe. The 42nd, 73rd, 79th and 92nd Highland regiments won the coveted Battle Honour, Waterloo. The Times of London praised ‘the brave Highlanders’ of Waterloo, and the Black Watch enjoyed a triumphant return home to Edinburgh. After Waterloo, it became desirable for British military men to be in command of a Highland Regiment, as a note in the diary of Thomas Creevy MP shows (26 March 1828): ‘We have an event in our family. Fergy [Sir Ronald Ferguson] has got a regiment – a tiptop crack one – one of those beautiful Highland Regiments that were at Brussels, Quatre Bras and Waterloo.’ The Highland soldier became an icon of British military culture, and Highland dress ‘a glamorous new national symbol whose freshness was yearly renewed on the battlefields of Europe.’

To some extent, the Scots themselves were captivated by the image of the Highland soldier in the nineteenth century. Hew Strachan notes: ‘They [the Scots] appropriated the paraphernalia of the Highland soldier as a universal symbol of Scotland.’ The symbols which had represented ‘a barbaric and even alien form of life’ to the ‘eighteenth century beacons of the Scottish Enlightenment’ became an embodiment of Scottish national identity.

Sir Walter Scott’s celebration of the Highland soldier played a decisive role in this process. But the Highlander pleased all exponents of British culture. Painters like Orlando Norie, Lady Butler, and Robert Gibb loved to paint Highland regiments, in particularly after the Crimean War (1853-56) and the Indian Mutiny (1857-59). Gibb’s paintings The Thin Red Line (1881) and Comrades (1878) became British classics. Lady Butler found ‘these splendid troops ... so essentially pictorial’. The Crimean War was also one of the first military conflicts of which photojournalists brought home images, and the kilted soldiers were a popular subject. The last survivors of the ‘Thin Red Line’ were interviewed in the British press until the 1890s.

Not everyone thinks this attention was fully justified. Strachan writes: ‘Highlanders hogged the limelight in the great imperial sagas of the 1850s.’

The Crimean War and later the Indian Mutiny produced an array of Highlander memorabilia – shortbread tins, postcards, songs, poems, Music Hall parodies, sketches in the illustrated press, engravings, numerous porcelaines, figurines, and penny novels, even dramatic re-enactments. Furthermore, a wealth of diaries and journals was published which featured heroic Scottish soldiers in imperial adventure. Mrs G. Harries, the wife of a pastor who with her family was beleaguered at Lucknow during the Mutiny, recounts how she was saved by the brave and bearded men of the 78th Highlanders on 25 September 1857:

> We had no idea that they were so near ... when suddenly, just at dark, we heard a very sharp fire of musketry quite close by, and then a tremendous cheering; an instant after, the sound of bagpipes, then soldiers running up the road, our compound and verandah filled with our deliverers, and all of us shaking hands frantically and exchanging fervent 'God bless you's!' with the gallant men and officers of the 78th Highlanders ... the state of joyful confusion and excitement is beyond all description. The big, rough, bearded soldiers were seizing the little children out of our arms, kissing them with tears rolling down their cheeks and thanking God they had come in time to save them from the fate of those at Cawnpore.\textsuperscript{71}

As John M. MacKenzie notes, the Mutiny 'thoroughly established the iconic significance of the Scottish soldier'.\textsuperscript{72} The warrior image of the Highland soldier acquired such strength that it became increasingly irrelevant as to who exactly performed in the kilt. By the end of the eighteenth century, British demand for Highland soldiers had become greater than the Highland supply.\textsuperscript{73} In 1809, five Highland regiments abandoned the kilt because of a lack of Highland recruits.\textsuperscript{74} One reason was emigration; many Scots – Highlanders and Lowlanders – left for America and Australia in the mid-nineteenth century. In 1855, during the Crimean War, an editorial in the \textit{Times} complained that the Highlands were so depopulated that it was impossible to find soldiers there:

If we want men for our armies – and we do want men – we must got to Manchester or Birmingham, to the streets and lanes of the Metropolis, – anywhere but to the Highlands of Scotland. You may go a long day's journey and literally not see a house or a man. House and man have been there, but are there no more.\textsuperscript{75}

The same editorial also noted that Highlanders 'have long been unable to keep up the small Highland brigade without the aid of other races'. Britain's Highland Regiments have been staffed with Lowland Scots and non-Scots since the late eighteenth century. The Highland soldier's ethnic dress could be worn by anyone. In the Napoleonic Wars, the majority of Scots in the British Army were Lowlanders – 'but their image was Highland'.\textsuperscript{76} Highland recruits made no more than a fifth of the 42\textsuperscript{nd} Highland Regiment in 1854, the 78\textsuperscript{th} found 'barely 50 per cent of its recruits from Scotland' in 1854/55, and in 1870, five 'ostensibly Scottish regiments' had fewer than 15 percent Scottish recruits.\textsuperscript{77} Many of the celebrated Highlanders of Crimea and Lucknow were neither Highlanders nor Scots. Also, Lowland units decorated themselves with tartan and bagpipes and often employed Highland Companies or 'Highland Volunteers'.\textsuperscript{78}

In 1881, the Highland craze became official, as the War Office ordered all Lowland regiments to wear 'Tartan trews and Highland-style doublets' – the Lowlanders had to become more visibly 'Scottish'.\textsuperscript{79} Pseudo-Scottish units were established throughout Britain – the London Scottish, Liverpool Scottish, and Tyneside Scottish – and several non-Scottish units adopted pipe bands (the 4\textsuperscript{th} Royal Tank Regiment). In short, the Highland regiments’ military mythology proved so powerful that the original formations were maintained and enlarged beyond all ethnic reality.

This is particularly true for many of Britain’s former colonies who refused to let go of their kilted regiments and pipe bands after independence. Non-Scottish regiments throughout the world continue to wear kilts and have pipers. It would require a separate study to identify the Scottish military legacy in the postcolonial world, from Idi Amin’s notorious love for tartan and bagpipes to the pipers of the Palestinian Liberation Army, and from the Sri Lankan bagpipe funeral for President Premadasa in Colombo (1993) to the military bands of India, Pakistan, the Middle East, and Hong Kong.\(^{80}\) As Thomas S. Abler notes, ‘the fighting abilities of the Scot and the music that inspired him have had a lasting impact on military traditions far beyond the highlands of Scotland.’\(^{61}\)

One of the Highlander’s most curious post-colonial afterlives may be found in South Africa.\(^{82}\) There, enthusiasm for Highland soldiers inspired various sections of the colonial military ‘to reinvent themselves as Scottish’ during the Boer War’. In 1910, South Africa became a Dominion but kept two kilted regiments, the Cape Town Highlanders and the Transvaal Scottish. They were staffed with men of English, Welsh, Irish, East European Jewish and Scandinavian descent [who] became great exponents of kilt wearing, bagpipe playing and Scottish military mythology’. After 1948, the Apartheid regime began to see the Scottish regiments as ‘useful vehicles for white unity and military mobilization’, and in the 1970s, a Scottish Military Tattoo was held in Durban by the Apartheid Defence Force as part of a campaign to build ‘pro-military sentiments amongst beleaguered whites’. In 1986, while the racist regime was internationally isolated and a State of Emergency had been declared, Commandant Marriner of the Cape Town Highlanders still dined with the Royal Family at Windsor Castle. South Africa’s kilted regiments have survived Apartheid and continue to exist. In 2008, a new Scottish Military Tattoo was set up in Montecasino/ Johannesburg, this time firmly embedded in the international Scottish playacting scene (see Chapter 5).

\textbf{Conclusion 4.2:} Highland Regiments were first raised for the British Army in the second half of the eighteenth century. Their commanders imitated myths of Clanship and insisted on fantastical uniforms to increase their regiments’ historical aura. The Highlanders’ military exploits and visibility at Waterloo, in the Crimean War, and during the Indian Mutiny made them famous in both Britain and Europe. The Highland Soldier became a British imperial icon whose image was reworked and reproduced in material culture, song, and literature. The channels of British Empire guaranteed a wide dissemination of the Highland image. Scotland came to be associated with kilted regiments and their martial qualities. Scotland’s military mythology proved so powerful that it kilted regiments and pipe bands were retained by many of Britain’s former colonies.

4.3 Stage: Harry Lauder in America (1907)

The image of the kilted Scotsman was not only carried out into the world by armed soldiers, but also by clowns and comedians. When the Music Hall singer Harry Lauder (1870-1950) performed in the United States, his fans dressed up as Scots to go and see him. In his autobiography, published in 1928, Lauder recalled:

The exiled Scots in the [United] States had more to do with my success than many people imagined... they turned up at my shows in all manner of Scottish costumes – in kilts, with Balmoral bonnets, wearing tartan ties, and many of them brought their bagpipes with them. They imparted an enthusiastic atmosphere to my appearances everywhere; their weird shouts and ‘hoochs’ and skirls provided good copy for journalists and next-day talking points for the natives. In the first twenty weeks I spent in the States I must have met personally ten thousand people who claimed acquaintance with me in ‘the auld days in Hamilton, Harry!’ – or Glasgow, or Arbroath, or Portobello as the case might be.83

Lauder, from Portobello near Edinburgh, recognised that his tartan-clad fans were highly picturesque and that they helped to give him media coverage in the United States. He acknowledged that by dressing up ‘in all manner of Scottish costume’, his audiences made him famous and visible. He himself knew best what attention Scottish costume – kilt, tartan, bonnet, bagpipe – could draw. Lauder was a professional Scotsman throughout his career, embodying popular tartan clichés from London to New York and from Melbourne to Johannesburg. He and his many Scottish Music Hall colleagues relentlessly travelled the English-speaking world in the period between c. 1870 and 1914 and did much to carry the Scottish dreamscape into the twentieth century.

Music Hall was the dominant form of song in Britain from c. 1840 to 1920.84 It developed in the back rooms of public houses as a working class entertainment but was quickly adopted and commercialised by the more ‘swell’ variety theatres on High Street.85 The ‘Scotch Comic’ was a standard figure in an array of ‘ethnic’ Music Hall characters; he stood next to the Hebrew Comic, the Blackface Minstrel, and the Cockney Coster.86 The Scotch Comic predated Harry Lauder by several decades; in 1867, P.G. ‘Packy’ Fairley was advertised as ‘The Celebrated Scotch Comedian, who will give, in character, Song and Dance, ”The Newhaven Fishwife”, ”The Scotch Washerwoman”, [and] ”Have ye seen my Jamie”.87 The Music Hall Scot wore kilts and garish tartan, cracked jokes about cunning but lazy Highland folk, spoke in lilting Scottish accents, sang sentimental tunes about a distant Highland home, and was often pathologically mean. The character was partly inspired by the many Highlanders who had left their homes in the second half of the nineteenth century and tried to make a living as workers, buskers, and beggars in Glasgow and Edinburgh. But he was also a parody of the British army’s Highland regiments. The figure was familiar, in Glasgow as in London:

86 Maloney, Scotland and the Music Hall, 2.
'Much of [Music Hall’s] Caledoniana was well recycled in the cultural marketplace across the United Kingdom’, writes Frank Bruce. By the time Harry Lauder left the coal mines and did his first stage shows in the late 1880s, ‘the role of “Scotch” comic was well established and enjoying something of a boom’. 88

Towards the end of nineteenth century, British Music Hall artists were in high demand in North America, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and much of the English-speaking world. Scottish comedians in particular embarked on prolonged tours through the expatriate communities. David Kennedy (1825-1886), a tenor from Perth, left Glasgow by boat in March 1872 and arrived three month later in Melbourne, Australia, together with his extensive family. The Kennedys performed their ‘Twa hoors at hame’ programme for six nights every week during three months in Melbourne, then embarked on a world tour that lasted from 1872 to 1876 and took them to Tasmania, New Zealand, the United States, and Newfoundland. Kennedy’s daughter Marjory wrote a book about the journey and noted that her father saw it as his mission ‘to carry the songs of Scotland round the world to all the Scots scattered abroad’. 89 Similarly, James Scott Skinner (1843-1927), a fiddler from Banchory, went to the U.S. and Canada in 1893 90, Willie Frame addressed 3000 spectators in New York’s Carnegie Hall on 23 November 1898 with the words ‘Brither Scots, when Freens meet He’rts Warm’ 91, and Neil Kenyon, a Scotch comic based in London, played Australia, Singapore, New Guinea, Java, Sumatra, Timor, Egypt, and Algiers in 1910. 92

The interest in Scottish comedians throughout the English-speaking world and beyond was such that London and Melbourne produced their own ‘Scotch’ artists to meet demand. 93 The Australian Billy Williams (1878-1919), for example, became a famous Scotch comic in London. In 1913, he sang a song about how his wife had fallen in love with Scotland and turned into what tourism marketers of the twenty first century would call an ‘Affinity Scot’:

Since my old woman went to Scotland for a holiday
She’s got Scotland on the brain
She’s driving me insane
She used to give me eggs and bacon for my breakfast once
But I’ve been eating nothing else but porridge now for months
She does like a little bit of scotch, d’ye ken?
She does like a little bit of scotch.
In the middle of the night she begins to sing
Jumps out of bed and does a highland fling
She’s christened me Sandy
Her ways you ought to watch
It’s a braw brecht moon licht nicht d’ye ken?
She does like a wee bit of scotch, och aye!
She does like a little bit of scotch. 94

But the most famous of all Scottish Music Hall artists was, of course, Sir Harry Lauder. Born in 1870, he became a textile worker at the age of 12, worked in the coal mines at 13, sang in a temperance choir, took part in competitions, and eventually became a Music Hall star. Wherever Lauder went, he caused scenes of tartan turmoil. On his first arrival in New York in October 1907, he noted:

A very old British friend in Peter Dewar [of Dewar’s Whisky] ... had arranged for several pipers in full Highland dress to ‘blaw me ashore’ and lead the way from the pier to a tartan-draped [sic] motor-car in which I drove to the Knickerbocker Hotel. Hundreds of expatriated Scots had also turned up at the harbour; they gave tongue to vociferous cries, Hielan’ hoochs and shouts of welcome. This was all a surprise to me indeed. I had not expected anything like it.95

Lauder did 22 tours in North America and became a very wealthy man (who never tipped to uphold the Scottish thrift cliché). He also visited Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, and the Far East. His shows were popular with Scottish expatriates – but also with other audiences. Sime Silverman, the founder of Variety magazine, wrote in a review of Lauder’s first New York show, on 9 November 1907: ‘The house was crowded by his countrymen, but you did not have to wear kilts to appreciate him.’96 Lauder had plans for a film with Charles Chaplin, but it never came to it. When World War I broke out, Lauder was in Australia. He returned in 1916 and began to actively recruit soldiers in Scotland with his own recruitment band. After his son fell with the Argyll & Sutherland Highlanders in January 1917, Lauder travelled to the continent and performed for British troops at the front lines. In May or June 1917, he played for a Scottish division stationed at Aubigny-sur-Nère in France:

I was glad to see the kilted men of the Scots regiments all about me. It was them, after all, that I had come to see. I wanted to talk to them, and see them here, in France. I had seen them at hame [sic], flocking to the recruiting offices. I had seen them in their training camps. But this was different. I love all the soldiers of the Empire, but it is natural, is it no? that my warmest feeling should be for the laddies who wear the kilt.97

Fascinatingly, this encounter of Scottish playactors – soldiers in Highland costume, a singer in Highland costume – took place at a location which had played a major role in the Franco-Scottish Auld Alliance and which would much later, in the 1990s, set up one of the most colourful Scottish commemorative festivals on the European continent (see Chapter 7).

Sir Harry Lauder is as much a Scottish icon as the Highland soldier. He helped to spread the image of the kilted Scotsman and to keep it alive. He recognised the international popularity of the Scottish dreamscape and successfully cashed in on it. He played a Scot for money and inspired many other Scottish entertainers to do likewise. Lauder’s legacy is apparent in the characters of film actor James Finlayson (1887-1953), Stan and Ollie’s Bonnie Scotland (1935), the BBC-show White Heather Club (1958-1968) and the work of Scottish entertainers like accordionist Will Starr (1922-1976), singer Andy Stewart (1933-1993), and the Alexander Brothers (performing since the 1950s).98 ‘Harry Lauderism’ is a living genre.

[4.5: Alexander Brothers, c. 2007]

It is also a well-hated form of entertainment among most Scottish artists and intellectuals. Lauder stands for the adoption and wilful internalisation of the international cliché. To many, the Clan McCloon represents what Frantz Fanon called inferiorisation; the native’s acceptance of the colonists’ racist stereotypes. An obituary in the Independent called Scotch singer Andy Stewart soley ‘the Englishman’s image of Scotland in the Fifties and Sixties’. The Scottish nationalist poet Hugh MacDiarmid (1892-1978) insisted that he had ‘never met a single intelligent Scot who would be seen at a Lauder performance’. And the documentary film-maker John Grierson (1898-1972) passionately complained:

The synthetic picture of kilties and comics hurts when a nation remembers that it has been in its time both Robinson Crusoe and Paul Jones, conquered large slabs of Russia for the Czars, been so eager to fight out the fate of Canada that it provided warriors for both armies at Quebec, emancipated a couple of South American countries, developed steam and steamhammers and bridge-building and shipbuilding and road-building and modern surgery, founded logarithms and the bank of England, and travelled first down the big rivers of Africa and across Canada and Australia and, as the map will testify, many other places as well.

Grierson’s attempt to launch a Scottish counter-image, a mythology of industrial and colonial heroism, would find an echo in later works such as Arthur Herman’s How the Scots invented the modern World. But as the next section explores, complaints about Scotland’s misrepresentation in popular culture became ever more frequent in the second half of the twentieth century, when Hollywood discovered the Scottish dreamscape.

Conclusion 4.3: Many Scottish (and some non-Scottish) Music Hall artists performed as ‘Scotch Comics’ in the United Kingdom from c. 1870 to 1914; clichéd Scotsmen in Highland costume singing in strong accents. They also played in North America, Australasia, and beyond, where many thousands of Scottish expatriates (and other English-speakers) entertained nostalgia for the old country and identified with the Highland dreamscape. Harry Lauder and his colleagues actively impersonated Scottish clichés for national and international audiences and thus helped to keep the Scottish dreamscape alive. Their work inspired some of the best-known Hollywood films about Scotland.

4.4 Screen: Highlander (1986)

Highlander (1986) was not a film about Scotland. Forsyth Hardy called it ‘the most spectacular of these quasi-Scottish films’ – a Scottish-looking cinematic fantasy that had little or no relation to Scotland, the place on the map. And yet, Highlander revitalised the Scottish dreamscape at the end of the twentieth century and reminded a new generation of artists and moviegoers of the seasoned Scottish counter-world – a world of kilted warriors, ancient tradition, distinctiveness, and defence. It prepared the ground for Braveheart (1995), Mel Gibson’s spectacularly successful angry-white-male version of the Scottish Middle Ages.

Highlander was not the first Hollywood fantasy of Scotland; there is a tradition of ‘quasi-Scottish’ film-making in the United States (and in England). This chapter examines how Hollywood rewrote and disseminated the Scottish dreamscape throughout the twentieth century. It acknowledges the United States’ importance in the global distribution of Scottish aesthetics and historical myths. American popular culture has changed the ways the world sees Scotland (and many other places, too). The Scots of Europe portrayed in this study all had exposure to Hollywood-dreams of Scotland.

Scotland and cinema

Scotland has long been a popular setting, and the many films which claim to tell a Scottish story have attracted exhaustive scholarly attention; at least five monographs, two edited volumes, and numerous book chapters and articles investigate how filmmakers imagine Scotland. Braveheart alone has been discussed in at least a dozen learned essays. To examine ‘Scottish’ films must mean to look towards North America and England; the iconic films about Scotland were not made in Scotland. ‘It is primarily Hollywood and secondarily England which have produced the definitive cinematic depictions of Scotland’, states Jeffrey Richards, and Duncan Petrie remarks: Since the very beginnings of the cinema a great many films have been made which feature Scottish subject-matter, Scottish location, Scottish actors and even on occasion Scottish directors. But practically all of these have been initiated, developed, financed and produced by individuals and companies based either in London or Los Angeles.

It is fair to say that this state of affairs has somewhat changed in the past decades. Scottish filmmakers have begun to formulate their own visions of Scotland in the 1980s and 1990s. John Brown’s 1983 claim that ‘cinema audiences in Scotland are not at all accustomed to seeing Scottish movies’ is no longer fully valid.\textsuperscript{108} In the wake of Bill Forsyth’s \textit{Gregory’s Girl} (1981) and \textit{Local Hero} (1983), Scottish directors and screenwriters have increased production and enjoyed success with both Scottish and international audiences. Danny Boyle’s \textit{Trainspotting} (1996) was one of the most important European independent films of the 1990s, and it distributed a new image of urban Scotland that contrasted starkly with Hollywood’s tartan clichés. Other new Scottish films include \textit{Shallow Grave} (1994), \textit{Orphans} (1998), \textit{Ratcatcher} (1999), \textit{Morvern Callar} (2002), \textit{Young Adam} (2003), \textit{Dear Frankie} (2004), \textit{Red Road} (2006), and \textit{Hallam Foe} (2007). And yet, this new wave of Scottish cinema had only limited impact outside the European arthouse scene. The films that really spread Scottish aesthetics to the far corners of the world at the end of the twentieth century – \textit{Highlander} (1986), \textit{Rob Roy} (1995), \textit{Braveheart} (1995) – were still made in Hollywood. They were also still dominated by tartan, kilts, and bagpipes.

North American filmmakers have made use of Scottish symbols from a very early stage in cinema history. In 1908, the U.S. production company Vitagraph came up with \textit{The Chieftain’s Revenge – A Tragedy in the Highlands of Scotland}. In 1909, Edison produced adaptations of Walter Scott’s \textit{Lochinstar} and \textit{Kenilworth}, and in 1912 Vitagraph followed with Scott’s \textit{The Lady of the Lake} and JM Barrie’s \textit{The Little Minister}. Duncan Petrie notes that by 1914, six films portrayed the life of Mary Queen of Scots.\textsuperscript{109} \textit{Annie Laurie} (1927) was a nine-reel costume film that dealt with a Clan feud in ancient Scotland and featured film star Lillian Gish and dozens of kilted warriors. Other important ‘Scottish’ films before 1945 include the adaptations of RL Stevenson’s \textit{Kidnapped} (‘the most enduring celluloid image of Scotland’, according to Jeffrey Richards, brought to the screen in 1917, 1937, 1948, 1960, 1971, 1995)\textsuperscript{110}, and the comical ghost story \textit{The Ghost Goes West} (1935), in which an undead Scotsman and his castle are magically transported to contemporary Florida.

\[\text{[4.7: The Ghost Goes West, 1935, International Film Posters]}\]

But all these early Scottish visions were eclipsed by Vincente Minnelli’s \textit{Brigadoon} (1954), a smash-hit musical that many consider Hollywood’s definitive take on Scotland to this day. In \textit{Brigadoon}, two American tourists (Gene Kelly and Van Johnson) embark on a hunting trip in the Scottish Highlands, lose their way and stumble across an enchanted village where time stands still. The Americans are fascinated by this reservoir of Highland history and assist the villagers in the protection of their past.\textsuperscript{111} \textit{Brigadoon} makes no attempt whatsoever to portray Scotland realistically and was shot entirely in a U.S. film studio. Forsyth Hardy calls it ‘the archetypical film of a bogus Scotland’, and Colin McArthur sees in it the main ‘distortion of Scotland in Hollywood cinema’.\textsuperscript{112} \textit{Brigadoon} powerfully reactivated popular notions of Scotland as a land of history and magic. In Britain, ‘Brigadoon’ became a fixed expression for an over-the-top assemblage of tartan kitsch; it was famously employed in the successful romantic comedy Four Weddings and a Funeral (1994), when at the sight of a lavish Scottish wedding a spectator comments: 'It's bloody Brigadoon!'

Brigadoon was the last film in the comic kiltie tradition that recalled the work of Harry Lauder. In the second half of the twentieth century, American filmmakers employed Scotland as a setting for more serious male heroism. Cinema had been largely directed at female audiences before World War II, both in Europe and North America, but in the 1950s, young men discovered the silver screen, and they liked their Scotsmen rougher.113 Walt Disney’s Rob Roy, the Highland Rogue (1953), The Master of Ballantrae (1953, with a swashbuckling Errol Flynn), Quentin Durward (1955), and Kidnapped (1960) still featured tartan and kilts, but the men who wore them had changed. Susan Harper points out the differences between the ‘languid and often feminised heroes’ of the 1930s bodice-ripper films who clearly had ‘constituted a spectacle for females’ – and the new Highland warriors of the 1950s: ‘In the [new] Scottish epics, it was male energy which was celebrated. The heroes are better at running up a burn than they are at making love. These were costume films for men.’114 The new Scottish heroes had the rugged manliness of a John Wayne, and director Harold French straightforwardly called his Rob Roy (1953) ‘a Western in Kilts’.115

The late 1970s and 1980s saw the rise of the angry white male in American filmmaking. Whether the genre was science-fiction, crime, horror, or heroic fantasy, dozens of movies were suddenly populated by white primitives, muscle-packed rebels who fought the world alone. This was the time of Conan the Barbarian (1982) and Tarzan – Lord of the Apes (1984),116 the moment when John Rambo became the wild and inarticulate guerrilla fighter he had failed to conquer in Vietnam (First Blood, 1982), when Robert de Niro expressed his disgust for modern society with a Mohawk haircut and an array of automatic weapons (Taxi Driver, 1976), and when Michael Douglas lost his temper again and again (Falling Down, 1993).117 Angry white men rebelled against modernity (Rambo throws rocks at a helicopter), an increasingly technological society that has no use for their skills, and against the loss of male authority. Graham Thompson thinks that the 1980s saw a boom of ‘hypermasculine’ celluloid heroes who ‘reasserted a sense of cultural and social authority’ after the success of feminism in the 1970s.118 The most famous angry white Scotsman of that period is Braveheart (1995) – the vengeful, homophobe rebel who paints his face and bares his behind to the enemy. Aesthetically, however, Braveheart was inspired by Highlander (1986).

The immortal Scot

Highlander is a fantasy film about an immortal Highland warrior. Connor Macleod (played by Frenchman Christopher Lambert) is a Highland Scot, ‘born in 1518 in the village of Glenfinnan on the shores of Loch Shiel’, as he himself declares during the film. The movie shows how Macleod is fatally wounded in a Clan feud in 1536 but, unnaturally, survives his injuries and recovers. His superstitious kin fear Macleod might be possessed by the devil and expel him from the village. The Highlander settles down in the wilderness with a woman named Heather (Beatie Edney), but peace is disturbed when the Egyptian dandy Ramírez (Sean Connery) appears to inform Macleod that he is an ‘Immortal’, a member of an undying race and destined to live forever until the time of ‘The Gathering’. Immortals, Ramírez explains, roam the world and cannot die unless they are beheaded. When one Immortal beheads the other, the accumulated knowledge of the dying is transferred onto the survivor. The last two Immortals standing will meet at The Gathering and compete for ‘The Prize’; universal knowledge, the sum of all Immortal wisdom. Ramírez stays in the Highlands and teaches Macleod to decapitate enemies, but then The Kurgan (Clancy Brown) arrives, a dark Immortal from the Russian steppe who beheads Ramírez and rapes Heather. Macleod remains in Scotland with his wife, but while he stays young forever, she grows old and dies. Broken-hearted, Macleod wanders the world, forever faithful, forever lonely. In 1985, Macleod and The Kurgan meet again in New York City. The time of The Gathering has come. In the end, as the enemies keep reminding each other, ‘there can be only one’.

Highlander was written in a 1981 screenwriting class at the University of California film school by then twenty-year-old student Gregory Widen. The author was inspired by a holiday trip to London where he had visited the Tower of London and its large collection of armoury. Widen wondered how it would be ‘if you had actually worn all this, over a long period of time’, at different stages in a very long life. Some Scottish items in the collection seem to have made a particular impression. Widen’s film school supervisor, Professor Richard Walter, liked the script, originally entitled Clan of One. The manuscript found its way to producers William Panzer and Peter S. Davis who had it rewritten several times. A crew was assembled and sent to Britain (where the producers would ‘get more bang for the buck’).

Highlander was no success with the critics when it came to theatres in the United States around Christmas 1985. Co-producer William Panzer remembers hiding in his house for three days, shocked by the rejection. Reviewers mocked the film for being stylish, but superficial and woodenly acted. Much fun was made of Christopher Lambert’s past as Tarzan in Greystoke (1984) and of the Australian director Russell Mulcahey’s experience with music video clips – the fast and flashy new medium everybody talked about in the mid-1980s. The New York Times called Highlander hollow and noted that ‘it should surprise nobody if excerpts [of Highlander] appear on the music video channel’. Furthermore, ‘Highlander keeps on exploding for almost two hours, with nothing at stake’. The Films & Filming magazine called Highlander a piece of ‘unabashed hokum’ and noted that ‘the sequences set in sixteenth century Scotland alternately resemble a Monty Python sketch and an advertisement for Mentholated cigarettes.’ Few people foresaw the film’s longevity in 1986.

Some two years after Highlander’s premier, the supporting actress Roxanne Hart received a late night phone call from her brother in Boston. He reported that there were people outside his house dressed as Scottish swordfighters, queuing for a midnight screening of Highlander. Hart thinks that the costumed film fans recited the film’s lines by heart, just as in the famous night screenings of the Rocky Horror Picture Show. Highlander became a cult film. By 2007, it had spawned four feature-length sequels, 119 episodes of syndicated TV series (1992-1998), numerous comics and animation films, and a flood of merchandise. Large and dedicated fan clubs from Australia to Germany continue to publish fanzines, hold conventions, and organise tours through the Highlands. A remake of the original movie is in the making. The fan-authored ‘Encyclopedia of Fantasy’ agrees that Highlander is still ‘widely castigated as incoherent, illogical and unresolved’ but insists that these negativisms are ‘unimportant in the context of this cult movie’s undoubted power and glamour; it’s frenetic glitz complements and enhances the sense of magic.\(^{129}\)

[4.8: Christopher Lambert as Highlander, 1986]

[4.9: Mel Gibson as Braveheart, 1995]

It is futile to speculate too much about a film’s success or failure, but it appears that Highlander profited from three main factors. To begin with, its ‘frenetic glitz’ has aged only little since 1986. Highlander was the work of visual pioneers; set designer Allan Cameron became one of the top architects in Hollywood, responsible for Willow (1988), Starship Troopers (1997), and The Mummy (1999). Similarly, costume artist James Acheson is responsible for Terry Gilliam’s Brazil (1985), Bernardo Bertolucci’s The Last Emperor (1987) and the Spiderman series (from 2002). The exploding flashes which so unnerved critics in 1986 became the new aesthetics of modern action film. Highlander’s success was further aided by the mid-1980s video clip boom and the highly successful soundtrack by British rock band Queen who wrote one of their greatest hits for the film (‘Who wants to live forever’). As Thompson notes: ‘In the 1980s, ... music video became a way of selling films while films became a way of selling music.’\(^ {130}\)

For the makers themselves, it was the film’s setting which did the trick. Highlander was shot on original locations in Scotland, among them Glen Nevis, Glenfinnan, Eilan Donan Castle, Glen Coe, and the Cullin mountains on Skye. The filmmakers created a pre-modern, empty Scotland for Highlander. In a 1985 set interview, director Russell Mulcahy revealed that he intended to capture a Scotland that would contrast to the urban scenes of Manhattan: ‘Scotland is all very earthy, grand and very sweeping. Whereas the modern city is more a battlefield within a city.’\(^ {131}\) This portrayal of Scotland as a counter-world to the hostile modern city followed the Scottish dreamscape’s tradition and was later adopted by the makers of Braveheart, too, where the English are always indoors while the Scots live under the open sky.132 To set designer Allan Cameron and photographer Gerry Fisher, the Scottish extras and their enthusiasm also helped to make the film and especially the sixteenth-century battle-scenes credible and ‘authentic’. ‘We got all the locals from Fort William and the towns around to come and fight’, recalls Cameron. The day was cold and wet, and many of the 800 to 1000 extras had a warming drink before the shoot. In the end, the battle scenes turned out almost too realistic. Fisher thinks that ‘they redid, relived the battle – the real battle. They were actually physically hitting each other.’ Cameron adds how one tall and red-haired extra wandered off at the end of the day, still wearing his kilt and waving his prop sword, singing happily as he disappeared into the fog: ‘He was a real Scotsman … and nobody dared to ask him about giving back the gear’.133 In this reading, Highlander was no fantasy of Scottish history, but a recording or re-awakening of the real thing.

But perhaps the main reason for Highlander’s success was Christopher Lambert and his appeal to female audiences. Lambert had become something of sex symbol with Tarzan, and he remembers that while shooting Highlander in Scotland, people would point at him and Sean Connery and say: ‘Oh, look, James Bond and Tarzan.’134 After Greystoke, the offers for further film roles had not to been Lambert’s liking: ‘they were all the same – you know, half naked somewhere.’135 The Highlander was dressed – but only scantily, in a flowing plaid with bare legs. Connor Macleod was an angry white male with a soft heart and puppy eyes. He managed to please both the action-seeking male moviegoer, as he cut up slickly dressed Wall Street type adversaries in New York City like a vengeful white primitive flown in from the past, but he also moved the more romantic minds and hearts. A female interviewer for Films and Filming magazine argues that Lambert’s heroes ‘are vulnerable, likeable men’.136 Macleod’s faithfulness to his wife and his lonely journey through the centuries after her death is a key theme in the movie which arguably inspired a whole genre of Highlander Romance novels (see below). The following of Highlander is a decidedly female one, and Lambert and his television clones are at the centre of their ongoing attention.

Highlander produced a highly stylised update of the Scottish dreamscape. It packed medieval swashbuckling, 1980s action-film heroism, science-fiction time travel, Gothic Vampirism and immortality, as well as a romantic love-story into the Scottish Highlands. The Highlander had something of Ossian, a lone Highland warrior, the last of his kind, something of the Highland soldier, waving his claymore, an ‘ethnic’ warrior, even something of Harry Lauder, a comical Highlander, clumsy and likeable at the beginning of the film. Like an Immortal, the Highlander travelled through popular culture for the past two centuries.

Regressive myths?

Of course, there is more than one celluloid image of Scotland. A complete survey of Scotland’s cinematic representations would take us from the mean crofter in Alfred Hitchcock’s The 39 Steps (1935) to the drunken cowboys in the Italian Spaghetti Western Sette Pistole per i MacGregor (1966), and from Alec Guinness’ military melancholy in Tunes of Glory (1960) to Groundskeeper Willie, the angry, red-haired Scottish superintendent in The Simpsons cartoon series who the Sunday Times called 'the most instantly recognisable Scot in the world: better known than Billy Connolly or Ewan McGregor, even Sean Connery.'

Willie was introduced in 1991 and apparently inspired by the ill-tempered Scottish chef Angus Crock from the 1980s Canadian Second City Television series. Even if we would find elements of the Scottish dreamscape in Hitchcock’s dark and misty Scotland, the roguish hotheadedness in the MacGregor cowboys (Rob Roy was a MacGregor), the martial ethos in Tunes of Glory, and white hot anger in Groundskeeper Willie; there are many cinematic Scotlands.

And yet, the Scottish dreamscape dominates all other images. This has raised concern from Scottish scholars and intellectuals. The fact that most American (and English) films please to imagine Scotland as a pre-modern Highland land of tartan, kilts, and bagpipes makes them complain about misrepresentation, ‘Scotsploitation’, even cultural imperialism.

They are particularly enraged if this imperialism is successful, if Hollywood’s version of Scotland is adopted by the Scots. Colin McArthur, defender of a tartan-free Scotland, desairs over his compatriots’ love for Braveheart (1995):

> It is a mark of Scotland’s provincialism that it has regularly feted (in the form of breathless national and local media coverage) those Hollywood stars who have come there and, what is worse, celebrated those films which have constructed Scotland within regressive discourses. ... It is a mark of the self-lacerative qualities of the Scots (nowhere more apparent than in their response to Braveheart) that they consequently mistake shit for manna.

In recent years, however, this critique has softened considerably, and the Scottish debate on Hollywood imperialism has been recognised to be strangely insular. After all, Scotland is not the only place in the world that has lost authority over her visualisations and narratives. Austria discusses cuckoo clocks and The Sound of Music (1965), Greece has to deal with Anthony Quinn’s Zorba the Greek (1964) and the tourists who demand to see the Greece they know. Just like literature and visual arts in earlier times, cinema forms public opinions about peoples and nations – not only in Scotland, all over the world. If the pseudo-Scottish films of Hollywood are mistaken for Scottish history or reality, it is up to the Scots to produce the better films. Alan Riach notes that the culture of America ‘bleeds into Scotland’ but hopes that this fact may bring ‘an enhancement of sharp wit and caustic, derisive laughter’ and a form of ‘counter-appropriation’.

Conclusion 4.4: The iconic films about Scotland were made in North America and England. They employ Scotland’s historically seasoned Highland dreamscape, the world of kilts, tartan, and bagpipes. Its early depictions were mostly based on Scottish Romantic literature. Visually, the comic Scotch singers of Music Hall were an important influence, too. With the rise of the angry white male and new barbarians in opposition to feminism and the slick yuppie world, the Scottish Aesthetic became a setting for more savage heroes in the 1980s. Highlander (1986) marked a starting point on which Braveheart (1995) could build up. Hollywood films revitalised the Scottish dreamscape at the end of the twentieth century.

4.5 Are there Scotswomen?

A Scots-authored guidebook to Scotland and its inhabitants describes quite accurately how the outside world sees the Scots:

The Scotsman of popular imagination is a tartan-swathed figure of heroic strength, red-haired, red-bearded and spoiling for a fight – an image that the Scots are happy to accept, particularly the stocky, unfit, balding ones.¹⁴⁴

The Scotsman of popular imagination also appears to be a man. Masculinity, physical strength, and a certain hairy belligerence are vital aspects of Scotland’s international stereotype. The kilt is a male garment, and there is no female equivalent. ‘Are there Scotswomen?’, asks Petra Dolata in an essay on German imaginations of Scotland, and it seems that there are none.¹⁴⁵ Mary Queen of Scots and many benevolent and mischievous missionaries must stand back behind William Wallace, Robert the Bruce, Bonnie Prince Charlie, the Highland soldier, even Sean Connery and Ewan Macgregor.¹⁴⁶ The Scottish dreamscape is gendered, the Scottish dreamscape is male. This strange eclipse (or silencing) of Scottish women would surely deserve its own study. Some more creative explanations aside¹⁴⁷, it appears that it results largely from the over-dominant image of the Highland soldier which came to stand for Scotland in the nineteenth century and was adopted by the Scots themselves. This image left no room for a female counterpart.

This said, there is no shortage of female Scotland-enthusiasts – and there never has been. The Scottish dreamscape and its vision of heroic masculinity survived and spread with the help of female agents and audiences. The most famous of all female Scotland-fans was, of course, Queen Victoria (r. 1837-1901) who spent so much of her time at Balmoral Castle and away from London that she caused political disruption. Her fondness for her Highland servant John Brown was a much discussed scandal. In her widely read Highland Journals, Victoria lauded the beauty of the kilted male; the 42nd Highlanders were ‘such a chivalrous, fine, active people’, men who ‘looked very handsome in their kilts’.¹⁴⁸ While the ‘traditional erotic frisson of the “Highland Laddie”’ may have its origins in earlier times, it was Queen ¹⁴⁶ It remains to be seen whether pop singers Annie Lennox, Shirley Manson, and Amy Macdonald can break this male dominance.

¹⁴⁷ Martin suggests that female figures are often used to represent nation (Marianne, Britannia), and that ‘Scotland developed no female emblem of its nationhood because it neither had, nor in the nineteenth century sought, an independent existence’. Maureen M. Martin, The Mighty Scot. Nation, Gender, and the Nineteenth Century Mystique of Scottish Masculinity (New York: SUNY Press, 2009), 32.
Victoria who made it known throughout Britain. Under her reign, the Scot became a symbol of primal masculinity. This primal masculinity became a vital ingredient of the Scottish dreamscape.

As Maureen M. Martin shows in an interesting study, this symbol proved attractive to men as well. As nineteenth-century modernisation turned many British men from physical workers into office clerks, questions arose about male identities. Nostalgia for old-fashioned manhood and worry about the healthy male body were abundant. English upper and middle class tourists travelled to Scotland to re-connect with their masculinity by stalking deer and shooting grouse. They put on the archaic dress of the Highlander and re-enacted manhood in the Scottish ‘virility theme-park’ to discover their ‘inner Scot’.

The Highland soldier’s erotic potential continued to fascinate men and women in the twentieth century. In a 1940 short story by French-American writer Anaïs Nin, Maman, an aging brothel manager in Paris, inflames over the idea of a Scottish regiment. The passage deserves to be quoted in full:

Maman’s greatest adventure had been the parade of the Scots soldiers one spring morning. While drinking at a bar, she had heard a conversation about the Scotsmen. A man said: ‘They take them young and train them to walk that way. It’s a special walk. Difficult, very difficult. There is a coup de fesse, a swing which makes the hips and the sporran swing just right. If the sporran does not swing, it’s a failure. The step is more intricate than a ballet dancer’s.’

Maman was thinking: Each time the sporran swings, and the skirt swings, why, the other hangings must swing too. And her old heart was moved. Swing. Swing. All at the same time. There was an ideal army. She would have liked to follow such an army, in any capacity. One, two, three. She was already moved enough by the swing of the pendants when the man at the bar added: ‘And do you know, they wear nothing underneath.’

They wore nothing underneath! These sturdy men, such upright, lusty men! Heads high, strong naked legs and skirts – why, it made them as vulnerable as a woman. Big lusty men, tempting as a woman and naked underneath. Maman wanted to be turned into a cobblestone, to be stepped on, but to be allowed to look under the short skirt at the hidden ‘sporran’ swinging with each step. Maman felt congested. The bar was too hot. She needed air.

She watched the parade. Each step taken by the Scotsmen was like a step taken into her very own body, she vibrated so. One, two, three. A dance over her abdomen, savage and even, the fur sporran swinging like pubic hair. Maman was as warm as a day in July. She could think of nothing else but of elbowing her way to the front of the crowd and then slipping on her knees and simulating a faint. But all she saw were vanishing legs under pleated plaid skirts. Later, lying against the policeman’s knee, she rolled her eyes upwards as if she were going to have an attack. If the parade would only turn and walk over her.

Less explicitly, the erotic Scot was a recurring theme in the many Hollywood rhapsodies on Scotland, from the handsome phantom in The Ghost goes West (1935) to Richard Todd’s Rob Roy (1953), and from Christopher Lambert’s soft macho (Highlander, 1986) to Mel Gibson’s valiant impregnation of the English Queen (Braveheart, 1995). A more recent and less often discussed expression of interest in the erotic Scotsman is the largely American literary genre of Highlander Romance novels. Since the early 1990s, dozens of these are published every year and sold by the many thousands, in English and in translations. The works usually sport half-naked muscular white men in tartan or kilt on their covers and carry titles like To tame a Highland Warrior (Karen Marie Moning, 1999), Devil in a Kilt (Sue-Ellen Welfonder, 2001), The Irresistible MacRae (Karen Ranney, 2002), Highlander in Love (Julia London, 2005), and Highland Barbarian (Hannah Howell, 2006). They are bodice-ripper-novels and mainly interested in the Highlander’s quality as a lover.

By far the most successful Scottish Romance author is the U.S. American writer Diane Gabaldon (born 1952). Gabaldon’s Outlander series started in 1991 and has inspired a huge following.152 The major theme in Outlander and its sequels appears to be female discontent with contemporary masculinity. The American heroine Claire Randall is a medical nurse and locked in a ‘paternal, virtually sexless’ relationship with her academic husband. Dissatisfaction evaporates when Claire travels back through time after touching a circle of standing stones while on holiday in Scotland. Claire finds herself in the Scotland of 1743 and meets Jamie Fraser – ‘a primordial Scot who awakens her passions.’153 In her search for real masculinity, Claire found the one true reservoir; the Scottish dreamscape. This is the place where heroic yet chivalrous masculinity may be found aplenty.

Time-travel – already familiar from The Ghost goes West (1935) and Highlander (1986) – is a recurring theme in all Highlander novels. Scotsmen from the past swim through time to release twenty-first-century American women from frustration with modern men. In Moning’s Kiss of the Highlander, heroine Gwen Cassidy is still a virgin at 25. ‘Come to think of it she wasn’t sure if she’d ever seen a grand passion outside of a movie theatre or a book.’154 She departs on a holiday to Scotland and is surprised and angry to learn that women there have a more exciting love life than her. Sulkingly, Gwen goes for a lonely hike around Loch Ness but ends up falling down a ravine, ‘awakening Drustan MacKeltar, a Scottish laird who has been slumbering there for 500 years under a gypsy’s spell.’155 Drustan’s manliness is the pleasurable antidote to modernity Gwen had been looking for.

In their frustration with modern gender roles, American writers and thousands of their (largely female) readers build up an erotic Scottish dreamworld. The Scottish dreamscape serves as a reminder of what ‘real men’ used to be. They clearly wore kilts, and they were both wild and gallant. As a senior editor of a U.S. publishing house that specialises in Romance novels explains, the appeal of the Highlander results from ‘the sense that he is a powerful, dangerously masculine figure, but that he shows through his clan loyalties that he has a caring nurturing side’.\textsuperscript{156} As will become apparent in the subsequent chapters, there are many women among the Scots of Europe who like to dress up their men as Highlanders.

\textbf{Conclusion 4.5:} The image of the Scottish Highlander came to stand for primal masculinity in the course of the nineteenth-century. In the Highland mythology, there exists no female equivalent to the ultra-masculine Scottish Highlander. The Scottish dreamscape is gendered. As a reminder of ‘traditional manhood’, the Highlander has fascinated both men and women. The most recent expression of an ongoing female interest in the Scottish dreamscape are Scottish Romance novels.

\textbf{Conclusion Chapter 4}

Kilted Scottish warriors have fascinated readers, dreamers, and moviegoers for more than 200 years. The Scottish dreamscape is a seasoned set of myths and images. When the Hollywood films \textit{Highlander} (1986) and \textit{Braveheart} (1995) revitalised and re-disseminated Scottish myths and images at the end of the twentieth century, their success was made possible not by their novelty, but their familiarity. Poets, novelists, writers, comedians, and filmmakers have helped to turn the Scottish dreamscape into a global fantasy of a local identity.

To be sure, this chapter only touched the surface of the rich body of cultural productions which employ Scottish images and help to spread Scotland’s global mythology. We still wait for a scholarly treatment of the nineteenth-century Russian Burns Supper phenomenon, the surprising number of Scottish-themed Wild West films, the survival of kilted regiments and pipe bands throughout the former colonies of the British Empire, and the international effect of Scottish musical groups such as Runrig or the Bay City Rollers.

The following chapters document the Scots of Europe, the continental enthusiasts who impersonate mythical Scots at the beginning of the twenty first century. In one form or another, these playactors all had exposure to the Scottish dreamscape. They have witnessed a regimental pipe band on parade, enjoyed a film with a Scottish theme, or read about wild Highlanders in Romance novels. The Scots of Europe perform the Scottish dreamscape.

WALL OF DRONE: PIPE BANDS

On the parking lot, dozens of pipers and drummers are getting ready to march. Some bustle around half-dressed, still looking for kilt socks, bonnets, brogues, and sgian dubhs in the trunks of their cars. Others stand ready in full Highland regalia in the early morning haze and warm up their instruments. The dissonant drone of the Great Highland Bagpipe carries across the empty fields of Flanders and may be heard on the roads to Tongeren and Bilzen, the two next larger towns.¹ Twenty kilted pipe bands will compete this Friday at Schotse Weekend in Alden Biesen, Belgium’s largest Scottish festival with more than 25 000 visitors.² Most participating bands hail from Flanders and the Netherlands, but some have come from France, Sweden, Denmark, and England.³ In earlier years the Schotse Weekend had featured some renowned bands from Scotland, but in 2009, the event’s 24th edition, only the adjudicators are Scottish, flown in by the Royal Scottish Pipe Band Association, Glasgow.

The pipe band competition takes place in the castle park. The first band to enter the ring at ten a.m. are The Lowland Pipers of Turnhout, a city near Antwerp, Belgium. Spectators lean on the metal fences which close off the ring, some of the elderly have brought camping chairs that fold up into walking sticks. The Lowland Pipers march in a formation of twelve. Two of the drummers are teenagers and visibly nervous; they have their eyes fixed on their older colleagues and follow their every move. The Lowland Pipers are one of Belgium’s oldest pipe bands, founded in 1963 by the Sint Joris boy scouts of Turnhout.⁴ Most of the original members have retired or passed away, but the band keeps renewing itself. The Lowlanders still practice at the boy scouts’ headquarters, every Wednesday and Friday evening from 7 to 10 p.m.

Now The Lowland Pipers are being inspected. Four kilted adjudicators circle them, pokerfaced, unsmiling, taking notes on their clipboards, following the official Royal Scottish Pipe Band Association’s guidelines to establish the bands’ musical abilities, their synchronicity of step, their attire and overall style. With their feathered caps, stout figures, and swift movements, the judges remind of giant roosters examining their prey. The Lowland Pipers wear their day dress, not full regalia; no kilt jackets but white long-sleeved shirts and dark vests, kilts made of red Royal Stuart tartan, white socks, black bonnets. The pipers have tied dark green ribbons to their instruments which flutter in the wind. The adjudicators do not give away their feelings, but even an amateur can spot that the Lowlanders’ kilts vary greatly in length and that the bass drummer’s sporran should not be worn like a lady’s handbag. The Lowland Pipers will end up seventh in the Grade 4 competition. But, as they inform the author afterwards, they have come to have fun, not to win.

² This according to the organisers. Our own estimate for 2009 confirms this.
The Schotse Weekend is one of the largest and most popular Scottish events of Europe. It was set up in 1986 as by members of the Antwerp & District Pipe Band (est. 1978). None of the founders were Scottish by birth, ancestry, or residence. In its early years, the weekend attracted only modest crowds and took place in changing locations. But in the early 1990s, the event grew and the pipers moved to the expansive premises of Landscommanderij Alden Biesen in 1994, a sixteenth-century castle in Belgium’s Limburg province. By the year 2009, the Schotse Weekend had evolved into a three-day Scottish spectacle. The organisers handled a budget of more than a hundred thousand Euro, and the festival programme featured well-known Scottish folk music acts such as Dougie MacLean, Capercaillie, and the Red Hot Chilli Pipers. Highland Games or 'Schotse Volksspelen' were held, other attractions included Highland Dancing, whisky tasting, a Scottish market, a story-telling tent, and historical re-enactors demonstrating 'authentic' Clan warfare. There also was a variety of non-Scottish fringe entertainment such falconry shows, sheep herding, children's animations, and, bizarrely, a flyball racing track for dogs. Many dog owners showed up wearing kilt-like garments to acknowledge the festival theme. For most guests, however, the highlight at Alden Biesen remains the annual Belgian pipe band championship and the powerful sight and sound of the massed pipes at the end of the festival. In 2003, the European Pipe Band Championship was held at Alden Biesen which featured over 100 kilted pipe and drum bands from the whole continent.

Scottish playacting began with pipe and drum bands. Musicians were the first to dress up regularly in Highland costume and host Scottish festivals and competitions on the European continent. This chapter examines the history of Scottish piping in Europe. It first examines how bagpipers came to be associated with Scotland. It then examines what the continental pipe bands of today have in common, what makes them part of an international piping community rather than just Dutch, Flemish, and Austrian bands. And it finally takes a look at the two main motivations which inspired the first kilted pipe bands in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, namely the imitation of kilted soldiers and the quest for a lost European folk music tradition. Scottish pipe bands have commemorative functions. They bring back recent history and re-imagine the distant past.

5.1 Piping and the Scots

The bagpipe is one of Scotland’s best known cultural symbols. It is so widely associated with Scotland that the image of the Great Highland Bagpipe has eclipsed that of all other bagpipes in most parts of Western Europe (and North America). For most outside the narrow circles of folk music expertise, to play the pipes is a Scottish thing to do. The pipes mark and make the Scots, and they do so internationally. Joshua Dickson of the Royal Scottish Academy of Music and Drama suggests that the bagpipes have acquired symbolic meaning as a national instrument – ‘in communities both in Scotland and throughout the Scottish diaspora’. In his autobiography, the entertainer Harry Lauder observed how people around the world use bagpipes to demonstrate their Scottish affiliations. In 1925, Lauder met a Chinese gentleman in Rangoon who, to Lauder’s delight, owned a set of bagpipes and played them well, performing the ‘waggle walk of the real Scottish piper’. It turned out that, as a young man, Mr ‘Sugar King’ Lim had been sent to Scotland to attend Dollar Academy in Clackmannanshire. There he had served as pipe major to the Academy’s pipe band. To Lauder, this makes the Chinaman a Scot: ‘Harry Lauder and Mr. Lim, grand Scots both, parted the best of friends and cronies.’

The bagpipes express and provide Scottishness.

The Scots did not invent the bagpipes. Up until the eighteenth century, bag-powered reed instruments were common all over Europe (see Chapter 5.4). As some of the famous paintings by Pieter Brueghel the Younger (1564-1638) and Albrecht Dürer (1471-1528) show, bagpipes were played by herders, buskers, and soldiers at fairs and at court. Scotland’s piping tradition developed in a thoroughly European context, and at least one scholar suggested that one of the most famous piper dynasties of the Highlands, the MacCrimmons of Skye, may have been immigrants from the Italian city of Cremona.

[5.1: Albrecht Dürer, Sackpfeifer, 1514]

Early forms of the bagpipe have been played in Northern and Western Scotland from the fifteenth century. They served as ceremonial instruments, at dances, fairs, and in battle. One of the first references to Scottish piping is found in L’Histoire de la Guerre d’Ecosse, published in Paris in 1556. It describes a gathering of Scottish soldiers before the Battle of Pinkie in 1547, where ‘...the wild [sauvages] Scots encouraged themselves to arms by the sound of their bagpipes [cornemeuses]’. Bagpipes had a military function. Consequently, British authorities considered Highland pipers a military threat at the time of the Jacobite rebellions. After Culloden (1746), authorities treated the use of pipes in combat as armed aggression against the state. On 15 November 1746, the piper James Reid was executed at York as a Jacobite rebel. ‘In his trial which was reported in the Scots Magazine it was alleged in his defence that he had not carried arms, but the Court observed that a Highland regiment never marched without a piper and therefore that his bagpipe in the eyes of the law was an instrument of war.’

Because of their weapon-like status, bagpipes were temporarily banned in Scotland after Culloden with the Disarming Act. The mid-eighteenth century saw a ‘steep decline’ of piping in the Highlands, and by 1770, ‘there was concern that bagpipe playing was in danger of extinction’.

Ironically, the pipes’ survival was mainly ensured by their incorporation into the British Army. As examined in Chapter 4.2, many Highland men joined the Army in the second half of the eighteenth century. Pipers figured prominently in their newly established Highland regiments, and the image of the kilted bagpiper was soon carried out into the world by the troops of Empire. Scottish bagpipes have played at Waterloo in 1815, in Crimea in 1854, during the Indian Mutiny in 1857, at Passchendaele in 1917, at the D-Day landing in 1944, and in Hong Kong when the British flag was lowered in 1997. Scottish piping is inextricably linked with the British military. As is examined in Chapter 7, popular commemorations of Scottish warfare in Europe often involve kilted pipers, and there are several European pipe bands which see themselves as ‘commemorative’ bands and even ‘mobile monuments’.

The piper-soldiers who impressed the world with their sounds and looks were not necessarily Scottish by birth. With the growing popularity of the Highland regiments, several English and Irish units adopted pipers and kilted pipe bands in the nineteenth and twentieth century. When the British Army left for the Falklands in 1982, the two regiments which brought pipers with them were the Scots Guards and the 7th Duke of Edinburgh’s Own Gurkha Rifles. Some of the kilted regiments which helped liberate the Netherlands in World War II and which inspired the first imitative pipe bands were not British but Canadian (e.g., the 48th Highlanders of Canada, established in 1891). And as noted earlier, some of Britain’s former colonies in Asia and the Middle East retained military pipe bands after their independence. Thomas S. Abler counted 23 Indian infantry regiments with pipe bands in 1999, and several of them wore tartan kilts or plaids. The bands from the Punjab regiment to the Jammu and Kashmir Light Infantry. Regimental pipe bands also survive in South Africa, Pakistan, and the Middle East. All of these bands are staffed exclusively with non-Scots today. These borrowings reflect the martial value associated with the Scottish regiments and their pipers.

Pipe bands were set up in the British Army for the purpose of military parading and competition. The War Office order of 11 February 1854 which established that all Highland Regiments should have ‘1 Pipe Major and 5 Pipers’ is often seen as the beginning of the pipe band tradition. But it is likely that the order only formalised an established practice; Lieut. Col. Murray claims that by 1854, the first year of the Crimean War, pipe band practice was ‘in fact a good-going strong concern’.

Towards the end of the nineteenth century, marching pipe and drum bands became popular outwith the confines of military in Scotland. Police and Fire brigades in Edinburgh and

Glasgow set up pipe bands in the 1880s, and the first civilian pipe band competition seems to have been promoted by Glasgow Rangers Football Club in the same decade. One of the first pipe band competitions that took place in the Highlands was the 1897 world championships at Cowal Highland Gathering.\(^{21}\) The Scottish (later Royal Scottish) Pipe Band Association was founded in 1930 in the city of Glasgow. Today, Scottish schools, community councils, and commercial companies sponsor their own pipe bands. As Hugh Cheape notes, pipe bands are ‘the live wire through which most people’s experience of the bagpipe has been transmitted’.\(^ {22}\)

Civilian pipe bands consist of pipers and a section of bass and tenor drummers. Their musical director is the pipe major, and on parade the band may be lead by a drum major, swinging a mace. If several bands march together they form ‘massed pipes and drums’. All musicians dress in Highland attire, and the sartorial dimension of piping is vital. Musicians dress up to perform. The Swedish piper and author Mats d’Hermansson calls this the ‘extramusical traits’ and the ‘peacock aesthetic’ of Scottish piping.\(^ {23}\) Almost all pipe bands admit women since c. the 1970s, and musicians are dressed unisex. For purists, pipe and drum bands (and Highland Dancing groups) are thus the only proper setting for a woman to wear the kilt.\(^ {24}\)

[5.2: Female Pipers, Częstochowa Pipe Band, Poland]

Civilian pipe and drum bands became a popular vehicle for Old World enthusiasm among Scottish expatriates in North America and Australasia at the end of the nineteenth century. Bands were formed to provide a Scottish atmosphere at Caledonian Games, Burns Suppers, and other Scottish social events. Some of the longest-running pipe bands in the U.S. include the Holyoke Pipe Band in Massachusetts (1909), the Cincinnati Caledonian Pipes & Drums (c.1912), and the Manchester Pipe Band of Connecticut (1914). In Canada, the Sons of Scotland Pipe Band in Ottawa was set up in 1896, but the military Lorne Scots Pipes & Drums claim to exist since 1881. In Australia, the City of Melbourne Highland Pipe Band (formerly South and Port Melbourne Thistle Society Pipe Band) was formed in the 1890s. In New Zealand, the City of Dunedin Pipe Band dates from 1897.

Musicians in these nineteenth and early twentieth-century bands were almost without exception first generation immigrants who had been born in Scotland and learned their piping skills there. As Rowland Berthoff reports, there was a serious shortage of skilled bagnipipers in the early twentieth-century United States, so that the Yonkers Kilty Band for instance did post a watch at the docks of New York harbour to spot and stop any new arrival ‘who carried anything that even looked like a pipe box’.\(^ {25}\)

This shortage belongs to the past. Since the 1970s, many dozens of new pipe and drum bands have sprung up in the context of the ‘white ethnic revival’ (Matthew Frye Jacobson), the spreading popular enthusiasm for often distant Scottish ancestry in North America and \(^{24}\) The same is true in the U.S.: ‘Women may wear floor or below-the-calf pleated tartan skirts, but they do not wear the kilt (unless they are in a bagpipe band).’ Celeste Ray, *Highland Heritage. Australasia (see Chapter 2). In 1979, Berthoff counted 180 pipe bands who called themselves ‘Scottish’ in the United States, and in 2010 there seemed to be at least 250 active bands. Some North American pipers have become more proficient than the Scots; the world champion of Grade 1 pipe bands in 2009 was the Simon Fraser University Pipe Band, a Canadian outfit. The grading authority, however, remains Scottish; it is the Royal Scottish Pipe Band Association in Glasgow which rates the bands from 1 (best) to 4.

To many musicians, playing in a pipe band is a way of expressing their ‘ethnic’ affiliation. However, it should be noted that North American and Australasian pipe bands usually offer membership to anyone interested and thus have many members who are not of Scottish extraction. A full third of the 3 500 kilted pipers and drummers active in the U.S. in 1979 had ‘no family ties whatever to Scotland’, according to Berthoff. Pipe bands in America are a place for playing Scotsmen, and roots are not required to play along.

By the beginning of the twenty first century, Scottish pipes have reached almost every corner of the world. The first South American Pipe Band Gathering was held in Montevideo, Uruguay, in April 2004 and hosted by the Scottish Pipe Band Association of South America. The Tokyo Pipe Band (est. 1974) is the most famous of several kilted bands in Japan, and in New Papua Guinea’s capital, the Port Moresby City Pipes & Drums were inspired by Australian World War II soldiers. Without doubt, Joshua Dickson is correct when he notes a successful ‘globalisation of Highland piping’. Kilted piping has been embraced internationally, and the ‘Highland bagpipe is beginning to be more or less indigenized into other cultures in several parts of the world’.

5.2 The Pipes and Drums of Europe

In the second half of the twentieth century, Scottish piping came to Europe. At least 230 Scottish pipe and drum bands were active on the continent in 2010. They were ‘Scottish’ in the sense that their musicians wore Scottish uniforms and kilts and employed the Great Highland Bagpipe. The formations often carried names which echoed a Scottish pipe band tradition, combining a place name and the label ‘pipe band’ or the more military ‘pipes and drums’. Almost half of the continental bands of 2010 were based in Germany, where the Bagpipe Association of Germany BAG e.V. (established in 1983) listed 101 bands, from the

A small but well-established pipe band tradition was alive in Sweden (5), while the formations of France (8), Austria (6), and Italy (4) had all sprung up in the past two decades. One or two bands were active in each Luxembourg, Austria, Norway, Finland, the Czech Republic, Poland, Russia, and, less surprisingly, the former British outposts Malta and Cyprus. A full list of pipe bands is included in the appendix.

Scottish piping in Europe is a post-war phenomenon. No kilted pipe bands were active on the continent before the 1950s. Pipe bands began to appear in the Netherlands, when young locals copied the kilted soldiers who had liberated several Dutch towns from Nazi occupation in World War II. The bands were boosted by the folk music revival of the 1970s, when Scottish bagpipes were embraced as a remainder of a lost European piping heritage, and they multiplied in the 1990s, when popular interest in Scottish history and folklore grew thanks to successful Hollywood films and fantasy novels.

Scottish piping is an overwhelmingly Northern and Western European activity. No organised Scottish piping seems to take place in Spain, Portugal, the Baltic countries, and South-Eastern Europe. This means that Scottish piping had much less of an impact in areas where an indigenous piping culture has survived or was revived successfully (see Chapter 5.4).\footnote{On the revival of continental piping, see Mike Paterson’s excellent articles in Piping Today (2002-2009), a magazine published by the National Piping Centre, Glasgow.}

Bagpipes figure prominently in the folk music of Northern Spain (Asturias, Cantabria, Galicia), Portugal, the Baltic countries, and in most states of Southern and Eastern Europe. There appears to be no need for Scottish ersatz instruments.

Continental pipe band musicians do not consider themselves ethnically Scottish. While their bands may feature the odd Scottish expatriate (or an Australian with a Scottish name), they usually have a majority of non-Scots marching in their ranks. The large number of pipe bands on the continent does not reflect a strong Scottish presence in Europe. If there are Scots in the band, they often have applied for membership in an existing pipe band rather than set up their own band abroad. Ian Currie, Scotland-born pipe major of Copenhagen’s Heather Pipes & Drums (est. 1969), arrived in Denmark in the year 2000 to work in the chemical industries. ‘I found out on the internet that there were two pipe bands in Copenhagen. My old band in Scotland was a grade 2 band, so I was keener to join Heather who were also Grade 2. Heather were also closer to where I lived.’ Mr Currie was in no way surprised to find that there were two kilted pipe bands in Denmark: ‘It’s a global thing, piping’, he explains.\footnote{Interview Ian Currie, Heather Pipes & Drums (12 September 2009).}

In many European cities, Scottish pipe bands provide an Anglophone haven for expatriates. The Pipes & Drums of Geneva (est. 1977) for instance bring together a diverse body of musicians: ‘We are a happy group of all ages, of both sexes, of Breton, Canadian, French, Scots, American, Australian, Polish and Swiss pipers and drummers from Geneva and the surrounding area." Pipe bands serve as social clubs for international professionals – be they Scottish or not. In this they remind of Caledonian and St Andrew’s Societies.

All pipe bands consist of amateurs, hobbyists who earn their living otherwise. Pipe bands are social clubs which come together on the weekends and in the evenings. They provide their members with a circle of contacts and regular rehearsal meetings. Like football fan clubs, pipe bands offer an identity with their carefully chosen names and colours, intricate crests and logos, even Clan associations and official tartans. The more successful bands play live shows on every second weekend, and its members spend much time in tour buses together. There is a strong social dimension to Scottish piping and drumming.

Scottish pipe and drum bands are live and loud expressions of the Scottish dreamscape. Its musicians wear kilt and tartan and play songs which honour the Scottish military tradition (Scotland the Brave, Scottish Soldier etc). The shock and awe effect of a pipe band in full regalia – long appreciated by the British Army – has inspired many a bystander to join a band, to become a Scottish piper or drummer him- or herself. The kilted marching bands spread the Scottish virus. In a way, not so much has changed since a 1895 British juvenile journal describes how two young boys witness a Highland regiment in Glasgow: ‘The skirl o’ the bagpipes maks my bluid run dancin’ through ilka vein in my body, and if I had a sword and was big enough, I could fight to music like that.’ The fascination of Scottish pipe bands lies as much in their spectacle as in their music.

Europe’s pipe bands compete. ‘In Germany, a pipe band doesn’t count if it doesn’t take part in at least two or three competitions every year’, says Mike Dahlmanns (born 1944), a founding member of the German Claymore Pipes & Drums (est. 1976). Unlike other folk music genres, Scottish piping is a competitive affair, and band grades and championships are part of the hobby’s fascination. In the past decade, the Royal Scottish Pipe Band Association in Glasgow has successfully established itself as the international authority in all piping matters. Its adjudicators regularly visit North America and Europe to judge pipe band competitions, and its teachers play an important part in educating European pipers and drummers at summer schools and, more recently, in online classes.

Several European pipe band and solo competitions take place every year; one of the most important events is the Copenhagen Winter Competition, first held in 1973. Successful piping competitions may turn into large-scale Scottish festivals, like Schotse Weekend at Alden Biesen, Belgium, described above, or the Highland Gathering Peine in Germany (est. 1995), which attracts 20 000 people. Another form of pipe band festivals are Tattoos – military music festivals with a distinctively Scottish theme. These events imitate the Edinburgh Military Tattoo, the world’s largest pipe band festival (est. 1950).

37 ‘We have a large percentage of non-Scots, and they really enjoy to wear the kilt at our festivities ... We are easier to join than other societies. You do not have to prove any special heritage with us. The St. George’s Society of Singapore wanted to have heritage proven and thus nearly died to death.’ Interview St Andrew’s Society of Singapore (25 July 2009).

The first continental Tattoo was set up in the Dutch city of Delft in 1954 and inspired by the Koninklijke Militaire Kapel (the Dutch Royal Military Band) which had performed at the Edinburgh Tattoo in 1952. The Dutch event has been running continuously until today, now renamed the Netherlands Military Tattoo and held (indoors) near Rotterdam. The notion of a Dutch Tattoo marks something of a homecoming; the word ‘Tattoo’ derives from the Dutch phrase ‘tap toe’, literally ‘close the taps’. When Scottish and English soldiers served in the seventeenth-century Low Countries, tambours signalled with an evening drumbeat when publicans should shut the beer taps and soldier return to the barracks. The Scottish taptoe/Tattoo was a continental souvenir to begin with. In the 1990s and 2000s, when Scottish-styled pipe and drum bands multiplied in Europe, new Tattoos sprang up, all with a decidedly Scottish aesthetic. The Fulda Military Tattoo, Germany, was first held in 2000 as an event ‘for all friends of Scottish music and folklore, Royal tradition, and military aesthetic’. The Basel Tattoo in Switzerland was set up in 2005 and evolved into a mega-event of two weeks, selling 100 000 tickets in 2009 alone. The Kremlin Tattoo or Spasskaya Bashnya was first held (under the name Zoria) on Moscow’s Red Square in 2007. Its advertisements for the 2009 edition had the inner city of the Russian capital plastered with huge colour posters showing a Scottish piper. Considerably smaller events include the Malta Military Tattoo (2003), the Modena Tattoo, Italy (1992), the Luxembourg International Military Tattoo (2007), and the International Tattoo Heerlen, Netherlands (c. 1995). The trend may also be observed in North America, Australasia, and South Africa, where Scottish Tattoos were set up in Halifax, Nova Scotia (1979), Hamilton, Ontario (1992), Norfolk, Virginia (1997), Victoria, Australia (1999), Québec City (2001), Montecasino, Johannesburg (2008). In 2005, The Edinburgh Military Tattoo – A Salute to Australia – a franchise of the Edinburgh original – was attended by over 150 000 people in Sydney.

Ambitious European pipe bands will not stay in Europe but travel to Scotland to compete against the world’s top bands. In 1980, the Antwerp & District Pipe Band from Flanders (est. 1978) was promoted to Grade 3 at one of world’s most important pipe band competitions, the Cowal Highland Gathering in Scotland. And The City of Amsterdam Pipe Band (est. 1974) even received Grade 2 after winning the English Championships in Nottingham 1987 and several prizes at competitions in Scotland. (In 1989, however, the band lost some vital players and was subsequently downgraded to Grade 3 again.) To the dedicated piper, Scotland is more than a Highland fantasy. It is a place on the map which retains authority over its music and which may judge international imitations. European pipers and drummers seek recognition by pipe bands and authorities in Scotland. Royal Scottish Pipe Band Association in Glasgow: ‘Many of the bands from Europe come to Scotland to compete at the Games and championships. They see that as almost a pilgrimage. The pilgrimage is the second Saturday in August: the World Pipe Band Championships. They want to be part of that.’

In 2010, the Swiss Highlanders (est. 2008) were immensely proud when they became the first pipe band from outside the Commonwealth to perform at the Edinburgh Military Tattoo.

To succeed at international competitions is a question of practice and discipline. Most pipe bands are no hard-drinking party outfits but drill bands. Weaker members are taught and encouraged until they improve or leave. Toughness and stamina are frequently employed terms when pipers talk about their work. A now retired founding member of the Basel Pipes & Drums (est. 1978) in Switzerland states: ‘If you protect the culture like we do, if you wear Scottish military uniforms, you have to be tougher than the Scots. There’s no leeway. We never played any silly pop tunes.’ Scottish piping is a serious matter, and to make fun of the Scots is unacceptable.

Europe’s pipe bands aim to meet international standards. To become a Scottish drummer or piper is to accept the rules of the genre. This begins with the dress code and continues with the tunes. Every band is expected to be able to play standards like Scotland the Brave or The Green Hills of Tyrol without fault. Massed pipes rely on the limited set of tunes. Fascinatingly, not all of these tunes are rooted in the Scottish piping tradition. One of the most popular pipe tunes worldwide is Highland Cathedral – written by two German bagpipe fans in 1982. The tune has become a new ‘Scottish’ classic and may be regularly heard at the Edinburgh Military Tattoo. When the last British Governor in Hong Kong, Chris Patten, left Government House for the last time in 1997, the Royal Hong Kong Police Pipe Band played Highland Cathedral in a much televised farewell.

Piping costs money. While some bands have the means to provide new members with starter kits, most musicians spend impressive sums on their costumes and instruments. On their website, the First Guards of St Killians from Germany (est. 1991) warn all interested hobbyists that the ‘complete outfit’ will cost around 2 500 €.

‘So liegt der Preis für ein komplettes Outfit bei ca. 2.500 € pro Person.’

The Moscow District Pipes & Drums claim to play almost 50 shows every year and to charge US$ 2000 for an appearance with 12 musicians. Their bookings range from the opening of a Range Rover outlet in Moscow to a city holiday parade in Kaliningrad.

Pipe bands often play in non-Scottish contexts. Kilted pipe bands may be hired for ceremonial effect. They provide a service, and the service is beyond the mere production of music. Pipe bands provide gravitas, a ceremonial air, a sense of tradition, class, or military serenity. In 2010, the Baul Muluy Pipe Band of Hamburg (est. 1984 as Hamburg Caledonian Band) appeared at the German national Catholic Day in Hamburg, the British Day in Hamburg, the anniversary festival for the port of Hamburg, the re-opening ceremony for the Hamburg Dome, as well as at various birthdays, weddings, corporate celebrations, and openings. They also played on the pitch before the football game between Germany and Scotland in Bremen’s Weserstadion, joined the pop star André Rieu on tour, and supported the German Heavy Metal band Grave Digger on stage at the world’s largest Heavy Metal festival in Wacken, Germany.\(^55\) Scottish glamour is in high demand.\(^56\)

Where does this demand come from? Why are military glamour, drone, and lockstep so attractive to both amateur musicians and spectators? The following two sections examine two of the main motivations which inspired the pioneering European pipe bands in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s and which still are at the core of Scottish piping today. They are the imitation of soldiers and the search for a lost European folk music.

5.3 Imitating Soldiers

With their colourful uniforms, piercing sound, and martial choreography, Scottish pipe and drum bands are designed to stun and awe. They are never really civilian, but always imitate the military. On the continent, Scottish piping and drumming began as a civilian re-enactment of the kilted soldiers who had fought in Europe during World War II.

One of the longest-running continental pipe bands are the Dutch Pipes and Drums of Tilburg, formerly De Scotjes, the ‘wee Scots’. Their story begins on 28 October 1944.\(^57\) The British Army’s 15th Scottish Division had freed Tilburg from Nazi occupation, and acting Major-General Colin Barber declared the city officially liberated. To celebrate the victory, the Scots Guards’ pipe band paraded through Tilburg city centre. The local population lined the streets by the thousands and cheered as Major-General Barber led the band.\(^58\) A journalist of the local Nieuwsblad was pleased with the event but taken aback by the sound of the pipes: ‘we do not hope that this instrument has now become popular in Tilburg’.\(^59\) If only he had known.

De Scotjes were founded on 9 May 1953. It was the time when social life recovered after the War and friendly societies throve in the pre-television Netherlands. A group of boys in Lange Nieuwstraat were keen to form a drum band and had been looking for an original name and theme for some time. They wanted to be different than all other local youth orchestras.\textsuperscript{60} The father of two prospective drummers suggested imitating a Scottish pipe band. He had witnessed the Scots Guards in Tilburg in 1944. De Scotjes were set up as a homage to the victorious pipers, a celebration of their high and emotional memory value. By the end of 1953, the band was kitted out with kilt costumes and self-made bagpipes. In October 1954, when Tilburg celebrated its liberation’s tenth anniversary with a week-long festival, some 40 Scotjes played in front of a large audience and alongside the Pipes and Drums of the Cameronians who had come over from Scotland. Colin Barber shook hands with the boys, smiling at his young impersonators.

The Scotjes kept performing throughout the second half of the twentieth century, at some point changing their name to Dutch Pipes and Drums. Their international success inspired other Dutch and Flemish youth orchestras to adopt a Scottish image. In the Netherlands and Belgium, most early Scottish bagpipe bands were formed by youth and boy scouts organisations – clubs in which quasi-military brass and drum band traditions already existed. In Amsterdam, the Dutch branch of the Boys’ Brigade set up a pipe band in c. 1958, after a befriended Boys’ Brigade unit from Hawick, Scotland, had come over to visit them and brought their pipe band over. ‘We [in Amsterdam] were a copy of their band, same uniforms, same dress’, remembers Steve Scholte (born in 1946), then a member of the Amsterdam Boys’ Brigade, today a bagpiper for hire and a kilt salesman.\textsuperscript{61} The Boys’ Brigade was founded in Glasgow in 1883 as an international Christian youth organisation with a strong military dimension. Its objective (to this day) is ‘The advancement of Christ’s Kingdom among Boys and the promotion of habits of Obedience, Reverence, Discipline, Self-respect and all that tends towards a true Christian manliness.’ While the history of its international spread is not entirely clear, it appears that its pipe bands inspired enthusiasts not only in the Netherlands but also in England, Denmark, and throughout the Commonwealth.\textsuperscript{62}

Pipe bands appealed to all sorts of boy scouts clubs. In The Hague, \textit{De Haagse Hooglanders} (Hague Highlanders) were set up in 1957 as an outdoor club (‘wandelclubje’) for children who were dressed in ‘Scottish skirts’ (‘kinderen in Schotse rokjes’). In 1962, the club acquired a drum section, and in 1967 it turned into a pipe band.\textsuperscript{63} Similarly, The Lowland Pipers of Turnhout, Belgium, (see above) were set up in 1963 by the Sint Joris Boy Scouts, and the Red Hackle Pipe Band of Antwerp were formed as St George Scouts Band in 1967.\textsuperscript{64}

These youth orchestras were managed by adults and played a surprising number of national and international shows in the 1950s and 1960s. It seems that it was possible to earn money with the little Scotsmen. Steve Scholte recalls of his time with the Amsterdam Boys’ Brigade

Pipe Band in the early 1960s: ‘We were very popular at that time, we received a lot of requests to play at all kinds of cases, and they made quite a lot of money with the band.’ Several of these early ‘Scottish’ youth clubs were turned into adult pipe bands in the 1970s. In 1974, for instance, members of The Amsterdam Boys’ Brigade Pipe Band joined forces with the YMCA Pipes & Drums to form the Selected Piping Group Amsterdam, later The City of Amsterdam Pipe Band, to this day one of the Netherland’s most famous pipe bands.

Soldiers also played an important role in Western Germany, where the first kilted pipe and drum bands emerged in the 1970s. These bands were not inspired by a memory of soldiers but by the British forces still stationed in Germany. For most German bagpipe pioneers, interest in Scottish music was first aroused by military parades. Peter Bergschmidt (born 1939), a concrete builder and founder of the Clan Piper’s Frankfurt (est. 1974), remembers that as a boy, he saw pipers play ‘whenever the Brits marched around’. Mike Dahlmanns (born 1944), a retired pastry chef and founding member of the Munich Civilian Pipe Band (est. 1976, renamed Claymore Pipes and Drums in 1989) says that as a boy in Mönchengladbach, he regularly watched a piper of the British Rhine Army play at manoeuvres:

Near where I lived, or where I grew up, there was a forest, and behind that forest there was a small industrial zone that belonged to a different part of town. ... There was a Rhine Army Workshop. This was in fact the former steelwork Weller. They fixed the tanks there and so on, the War had not ended all that long ago, see? And there always was that ceremony, there was this centurion tank, standing in front of the factory gate, and very often in the evenings it used to be noisily driven backwards into the field again. This was demonstrate: Hello, yes, [we are] the winners. And sometimes there stood a piper at the door and played.

Dahlmanns also remembers seeing Scottish pipe bands at a NATO music festival in Mönchengladbach in 1950 or 1951. ‘The pipes were always near somewhere’, he says. As a young adult, Dahlmanns was a skiffle player (like Bergschmidt above), playing the trumpet in street jazz bands. But when he met a bagpiper playing on Munich’s Marienplatz in 1976 (hired by the military-inspired Munich Scottish Association), the two decided to form a pipe band. The piper he had met was a German who had driven to Ireland on his motorbike in 1969 and bought a set of bagpipes there.

The military pipers stationed in Germany were not only observed by the boys, they began to teach them. Helmut Horneffer (born 1958), a merchant in Lower Saxony and founder of the large Highland Gathering Peine (first held in 1995) was taught to play the bagpipes as a child by a pipe major of the Royal Scots Greys (today: Royal Scots Dragoon Guards) in the 1970s – a military band stationed at Bad Fallingbostel, Lower Saxony. Its pipe major John Bruce and successor Bryon Brotherton also taught the pipers of the Hamburg Caledonian Pipe Band in the 1980s. Similarly, the Rhine Area Pipes & Drums of Düsseldorf were formed in 1977 (under the name Old & Scotch Pipe Band), ‘after intense learning years with experts of the British Rhine Army’. Founding member Klaus Glocksin (born 1945), an architect, remembers that he was first taught by a press officer at the Mönchengladbach headquarters and later became possibly the only German and the only civilian member of a Royal Air Force Volunteer Pipe Band in the 1970s.

The Scottish regiments stationed in Western Germany after World War II also inspired imitation in some of the neighbouring countries. When the Black Watch (2nd Batt.) was stationed in Duisburg, Western Germany, in the 1950s, their pipers and drummers often played with the police band of Heerlen, a city just across the Dutch border. Pipe major Jimmy Jenkinson and drum major Robert Roy taught the Dutch policemen in the art of Scottish piping and drumming. The Heerlen Police Pipe Band became a popular ensemble and played many shows throughout the Netherlands. They ceased to exist after a police reorganisation in the 1970s. But their spirit lived on. Steph and Hein Quaedvlieg founded Coriovallum Pipe Band in 1978 to honour and remember both Heerlen’s piping tradition as well as the legacy of their father who had been a policeman and a drummer in the 1950s original band. The Scottish link has become family lore, and one of the four drums which the Black Watch presented to the Heerlen policemen remains in the Quaedvlieg family: ‘It is said that these drums have been used in El Alamein, where Jimmy Jenkinson lost one of his eyes’, says Steph Quadvlieg. Continental pipe bands offer the chance to participate in the Scottish military mythology.

Scottish military pipers also inspired Switzerland. In the city of Basel, Schotteclique was founded in 1947 – not a proper pipe band, but a carnival ensemble (‘Guggemusig’) that combined traditional masks (‘Larven’) with self-made kilts and bagpipes. Band legend has it that the founders took their ideas from a decorated shop window in Basel, advertising ‘Schottentwoche’, a week of prices so low that they would please even a stereotypically mean

Scot. But it is probably equally important that on 11 July 1946, the massed pipes and drums of the 52nd Scottish infantry division (stationed in Oldenburg, Western Germany) had been in Basel and played in front of thousands on the Münsterplatz. A local newspaper reports:

At the sight of the three drum and pipe majors leading the parade, our boys and girls held their breath. Our carnivalists who had arrived in large numbers had itchy fingertips when they saw how drumsticks whirled through the air with unbelievable precision and virtuosity, only to meet again in a flash under the drummers’ noses.

Carnival in Switzerland and the Alps often involves quasi-military brass, fife, and marching bands which are reminiscent of the local mercenary traditions. The city of Basel is the epicentre of Swiss carnival, and the journalist quoted above suggests that the city’s rich local drumming tradition resonated with the Scottish band’s sound and style. Schotteclique continues to appear at the annual Basel Carnival to this day. In 1978, some ambitious members set up The Pipes & Drums of Basel, a less surreal spin-off designed for formal pipe band competitions.

The early continental pipe bands were inspired by kilted regiments and army pipe bands. The imitations were overwhelmingly respectful; if the pipe band masquerade contained a degree of mockery, it was outweighed by the desire to resemble the original soldiers, and, in Germany, to learn from them, to play in their league. In the Netherlands, the early pipe bands were social clubs which imitated the soldiers who had helped to liberate Europe. In Western Germany, the bands provided a way of bonding and competing with the victors, and enthusiasm for military pipers was an expression of Anglophilia. This sometimes led to conflict with the older generation. As piper Mike Dahlmanns recalls of his childhood: ‘My mother did not like me watching the pipers. For her, they were the enemies.’ But for many young men of the German post-war generation, the Scots in their splendid uniforms and with their harmless tank manoeuvres were the victors, good guys who ensured the reconstruction of Western Germany after World War II.

It is perhaps significant that Scottish piping and drumming intensified in Europe in the 1990s and 2000s, when the Cold War ended, British and American soldiers cleared their bases in Germany, and many eyewitnesses of both World Wars passed away. The multiplication of Scottish pipe and drum bands at the end of the twentieth century is part of a wider public interest in the two World Wars. Pipe bands physically commemorate this past, re-enact the soldiers of the past.

There is a second commemorative dimension to the Scottish piping. Many European bagpipers chose to become ‘Scottish’ musicians in order to rediscover their own folklore. They understand Scottish bagpipe music as a surviving form of pre-modern European culture – a culture that has been largely lost on the continent.

5.4 Remembering the Drone?

Continental pipe bands emerged at a time of unprecedented Western European prosperity. The first bagpipers in Western Germany were not unemployed workers or penniless students, but successful young professionals. Many of the pioneering musicians recount stories of motor bike trips to Ireland and Scotland in the 1960s, and of instruments and uniforms that cost them a good deal of money. Peter Bergschmidt of the Clan Pipers in Frankfurt ordered his first set of pipes directly from Robertson’s in Edinburgh, in 1962, and it was no beginner’s model: ‘I was a specialist concrete builder at the start of my career, but I already had some spare cash on the side. I bought the thing right away. A full instrument, fully ivory mounted.’ The first European pipers were affluent, mobile, and looking for entertainment.

Folk music became a popular form of entertainment all over Europe and North America in the late 1960s. Folk bands emerged by the hundreds and performed at festivals small and large. The ‘folk revival’ drew its energy simultaneously from the baby boomer generation’s lust for leisure and from their doubts about the possible consequences of affluence and commercialisation. As is examined in more detail in Chapter 2, the deep-reaching social and economic changes of the post-war period were accompanied by a heightened interest in European history and folklore. The folk revival was a symptom of this interest.

In the 1970s, Scottish-styled pipe and drum bands were in the unique position that they attracted both military enthusiasts and folk music fans. To be sure, Scottish pipe bands do not play folk music; they are quasi-military marching bands whose members wear the uniforms of Empire and intone songs like ‘The Scottish Soldier’ and ‘Scotland the Brave’. Pipe bands stood against everything that the largely hippie-inspired folk revival cherished. Nevertheless, they profited from the dynamics of the folk music boom.

The traditional music of Ireland (and to a lesser extent Scotland) occupied a central role in the folk revival. ‘Celtic’ folk music became a bestselling genre in the late 1960s. Its big advantage was that it did not have to be wholly reconstructed and reanimated, that it appeared to be readily available. As folk songs and dances had disappeared from many towns and cities of Western Europe, continental folk musicians looked to Ireland and Britain for living traditions. ‘Celtic’ music was seen as folk music that had never died out. Musicians like The Dubliners, The Chieftains, Van Morrison, Pete Seeger, The Battlefield Band, and Runrig came to be key figures of the European folk revival and headlined folk festivals from Scandinavia to Italy. Some bands and musicians could make a living from the circuit.

Scottish pipe bands were absorbed into the Celtic folk music genre. With their ‘old’ instruments and focus on ‘traditional’ tunes and rituals, pipe bands were accepted as exponents of Scottish traditional music. Folk music radio shows regularly played pipe music, especially after the Royal Scots Dragoon Guards topped the British, German, and Swiss charts with their recording of ‘Amazing Grace’ in 1972. The highly popular Radio Luxembourg hosted a ‘Scottish Requests’ show in the 1970s. The Celtic-military fusion must have come as a surprise to Army musicians such as the Dragoon Guards. They were professional soldiers of the British Army, stationed as an occupying force in Bad Fallingbostel, Western Germany, and all the sudden celebrated by folk music fans at the height of anti-war demonstrations. How did they end up in this position?

The European folk music revival had a profound interest in bagpipes. Mike Paterson thinks that the pipes ‘address an aesthetic gap’ in Europe, that they touch a wound and remind modern Europeans of a historical loss. Bagpipes had disappeared from most parts of Western Europe towards the end of the eighteenth century, mainly due to tightening laws on amusement and the growing popularity of other instruments. Bagpipes had been commonly played at fairs for dancing and therefore were considered frivolous by the Church authorities. Also, new laws and borders fought vagrancy and limited mobility and thus finished the travelling buskers. The pipes survived in rural areas, in peripheries. When a Württemberg schoolteacher witnessed pipe-playing shepherds in the town of Markgröningen in 1778, he was pleasantly surprised to hear the sound of a lost world:

> Every new arrival will hear the shepherds’ bagpipes sound from all sides, which are very simple and may hurt an ear which has been spoiled with concerts and symphonies, but to him who thinks himself back into the old world of herdsmen, that is, into the raw times of music, they are very pleasant, because they do increase his illusion. He will believe to enter an Arcadian village...

Awareness that bagpipes had once been a common instrument all over Europe never totally faded from popular memory. One of the most important German literary texts, Hans Jakob von Grimmelshausen’s Der Abenteuerliche Simplicissimus (1668), recounts how young shepherd Simpel plays the bagpipes (Sackpfeifen) to scare the wolves away from his sheep. Unfortunately, it is the time of the Thirty Years’ War and his music attracts marauders who then pillage and burn his home. Simplicissimus is read at every German high school and 83 However, the traditional music of Ireland and Scotland had to be reinvented and transformed in the 1960s as well. See Allie Munro, Folk Music Revival in Scotland (London: Kahn & Averill, 1984).

85 ‘[Es tönen] jedem neuen Ankömmling von allen Seiten die Dudelsäcke der Schäfer entgegen, die zwar sehr einfach sind, und vielleicht manchem Ohre, dass durch Konzerte und Symphonien verwöhnt ist, wehe thun, demjenigen aber, der sich in die alte Schäferwelt, d.i. in die rohe Zeiten der Musik zurück setzt, sehr angenehm sind, weil sie seine Täuschung vermehren. Er glaubt in ein Arkadisches Städtchen einzutreten...’ cit. in Schmidt, Sackpfeifen, 117.
keeps a vague memory of indigenous piping alive. Other piping memories are contained in paintings and historical landmarks. In the Swiss capital of Berne, the ‘piper fountain’ (Pfeifferbrunnen) of 1545 reminds of the Swiss mercenary tradition and its pipers. It was not in Scotland alone where bagpipes had a martial function. In Swabia, Southern Germany, an ethnographer before the First World War still recorded a popular saying that claimed: ‘When the pipers are coming, there will be war.’

There have been many attempts at reviving European bagpipe music, and the Scottish Great Highland Bagpipe has served as an inspiration on several occasions. Most famously, Scottish pipes have been employed in Brittany, Western France, to revive a weakened local piping tradition. The Breton pipe, the bagad, had largely disappeared by the eighteenth century, and for a forceful revival, the Breton nationalists required a catalysing kick-start. Scottish pipes were imported to Brittany as early as 1932, the first piping society was formed during World War II, and in the late 1960s, young Breton pipers still learnt their trade in Scotland. Peter Bergschmitt of the Clan Pipers, Frankfurt, recalls sharing his first summer classes at the College of Piping near the Muir of Ord in Scotland with Breton musicians, among them later folk music star Alain Stivell. The revival was successful, and Breton piping became a vital and popular folk music genre again. Scottish bagpipes helped to reinvent a local tradition.

The post-war folk music revival saw a huge reconstructive effort throughout Europe, and continental piping traditions were revived more or less successfully in Northern Spain, Hungary, Poland, the Baltic countries, in Scandinavia, and in Ireland. Scottish pipers served as an inspiration, even behind the Iron Curtain. Czech bagpiper and Scotland enthusiast Miroslav Anger remembers that his first sighting of Scottish pipers was at a folk music festival in Strakonice, Czechoslovakia, in the 1980s. In Eastern Europe, the folk revival often assumed a political, anti-Soviet dimension, a message that could be enhanced and amplified with Anglophile, Western kilts and bagpipes. With glee, Mr Anger called his kilted pipe and drum band Czech Rebel Pipers.

In some cases, Scottish bagpipes served not only as an inspiration for the revival of local music but as a full-blown ersatz folk music. In the Swiss city of Lucerne, carnivalists Hans Reber and Roman Kaeslin formed the Lozärner Dudler (later Happy Pipers) in 1973. Reber and Kaeslin both worked for the city council in the 1970s, and their interest in bagpipes was aroused by the sandstone pipers in the façade of Lucerne city hall. The sandstone figures depict Swiss mercenaries, and the Happy Pipers hoped that Scottish bagpipes would help to rediscover the Swiss piping tradition and even a traditional Swiss folk instrument (‘altschwezerisches Folkloremusikinstrument’). But instead of moving from Scottish to Swiss bagpipes in time, they retained the Scottish outfit and continue to perform as ‘Scots’ to this day. The vague memory of Swiss bagpipes could not be substantiated, and the elaborate and colourful aesthetics of a Scottish pipe band proved more satisfying than any re-invented Swiss piping tradition.

Conclusion Chapter 5

The piping tradition of Scotland is no Victorian invention. Bagpipes have been played in and associated with Scotland long before 1800. Still, it was in the nineteenth-century British Army that the pipes were transformed from a ‘barbarian’ rebel klaxon into the respected national instrument of Scotland.

The first European pipe bands emerged after World War II, first in the Netherlands and Flanders, then in Western Germany, Switzerland, and Scandinavia. The pipe band pioneers were inspired by the kilted regiments which fought in Europe during World War II or were stationed in Western Germany after the War. Many musicians have vivid childhood memories of bagpipe-playing soldiers or were even taught by them. In the 1970s, Scottish pipe bands drew further energy from the international folk revival, the spreading interest in Europe’s traditional music. Via television and radio programmes, Scottish piping became known to a wider public. In the 1990s and 2000s, Scottish-styled pipe and drum bands multiplied in Europe. In 2010, there were well over 230 pipe bands on the continent which regularly held international competitions and Military Tattoos.

There is a commemorative dimension to Scottish piping in Europe. The first pipe and drum bands were set up to imitate the Scottish soldiers who had helped to liberate Europe from Nazi Germany. It is significant that the number of continental pipe bands multiplied after 1989, when the Cold War ended and many British and American soldiers left Western Europe. Kilted pipe bands are a (highly physical) way of commemorating the past at a time of change. They are a symptom of the memory boom. Furthermore, pipe bands assist in the reconstruction and reinvention of continental folk music. They serve as model folklore. By embracing the Scottish piping tradition, many Europeans hope to tap into their own lost musical heritage.

The imitative approach to Scottish history and tradition in the name of memory is not limited to music. The following chapter examines Highland Games on the European continent.

ONLY THE STRONG: HIGHLAND GAMES

It has been a good day in Puster Valley. The mountain sun and healthy pints of Tyrolean beer have made the Highlanders’ faces shine. Now the hills are bathed in evening light, the bar works triple shifts, swords and pitchforks are safely tucked away. A folk band has taken the open air stage, kilts are flying, and the dancing begins.

The South Tyrolean Highland Games have been a success, even if it remains a mystery to most who has won the competitions. Many warriors have skipped the award ceremony in order to get a bite to eat in the village. Others just lost track of the many disciplines and competing teams. The fierce-looking bodybuilders of Clan Reischinga (named after nearby Reischach village) may have been among the best when it came to lifting wood blocks, and the all-female Puschtra-Hexn (Pustra witches) have done a terrific job in the piggyback race. Clan Schierhagl (Clan Poker) with their sunglasses, Tyrolean hats, blue-white kilts, and hiking boots should have won the Mr Highlander beauty pageant, while the camouflage combat kilts of McFreischärla (Freischärler: Alpine guerrilla, franc-tireurs) were a source of mild discomfort to the organisers who wanted the Games to be a family event.

The Games passed in a remarkably peaceful manner. Bearded barbarians sat smiling dreamily while Tyrolean girls tied braids into their hair. Large warriors assisted their colleagues with tender gestures in putting on authentic blue face-paint before going out into battle together. If asked for a photograph, the Highlanders happily assumed a heroic and slightly self-ironic pose. And if tensions did arise somewhere, one could be certain to see two or three of the muscular and bare-chested ‘sauna bears’ appear – no official security force but swimming pool attendants from the spa in nearby Bruneck/Brunico who had decided to participate at the Games.

The fourth South Tyrolean Highland Games took place on a weekend in June 2009 on a sports ground in Pfalzen (Falzes in Italian), a community of some 2000 people in Italy’s northernmost and largely German-speaking province South Tyrol/Alto Adige. The Games were created in 2006 by a group of friends who had become tired of organising the same amateur football tournaments every summer.¹ None of the organisers claims to be Scottish in any way, and none of the c. 3000 spectators of 2009 seemed to celebrate Scottish ancestors or homelands. Indeed, many of the attendants had never visited Scotland and knew the place only from movies and books.

The South Tyrolean Games are one of more than 130 Highland Games that take place on the European continent at the beginning of the twenty first century. In the rural zones of Western Europe, Scottish athletics are being established as a new summer tradition. The largest events attract up to 30 000 participants and have expanded into colourful festivals with a variety of Scottish and non-Scottish fringe-entertainment. Most games, however, remain small-scale amateur affairs and take place in potato fields and on village greens. Almost all of the continental Highland Games have sprung up after 1990. They are one of the most striking symptoms of a broad new European fascination with Scottish folklore.

This chapter first outlines the history of Scottish strength competitions and their international appropriation. It then presents the Highland Games of Europe and identifies the major themes which characterise them. It then sets out to show how in certain areas of Europe, the Games serve both as ersatz folklore and as enhancement of existing custom.

6.1 Strength, Sports, and the Scots

Highland Games are strength competitions. ‘Large men throwing things!’, the Seaside Highland Games of Ventura County, California, (est. 2003) advertise correctly. They are also known as Highland Gatherings, after their alleged origins in times when Scottish Clan chiefs assembled their men in order to select an elite team of warriors. The Köstritzer Highland Games of Thuringia, Germany, provide a fairly typical mythology of origin: ‘Highland Games derive from the time of the Celtic Kings of Scotland. They were held to find the strongest and fastest men of Scotland who then often became the King’s bodyguards and messengers.’ However, in their modern and familiar form, Highland Games have been held for no more than 200 years in Scotland. As Grant Jarvie documents in his authoritative studies, the first Games which merit the name were established in the 1820s by friendly societies concerned with the preservation of Highland culture. These societies had emerged in response to the massive social and economic transformations which followed the battle of Culloden (1746) and the modernisation of the Highlands (see Chapter 3).

Highland Games became popular in Scotland at a time when Romantic enthusiasm for the protection of Highland culture awakened on many levels. The ban of Highland dress had been lifted in 1781, Highland soldiers had figured prominently in the Napoleonic Wars and at the Battle of Waterloo in 1815, Sir Walter Scott had written his Waverley (1814) and Rob Roy (1817) novels, and King George IV had visited Edinburgh and worn a kilt (over tights) in 1822. The once rebellious Highlander was pardoned and transformed into the Scottish nation’s mascot. Highland Games enabled his celebration in a safely non-political way. The Highland Gatherings which defined the aesthetic tradition include Braemar (founded in 1817), St Fillans (1819), the Lonach in Strathdon (1823), Ballater (1866), Aboyne (1867), the Argyllshire in Oban (1871), and Cowal in Dunoon (1871). It was at these events where athletic disciplines like caber tossing, tug-of-war, and various ways of putting and carrying... weights and stones were defined as the key disciplines of Highland Games. It is certainly true that strength competitions have been common in Scotland (as elsewhere in Europe) long before the nineteenth century. Events like the eleventh-century hill race to the summit of Craig Coinneach, organised by King Malcolm Ceann-Mór in order to find the fastest messenger, may indeed have served as inspiration to the modern Highland Games. However, it was at the Games of the early nineteenth century where the sport was formalised, regulated, and endowed with a mythology of a thousand year old continuity. As Eric Hobsbawm observed, the ‘invention of tradition’ relies on bits and pieces of genuine custom but binds them into new and meaningful forms.

In the second half of the nineteenth century, the Games became important events for the Highland elites, the landowners, lairds, and Clan chiefs who embraced the Romantic re-enactment of Highland culture and participated in it. They used Highland Gatherings as a stage to express authority and paternal interest – while many of them had encouraged and sometimes enforced massive emigration from the Highlands to make room for modern farming. As Jarvie puts it, landowners who had helped to destroy Highland culture now acted as its protectors at the Highland Games. An enduring link was established between the Games and nobility and ‘sporting landlords’, a link which was solidified in 1848, when Queen Victoria became patron of the Braemar Highland Gathering. The Royal Family continues to attend the Braemar Games, and to many twenty-first century Highland Scots, the Games still are a sport for the upper classes.

Highland Games were quickly exported to the new world. In North America, Australia, and New Zealand, ‘Caledonian Games’ (as they were known then) became popular in the second half of the nineteenth century. Their numbers grew rapidly; Rowland Berthoff, analysing the Scottish-American Journal, counted 8 or 10 annual Games in the United States in the 1860s, nearly 30 in 1890, and 125 Games by 1925. Among the oldest continuously running Games in North America today are the Antigonish Highland Games in Nova Scotia (established 1863) and the San Francisco Caledonian Club’s Highland Games (1866). The St. Andrew’s Society of Detroit claims that their Games were founded in 1849. In New Zealand, the longest running games appear to be the ones in Otago (1862) and Turakina (1864), but a Caledonian Society in Wellington held Games as early as the 1840s. A fine eyewitness report survives. In Australia, the Melbourne Cricket Club hosted Caledonian Games at the Metropolitan Ground in December 1861.

In North America and Australasia, Highland Games served as social gatherings for Scottish expatriates. They were hosted by Caledonian, St Andrews, or Thistle societies and allowed newly arrived immigrants to meet compatriots. In New Zealand, some 100 Caledonian Societies existed around 1900, and Caledonian Games were their ‘main activity’.\(^{11}\) It was at these events where Scottish pipers and pipe bands were required (see Chapter 5.1). The Games were also a way for Scottish societies to communicate with the rest of the population, to sharpen and improve their public face. To a larger extent than Burns Suppers and St Andrews Balls, Highland Games were inclusive attractions which encouraged non-Scots to join in, to ‘become’ Scottish for a day of sport and fun. Some of the Games attracted several thousands of spectators and must be understood as early forms of mass sporting leisure. In New Zealand, some Games became ‘a successful business venture and brand’ and were ‘developed to appeal not only to fellow Scotsmen, but to the wider public’. Similarly, the Games in North America attracted many non-Scottish athletes. Berthoff notes on late nineteenth century Games in the U.S.: ‘Irishmen, Negroes, and other non-Scots competed and often won.’\(^{12}\)

Very few attendees at the nineteenth and early twentieth-century Highland Games celebrated their roots. The vast majority of attending expatriates was born in Scotland or at least had Scotland-born parents. As Berthoff notes: ‘In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Scottish-American ethnicity was almost wholly confined to people born in Scotland.’\(^{13}\) Many of these Scotland-born migrants experienced their first Highland Games abroad. The majority of them were Lowlanders and had little experience with tossing cabers.\(^{14}\) The Highland Games of North America and Australasia do not represent an old and continuous Highland tradition but a Romantic re-imagination of Scotland shaped by homesickness and nostalgia. As Berthoff notes: ‘[T]his revival of old village customs, a generation or more after the final collapse of Gaelic clan society, appealed to otherwise hard-headed Scots of the urban-industrial age, at home or abroad.’\(^{15}\) Highlandism was a transatlantic process.

As the Great Depression hit and Scottish immigration dried up at the beginning of World War II, many Highland Games in North America shrank or folded. This could have been the end of that tradition – but it was not. The Games were revived in spectacular ways with what Matthew Frye Jacobson calls the ‘white ethnic revival’; white America’s (and Australia’s, New Zealand’s etc) growing interest in ethnic identities and ancestral cultures in the 1970s (see Chapter 2). Today, Highland Games are widely considered a perfect way for expressing Scottish-American or Scottish-Australian identities. ‘There is nothing more quintessentially Scottish than the Highland Games’, the Fort Nottingham Games of South Africa (established in 2006) confidently advertise.\(^{16}\) Such a Scottish identity may be justified with a family tree, DNA-analysis, or just a gut feeling.

As with Scottish pipe bands, the number of Highland Games in North America has grown considerably since the late 1970s. In 1979, Berthoff counted 60 Highland Games in the U.S. and 26 in Canada, but in 2010, the Clan Campbell Society of North America listed 176 Scottish Highland Games in 47 U.S. states and 43 Games in Canada. In the United States,

Highland Games took place in all states except Delaware, North Dakota, and the District of Columbia.\(^{17}\) As in the nineteenth century, the Games are inclusive. Some attract up to 20,000 spectators, many of whom have no historical links to Scotland whatsoever.\(^{18}\) The inclusiveness, however, is limited; Highland Games in the U.S. tend to be rather white affairs, as Rowland Berthoff, Euan Hague, and Edward H. Sebesta have shown.\(^{19}\)

In Scotland, the Games have survived as well, even if few Scots would consider them a national sport – a title which would go to football, rugby, or golf instead. After some golden years in the 1920s, attendance at the Games dropped in the 1950s with the rise of television, bingo, and other new entertainment options. The Games were also increasingly rejected as ‘tartan kitsch’. Celeste Ray notes: ‘For many Scots, Highland and Lowland, the games represent a laughable stereotype of the Scots.’\(^{20}\) Still, the Games have spread throughout Scotland – ‘penetrating even the Lowland and border counties whose inhabitants, less than two centuries ago, would probably have died rather than adopt the customs and dress of “the barbaric Highlander”’, as Charles Kightly states.\(^{21}\) Highland Games are found as far south as North Berwick in the Lothians which exemplifies the extent to which Scotland adopted the Highland aesthetic on a national scale.\(^{22}\)

Today, some 100 Games are held in Scotland each summer, and the vast majority are small and intimate affairs.\(^{23}\) They mostly lack the solemn Clan parades and pseudo-medieval rituals so popular at the Games in America. Instead, they feature cycling, track and field athletics, sausage grills, jam vendors, and pony riding attractions. If they have not been deliberately set up in the past 30 years to attract tourism, Highland Games in Scotland are part of the rural entertainment circuit.\(^{24}\) When attending the 2010 Games at Strathpeffer, Easter Ross, the author talked to an American roots tourist who desperately tried to avoid getting the whirligigs in his photographs. He explained: ‘People at home would think it’s a country fair.’ Which, of course, is what Highland Games in modern Scotland are.

6.2 The Highland Games of Europe

In 2010, at least 130 Highland Games were held on the European mainland, the majority of them in Germany (56), Austria (30), Belgium (18), the Netherlands (17), Switzerland (6), and France (3). Further Games were hosted in the Czech Republic (Sychrov), Poland, Luxembourg, in Norway’s Arctic North (Snæfjord), and of course in Pfalzen, South Tyrol. A full list of Highland Games is included in the appendix.

The Games have not reached Southern and Eastern Europe – just as Scottish piping is found much less south of the Alps and east of the German-Polish border (see Chapter 5). In Scandinavia, there are several kilted pipe and drum bands but hardly any Highland Games. Scottish athletics, so it seems, are a Western European and predominantly German- and Dutch-speaking phenomenon. The French parts of Belgium and Switzerland hold no Highland Games at all. As will be examined in Chapter 6.3, Scottish Highland Games have a special resonance in Germany, the Netherlands, and the alpine world.

Unlike Scottish piping and drumming, Highland Games are an overwhelmingly rural activity. While Amsterdam, Antwerp, Berlin, Copenhagen, Frankfurt, The Hague, Hamburg, Helsinki, Geneva, Munich, Moscow, Paris, Rome, Vienna, and Zurich all sport their own Scottish pipe bands, only two of these cities, Berlin and Vienna, hold (very small) Highland Games events.

Scottish Highland Games have been virtually unknown in Europe until the 1990s. Only two or three events in Germany and Austria claim to be running continuously since the 1980s and 1970s. 25 Two Highland Games were held in Western Germany during the 1980s (Munich/Anzing, Sternschanzenpark Hamburg) but were then discontinued. 26 These pioneering events were limited in size and mostly connected to pipe bands.

In the 1990s, continental Highland Games began to flourish. The majority of Games were set up in the years between 1995 and 2005, the same period that saw the spread of pipe bands (Chapter 5) and Scottish re-enactment clubs (Chapter 8). This surge of popular interest in Scottish history and folklore was triggered by the successful ‘Scottish’ Hollywood films (Braveheart, 1995) and fantasy novels (Outlander, 1991) of the 1990s. More fundamentally, the surge is a consequence of the ‘memory boom’, a growing passion for the European past and its remembrance. This development is not yet at its end; at least six of the thirty three Highland Games that were held in Flanders and the Netherlands in 2010 were held for the first time. 27 New generations are setting up Highland Games – generations which are no longer familiar with Braveheart (1995) and Highlander (1986).

The Games of Europe vary greatly in size and character. There are professionally organised events that are as big as the largest Scottish festivals of North America. Scotfest in Tilburg, Netherlands (est. 2006) attracted some 30 000 spectators in 2008. Schotse Weekend at Landscommanderij Alden Biesen, Belgium (1986) had 25 000 paying guests in 2010. The Highland Gathering of Peine in the flat lands of Lower Saxony, Germany (1995) has 20 000 people each year, the Swiss Highland Games championships at St Ursen (2003) and the Machern Highland Games near Leipzig, Germany, attracted 18,000 spectators each in 2009. Schotse Dagen in Ooidonk, Netherlands, had more than 15,000 attendants in 2007.\(^{28}\)

The majority of the European Games, however, are small and local events. They take place in the rural areas of Western Europe and do not reach national audiences. The Games are part of a rural entertainment circuit and held next to fairs, carnivals, open air music festivals, cattle markets, amateur football tournaments, and motorbike conventions. When the author interviewed a Highland Games team by the name of ‘Clan Halbfit’ in South Tyrol, the kilted men demonstrated detailed knowledge about the prices for Scottish Highland cattle (1800 Euro the cow, 2000 the bull). In Prießnitz, Saxony/Germany, a ‘Schottisches Weidefest’ or ‘Scottish pastures festival’ takes place every summer since 1999. The organising cattle farmers have formed the German branch of Clan Gregor in 2008 and were officially approved by Sir Malcolm MacGregor of MacGregor, Chief of Clan Gregor.\(^{29}\) Often the Games are set up by local clubs and civic associations, ranging from Evangelical Free Churches (Eckernförde Highland Games, Germany), Carnival bands (Salvenpass Highland Games, Austria), men’s choirs (Irschen Highland Games, Austria), ice hockey teams (Schangnau Highland Games, Switzerland), office co-workers (DHL Highland Games, Belgium) to leather-clad biker clubs (Studen Highland Games Bike Weekend, Switzerland). Highland Games inspire a variety of ideologies and tempers, but they usually remain confined to the countryside.

Unsurprisingly, the European Games differ from those in both Scotland and North America. In Europe, Highland Games are mostly amateur competitions and ‘strongest-man-of-the-village-contests’, as an observer in Flanders puts it. While there are tournaments which try to tap into an international heavy athletics network with strict rules, expert referees, and single competitions (Bressuire in France, Kempen in Germany, and Kurenpolder/Hank in the Netherlands), most Games in Europe have amateurs competing.

In Scotland and North America, athletes will compete individually.\(^{30}\) In contrast, the continental Highland Games are usually designed for teams of four to six. The tournaments are, as a veteran organiser from Switzerland explains, ‘peasant Olympics’, a rough and ready challenge in which groups of friends throw heavy things and drink large beers, often at the same time.\(^{31}\) Another sight which distinguishes the European Games from most events in Scotland and America are the many women who compete, kilt and all, in mixed or all-female teams and in the heavy disciplines. Still, the majority of athletes are men, for, as noted earlier, Scottish playacting has few roles and costumes for females. The women at Highland Games more often act as spectators than as athletes.

kilograms. In Austria, throwing eggs and speed-drinking are established disciplines. In the Alps, ski boots may be worn to get a better grip in the tug-of-war. At the Alpen Games in Carinthia, matches of 'kilt soccer' are played. Other disciplines include piggyback races, wood chopping, barrel rolling, the throwing of milk containers (Machern, Germany), wellie throwing, and Mr and Mrs Highlander beauty pageants (South Tyrol). Some enthusiasts have started to hold Winter Highland Games which involve kilted downhill skiing (Dufftown Rangers and Original Highlanders Carinthia, Austria). Interestingly, new 'traditions' from America ('kirkin the tartan', haggis-hurling, and the 'bonniest knee' contest that involves men in kilts and blindfolded women) have not made it across the Atlantic. Europeans make their own innovations.

Continental Games inspire each other. Many events are set up by people who have neither a deep and long-standing interest in Scotland or a first-hand experience of the Games of Scotland. More often, they were inspired by Games that they saw in a neighbouring village or on television. The next summer, they tried it at home. They looked up the Wikipedia entry for Highland Games, organised a couple of weights and tree trunks, improvised a bar, hired the local folk rock band, convinced a brewery to sponsor the event, printed 500 flyers, and told everyone to show up in a skirt. Simple Highland Games are easily set up. These events wholly depend on volunteers and friendly societies, they are held for fun, not to make money. Its organisers charge modest or no entrance fees and provide only the most basic facilities. Many continental Games have budgets of less than GBP 4000.

Things change when the Games are held successfully for several years. They will attract more and more people and become more organised as they grow. They will need car parks, camping grounds, safety standards, first aid medics, chemical toilets, cleaning teams, an accountant, and a bad weather insurance – like all larger festivals. A good example is the Wúy ú ay Highland Games of St Ursen in Switzerland (est. 2003), a festival that evolved within five years from a mud-kicking farmers' Olympics into a well-polished spectacle that attracts 18 000 people. In 2009, the Games featured international folk and rock music acts on a well-lit stage, different culinary treats, high-gloss festival programmes, and a website that listed helpful advice on shuttle buses, garbage recycling, and the dangers of drunk driving. The event's main sponsors were a Swiss bank and Guinness, behind which stands the international beverage company Diageo. Successful Highland Games may become commercial festivals.

The commercialisation of Highland Games is an issue of some concern for many European Scots – mainly because they consider commercial mass production and Scottishness to be mutually exclusive. Participants and spectators at the European Highland Games often consider themselves 'a little bit crazy', different – people with an individual taste and mindset who will not fit into mainstream leisure culture (see Chapter 10). Sponsored festivals for the masses must appear like a big sell-out to them. 'Already people tell us that we are being too commercial now’, said Harry Klenk, one of the four main organisers, responsible for the (truly rough) South Tyrolean Highland Games.\textsuperscript{35}

But Highland Games and entrepreneurial spirit go together well. Some organisers use the Highland Games for fundraising, like the Rotary Club of Velsen, Netherlands, that began holding Games in 1998. Competing teams are sponsored by companies and all the money is donated.\textsuperscript{36} In Germany, several Highland Games teams and other Scottish playactors regularly support local charities – a fact which the local press likes to comment in articles like ‘Scots are mean? Not at all!’\textsuperscript{37}

[6.8: The evidence: Scots not mean at all! German newspaper, 2008]

Others try to earn money with the Games. The International Highland Games at Machern in Germany (est. 2001) attract some 18 000 people to a castle park outside the city of Leipzig. The organisers entertain guests with a Scottish market, fireworks, massed pipes and drums, sheep dogs, falconry, and countless barbecue grills. Their sponsors are Guinness, a bottled water company, and a German discount supermarket by the name of MäcGeiz (literally: MacMean) – a chain named after the stereotype of the stingy Scot. The chain was set up in 1994 and had 275 tartan-draped shops and 1700 employees all over Germany in 2010.\textsuperscript{38}

The thrifty Saxons from Machern recognised the growing demand for Highland Games as an entrepreneurial chance. They have begun to franchise their Games and helped setting up large and professional Scottish events all over Germany, so in Rüsselsheim (Mainland Games) and Angelbachtal. They charge money to act as instructors and commentators; a travelling circus of Scottish entrepreneurs. Main organiser Uwe Schimmel: ‘We sell beer there, I do the speaker, and we get paid for that.’\textsuperscript{39} Of course, many enthusiasts copy their Games without paying. Talking about a nearby Games event in Halle, Schimmel comments: ‘They really just took over everything from us, even the typos in the festival programme.’\textsuperscript{40}

The Flemish Kram Clan have a similar business model. They are a Highland Games athletic team of eight men in their early 40s, named after their regular pub. Among its members are computer specialists, a dentist, and a pub-owner. They started competing together in 2002 and now organise their own Highland Games in Mechelen, Flanders (est. 2007). In 2009 they had 12 teams participating and 6000 visitors attending. Kram Clan go to other towns and show them how Highland Games are done. For this they charge a fee which they re-invest in their club. ‘Of course we charge a fee. If we go there for a whole day, we have to take a holiday, take care of the kids, bring along the material’, says Banan, the Clan’s PR man.\textsuperscript{41}

Another way of making money from the Games are ‘team building Highland Games’ for corporations. Banks and insurance companies rent the services of a Highland Games team which outfits their workforce with kilts and make them toss cabers and do the tug-of-war. Wout Zijlstra (born 1964) – who won the title of Holland’s Strongest Man in 2001 and the Dutch National Highland Games championships in 2003 and 2004 – offers ‘Highland Games for companies and groups’ on his website: ‘We take care of all the material, referees and score records. Many companies, town festivals, and societies (police, army, etc) have tried our services before you.’ Similarly, a company called Highland Events offers a day out with the firm at their ‘Highland Camp’ on Landgoed Beukenrode in Doorn, near Utrecht. You can choose between the Rob Roy, Highland, or Braveheart programme which seem to vary only very slightly. In Germany, another event and leisure company offers ‘team-building in a kilt’ (Teambildung im Schottenrock) and ‘fun and entertainment in a medieval competition’:

Put on that Scottish kilt, shout out the Clan War Cry, and then we know: The Highland Games have begun! Enter the world of the wild Scots and test your strength... At the Clan tent, guests will be mustered into clans and outfitted with Clan-typical Scottish kilts. At the Clan tent you will also learn more about the Scottish ancestors of the Clans, the heritage and the history! After the war cry of the Clans, the Clan War Cry Rallye [sic], the strong men and women will compete in ‘rustic Games’.

Depending on the company’s budget, the rustic challenge may be followed with a VIP experience. In Austria, the Alpen Highland Games of Carinthia offer a special Business Games competition. Teams of four first compete and then relax with Scotch whisky and exquisite food at the VIP lounge on Hallegg castle. Tariff is 1 200 Euro per team. This trend has reached the United Kingdom, where the company Team Challenge with offices in London, Manchester, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Belfast advertises: ‘Unleash the Highlander inside and take on Team Challenge Company’s Highland Challenge – the perfect way to enjoy a day of exciting and unforgettable Corporate Entertainment, be it for your clients, staff or team away days.’ As in the nineteenth century, when tourists could become Highlanders for a day while stalking deer and shooting grouse, Highland Games athletes are invited to shed their civilised skin and ‘unleash the Highlander inside’.

The ultimate team-building experience may be found at the KFOR. In 2002, the KFOR Nato troops in Kosovo held Highland Games in Leposavic. Competing soldiers wore kilt-like garments and wild face paint. Disciplines included a tug-of-war, carrying lorry wheels, log

In all this happily chaotic activity, there are inevitably those who seek to regulate and organise the Highland Games circuit for reasons of health and safety, profit, or both. In the heavy athletics subculture, continental governing bodies emerge, such as the ‘Association Sportive des Jeux d’Ecosse en France’ AJEF (est. 2005) or the ‘Highland Games Federatie Nederland-België’. There are attempts to set up frameworks for the ‘wild’ team Highland Games, for instance with the ‘Austrian Highlander Cup’ (est. 2004). Some of these organisations bond with Scottish and international bodies such as the ‘International Highland Games Federation’ IHGF or the ‘Scottish Highland Games Federation’ SHGA. But, as in boxing, different systems compete, and no single authority exists that could absorb the European enthusiasm. While the many kilted pipe and drum bands of Europe look almost without exception to the Royal Scottish Pipe Band Association in Glasgow, no Scottish organisation so far has managed to position itself as the overall authority for Highland Games athletes who look for an authentication of their efforts.

Many Scots of Europe are slightly wary about Scotland, the place on the map. While some state that they feel uncomfortable about appropriating someone else’s culture (‘would they mind?’), others note that the Scots are too stiff, too complicated, and too serious about wearing kilts, playing pipes, and tossing cabers. As a Flemish organiser who has visited Scotland puts it: ‘We envy you [the Scots] for your culture, your heritage. But the Highland Games are better in Belgium than in Scotland.’ There is also a sensation that Scotland might not take it seriously enough, that dedicated Europeans do a better ‘Scotland’ than the Scots. ‘The young Scots who would perhaps like our kind of Games, they usually do not even own kilts’, explains the organiser of the Alpen Highland Games in Austria with some disdain. And when a group of Tyrolean Highlanders visited the Strathpeffer Highland Games in 2010, two ladies in tartan gowns told the author that they found the Games slightly disappointing: ‘There’s no real Highlanders here, not like at home.’

6.3 Rediscovering a European Tradition?

Who are the real Highlanders? Many Europeans set up Highland Games without deep thoughts about Scotland or their own relationship to Scottish tradition. They may have seen kilted strongmen tossing tree trunks on television or at a Highland Games competition in the neighbouring village. They set up Highland Games as they would set up an amateur football tournament or a folk music festival. The organiser of Austria’s Lurnfelder Highland Games (est. 2009) explains: ‘I saw the Games in Hopfgarten, Salvenauer Alm in Brixen Valley [Tyrol, Austria] and I was very keen to try this as well. It does not always have to be the local choir and folk dancing.’

Some Europeans, however, see the Highland Games as an opportunity to reconnect with their own history and folklore. The Scots – with their apparently ancient athletic, musical, and sartorial tradition – serve as guardians of a shared past. By imitating Highland Games, the continental Highlanders hope to reactivate their own tradition. They develop elaborate mythologies of kinship to make the Games an expression of their own Celtic, Nordic, or otherwise pre-modern identity.

Celtic kinship is most commonly claimed. The enduring European interest in the Celts of antiquity and in their alleged linguistic, spiritual, and temperamental legacy is legion. The idea that there slumbers a Celt inside us who might be re-awakened to save us from the degenerating effects of civilisation has been with us since the earliest stages of Romanticism. Scholarly doubts about the homogeneity of the ancient Celtic people and the continuities between them and the modern European nations have not shaken the popular belief that ‘the Celts’ have once ruled Europe – before they were pushed westwards by the Romans, to the fringe. In this mythology, Scotland (alongside Ireland, Wales, and Brittany) represents the rest of a once proud pan-European civilisation.

Scottish kilts and bagpipes – so visual, so theatrical – have been used as templates to formulate ‘Celtic’ nationalism in Ireland, Cornwall, Brittany, even Spanish Galicia throughout the twentieth century – usually by activists who did ignore that the Scottish icons they adopted originated in the imperial British military tradition. It appears that Highland Games were not commonly adopted – although in recent years, the ‘Celtic’ nations have discovered them as well. In Brittany, for instance, Breton wrestlers have begun to compete alongside Highland Games athletes, for example in 2010 at the C’hoarioù Breizh festival in Pontivy.

But the Highland Games help to become ‘Celtic’ in areas of Europe which are less commonly associated with modern-day ‘ CELTS’. Christoph Gänsbacher, Captain of the self-proclaimed Gordon Highlanders of Austria (born 1973, a civil servant) has established one of the first Highland Games in the Austrian Alps. When asked whether his hometown Donnerskirchen (Burgenland) has any special connection to Scotland, he replies: ‘Not to Scotland, but to the Celts who are one of Scotland’s original peoples’. Similarly, Thomas Rettl (born 1962, a tailor) who set up the Alpen Highland Games in Carinthia, Austria (2006), thinks that to have Highland Games in Austria is no appropriation of Scottish tradition, but a rediscovery of...

Austrian culture: ‘We have Celtic roots... They were first in our place [in Austria] and only later moved to Scotland...’ He argues that many of the things which are considered typically Scottish today may in fact be Austrian imports: ‘We have proof that tartans come from Austria. As [archaeological] findings show, [we had them] c. 1000 years before the Scots.’

The Austrian says this with a wink and a smile. He does not mean to challenge the Scottishness of the modern kilt. The tailor accepts Scottish authority and has registered his own ‘Carinthian National Tartan’ with the Scottish Tartans Authority in Crieff (ITI No. 3899), not with any Austrian patent office.

Several Europeans see their Highland Games as a celebration of their Celtic roots. Chrigi Kessler (a publican in his forties) organises the Fehraltorf Highland Games (established 2001) on an old airfield in Switzerland. More than 10 000 participants regularly attend his Games, well-known folk and rock bands from Scotland like the Red Hot Chilli Pipers have performed there. Kessler is a passionate motor biker, and he combines his kilt with leather and metal. In his statement, he stresses that bikers used to be into Native American culture but have now discovered the Celts and Scots:

These days, the biker scene loses interest in the Native Americans, in the cowboy image, and discovers the Celts and Vikings instead. ... The Native Americans – I mean we don’t have anything to do with them, really, nothing at all. But the Celts, Gaeldom, to go around carrying a sword, to hold a sword – many people like this a lot. ... People like to hold it, they feel good when holding it – probably because they know it, it is their past, they can identify with it. The people in Southern Germany, Switzerland, Austria, South Tyrol – they in particular can identify with it. Some 200 meters away from the old airstrip where we hold our Highland Games [in Fehraltorf] there are two Celtic burial mounds. This is our direct history, not like the Indians.

The Swiss publican feels that the Scots are more closely related to him than the Native Americans. He thinks that the Highland Games he organises are an expression of the same ancient culture which has left behind the two burial mounds next to his pub. To dress up as a Highlander, a Gael, and to compete at Highland Games means to face an indigenous past, to remember an ancestral world. Importantly, his Scottish playacting is also consistent with the countercultural biker tradition, an appropriation of wild, ‘barbarian’ costumes and symbols, an opposition against mainstream and establishment. To be a Scot is to be a rebel (see Chapter 10).

The quest for Scottish-Celtic self-discovery may become a patriotic occupation. In Germany, where much of pre-modern Germanic folklore and mythology has been ruined by Nazi misuse, Scottish Games (and bagpipes and kilts) are adopted as ersatz folklore. In Eastern Germany, a group calls itself Clan of Eburons (after the Celtic tribe described by Caesar). Their Highland Games of Halle, Saxony-Anhalt (est. 2005) have attracted several thousands of spectators in the past years (the event was paused in 2010). On their website, the Eburons state that to engage in Highland Games means to revive a German tradition:

For more than 2000 years competitions in athletic and musical-cultural disciplines at special festivals (Highland Games) have been documented in the whole of Europe. ... In the Scottish national spirit [Nationalgeist] these festivals survived until today. From Scotland, one of the last Celtic fallback zones [Rückzugsgebiete], many interested clubs and brotherhoods everywhere in Europe now draw inferences to revive the traditional festivals of our ancestors in their homelands [Heimatstätten].

Scotland is made a reservoir of European culture from which inspiration for a Celtic-Nordic revival may be drawn. By competing 'in Celtic Germanic athletic disciplines', they argue, one can keep 'our Indo-Germanic past alive'. This effort clearly has a martial dimension; to reinvent a Germanic ‘Heimatstätte’ by importing Scottish ‘Nationalgeist’ does not suggest a peaceful family picnic.

Scottish Highland Games are declared to be a survival of ancient ‘Celtic’ culture. Their appropriation in Europe serves to formulate a ‘Celtic’ nationalism in Brittany and Galicia, a spiritual link to nameless burial mounds in the Swiss countryside, and a non-Germanic fantasy of a German heroic age. All these appropriations ignore the fact that modern Scottish Highland Games originate in Victorian Britain, that many of the Scottish symbols and customs they enthusiastically adopt encapsulate nineteenth-century British military culture in much more profound ways than a ‘Celtic’ continental past.

This said, Scotland and Europe do share some athletic traditions. A good number of strength sports are practised in contemporary Europe which resemble the Scottish Highland Games. Some of the European Scots have noticed these parallels and try to combine the continental sports with Highland Games. The aim is to sap some of the rebellious image of the Scot and the popularity of Highland Games and transfer it onto the often slightly dusty indigenous traditions. The Scottish element enhances an existing tradition. They imbue their national and regional customs with a rebellious Scottish spirit.

Traditional continental strength sports are found in the Alps. In Austria and Switzerland, traditional wrestlers from Ranggeln and Schwingen claim their own status as Highlanders and increasingly don kilts and compete in Highland Games. 59 Just like the Scottish Highland Games, their strength sports were re-invented in the nineteenth century. In Switzerland, Swiss wrestling or Schwingen has been revived and endowed with rules at large-scale... patriotic festivals, the most famous ones being the Unspunnenfest (1805) and the Eidgenössische (1895). In 2007, athlete Peter Michel from Interlaken (a carpenter in his thirties) first won the Swiss championships in stone putting at Eidgenössisches Schwing- und Älplerfest in Aarau – and then the Swiss Highland Games at St Ursen. At the Swiss event he threw the Unspunnenstein – an 83,5 kilo stone with high political symbolism that has been robbed and held hostage several times, like Scotland’s stone of the Kings. In 2008, Michel travelled to Scotland to compete at ‘real’ Highland Games. In Airth (far away from the geographical Highlands) he carried the Smiddy Stane, a stone of 130 kilos. He was beaten – mostly by Australian and Canadian athletes.

The Games have become international, or maybe they have always been. At nineteenth-century Swiss wrestling championships, there were competitors from ‘England’ trying to beat the locals. ‘Around 1800, an Englishman was world champion in gymnastics and wrestling. He travelled the whole world to try the strongest men, wherever he came.’ In Switzerland, he fought Martin Schelbert from Muotatal (but was beaten).

Stones are also thrown and carried in the Basque country, where the Herri Kirolak Games are very much alive. These strength sports imitate rural work practices. As modernisation made farmers and fishermen increasingly unemployed, their trade was turned into sport in almost commemorative ways. Herri Kirolak disciplines include hay bale tossing, wood chopping, stone throwing, and the tug-of-war. The strength performances are supported by music and costume groups who wear sheep skins, tall hats, and bells. In 2008, a Herri Kirolak ensemble of some 40 people called Nazioen Mundua (world of nations) came to Scotland to present their skills. In July 2009, they returned to participate in the Inverness Highland Games (est. 1822). They came onto the field with saws and axes, saltires and basque flags. They also performed in the Inverness city centre, carrying signs saying ‘Autodeterminazioa’ (self-determination). Unmistakably, they carried a political message into the world of (unfinished) nations. The Basque folklorists found common ground with Scotland, both in politics and athletics. They used the sportive similarities to invoke a shared culture of independence and distinctiveness.

The Scots understood this message instantly. In 2009, an Inverness Basque Tartan was designed (ITI-No 10067), and in October 2010, a Scottish delegation travelled to the Basque country to demonstrate Highland Games. A 50 people strong delegation led by Scottish MSP

Rob Gibson and Highland Councillor Roy Pedersen travelled by coach to Portsmouth and there took the ferry to Santander. The tour was sponsored by the Basque Regional Government and Bòrd na Gàidhlig ‘in support of the development of sporting and cultural and linguistic links between the Basque Highlands and the Scottish Highlands.’ To be sure, there are no linguistic links, as Basque is an isolated language while Scottish Gaelic is q-Celtic and Indo-European language. Rather, the link is political. The Nafarroa Oinez festival which the Scottish delegation performed at in Pamplona raises funds for Basque language schools – a fundraising activity much understood by Bòrd na Gàidhlig.

The Scottish delegation performed in Ordizia on 16 October 2010 and in Pamplona the next day. At the Naforroa Oinnez festival in Pamplona, they entertained an audience of 100 000 people. The programme brought only the finest of Scottish culture and tradition to the Basques: Highlands Dancers, the Caledonian Canal Ceilidh Trail Band, the Highland Youth Pipes and Drums Band, Instrumental Band, Grousebeater Sound System, local DJ Andi Candoo and performers from Eden Court who brought Tour Mascot Jacobite Jess and the three Haggis People.65 ‘The reaction was tremendous’, says Gerry Reynolds of the Highland Council who has been there. Strikingly, the kilted Highland Games athletes in the Inverness delegation hailed from Australia, Japan, Germany, Belgium (and Scotland). Scottish playacting feeds back into Scotland. In the Basque Country, it was playactors who taught the world about the Scots. It was playactors who performed on stage as real Highlanders.

Highland Games have become a popular form of rural entertainment in North-Western Europe. Some pioneer events aside, the first Games were set up during the 1990s. In 2010, at least 130 Games were held, the majority of them in Germany, the Netherlands, and Flanders. While successful Highland Games may grow into large-scale and commercial festivals, the majority of events remain rough and ready village contests. Participants are usually amateurs and compete in teams of four or six. Highland Games are a highly social activity, a place for communal celebration.

Many continental athletes and spectators consider Highland Games an expression of old European culture. By setting up Highland Games they hope to rediscover their own lost tradition. They turn the Scots into Celtic relatives, guardians of pre-modern Europe. They also use Scottish Highland Games to boost and enhance their own local traditions.

Chapter 5 and 6 examined two vital forms of Scottish playacting in Europe; piping and athletics. Both activities may be understood as imitations of a Scottish folk tradition – be it ‘invented’ or not. But the Scots of Europe will not stop at folklore. Many attempt to move beyond the living tradition and towards the finished past. The following two chapters examine continental commemorations and re-enactments of Scottish history.

OUR SCOTTISH PAST: COMMEMORATIONS

The pipers and athletes examined in the previous two chapters do not imitate the past. While it is important to most of them that the musical, athletic, and sartorial traditions they engage with are solidly rooted in history, they do not attempt to reproduce that history. They perform in what they hope is an old but living Scottish tradition.

Commemorators and historical re-enactors have a different objective. As the next two chapters demonstrate, they seek to recreate the past in the present. They do not consider themselves part of an ongoing process; their past is finished, perfectly concluded. They frequently have strong opinions on dates, sources, and authenticity.

Chapter 7 investigates commemorations of Scottish history. Again, it focuses not on private or silent acts of remembrance, but on public, festive, and spectacular forms which have multiplied with the late twentieth-century memory boom. Like bagpipers and athletes, commemorators approach the past as celebrants, as performers. With festivals and ceremonies, they seek to uphold a Scottish memory in Europe. Where they are available, historical links with Scotland are being rediscovered and celebrated.

Almost without exception, these Scottish links are celebrated with the help of Scottish costume, pipe bands, and even Highland Games. The Scottish dreamscape helps to make commemorative events visibly Scottish. This often produces bizarrely blended events; a festival for the Scottish soldiers of World War I for instance may feature Highland Games competitions, and an event to recall medieval missionaries may involve military-style pipe and drum bands of the Victorian period. Commemoration fuses with the internationally popular and powerful Scottish dreamscape.

Chapter 7 first examines a French festival which recalls late medieval Scottish noblemen who fought for the French King. The event features a bewildering mixture of attractions and is largely designed to attract tourists. Commemorative events may be a form of place marketing. The chapter then provides an overview of the different commemorative events in Europe. It identifies some of the historical periods which are chosen for commemoration. It appears that there are usable and less usable Scottish pasts. Moments of warfare, in particular, dominate all Scottish remembrances. The chapter ends with a visit to Flanders, where local enthusiasts erected a monument for the Scottish soldiers who fell in World War I. It appears that Scottish commemorations may acquire a strong political subtext.
7.1 The Seigneurs of Aubigny

Aubigny-sur-Nère is a sleepy village in the Berry, the rural heart of France. Every summer since 1990, its inhabitants stage the steaming Fêtes Franco-Ecossaises, a Scottish-styled country fair which lasts several days and attracts some 10 000 visitors. The event commemorates the Scottish noblemen who ruled and owned Aubigny from the fifteenth to the seventeenth century. John Stuart of Darnley (c. 1380–1429, of Renfrewshire) had sailed to La Rochelle with an expeditionary force of Scottish soldiers during the Hundred Years’ War to honour the Auld Alliance, the military pact with France. He fought for the French King Charles VII against the advancing English, prepared the way for Joan of Arc at Orléans and was rewarded for his services with the town of Aubigny in 1423. John Stuart fell in battle in 1429, but his descendants stayed in Aubigny until 1672.1

Two Stuart chateaux still stand in and around Aubigny. Mr Yves Fromion (born 1941) is convinced he has rediscovered and revived the Scottish connection single-handedly. He claims that the Stuarts were no longer remembered in Aubigny when he was elected mayor in 1989: ‘There was not a trace of memory left’, he says, except for one elusive legend concerning a row of apple trees, allegedly planted by a Scotsman.2

Mr Fromion had not lived in Aubigny before 1989, and there is good evidence that the Scottish connection lay dormant rather than dead in Aubigny before his arrival.3 The catalogue of a 1956 French-Scottish exhibition in Paris for instance mentions that the people of Aubigny-sur-Nère remember the Stuarts fondly and even try to make commercial use of their Scottish past by naming their shops after the noblemen (‘Patisserie des Stuarts’).4 Several family names in the region such as Turpin or Bailly are locally referred to as ‘Scottish’. And Mr Fromion himself learnt of Aubigny’s Scottish past from his mother who had grown up in the neighbouring town or Vorly and attended girls’ school in Aubigny. On 15 August 1931, she witnessed a country fair in Aubigny that promoted a Scottish theme and historical pageant. Apparently, the pageant was a re-enactment of Robert Stuart’s (c. 1470–1544) victorious return from the battle of Marignano in 1515, where he and his Scottish soldiers had fought the Swiss for the King of France. A local aristocrat and owner of one of the surviving Stuart chateaux, M. le Marquis de Vogüé, played Robert Stuart in 1931, while a 3 Mr Fromion grew up in the nearby village of Vorly but left for Paris as a young man to pursue a career, first in the army and then in the Ministry of Defence. He is not solely a provincial mayor but a well-known French politician. Since 1997, he is a member of the National Assembly of France for UMP, the centre-right party of President Nicolas Sarkozy.

beauty queen from Paris took the role of a Stuart lady. The historical parade (‘cortège’) was accompanied by the bagpipers of the Caledonian School of London who had come over to France for the occasion. The Scottish fair was organised by the Agricultural Society of Aubigny and part of the agricultural fair cycle which had every community hold a festival every seven years. But the event was never repeated – until 1990.

When he became mayor of Aubigny, Mr Fromion recalled his mother’s story of the Aubigny Scots and decided to revive the Scottish fair. The mayor thought that Aubigny needed a festival, an event to boost tourism and community feeling. He explains that the existing wine or horse festivals in the region seemed dull to him, and also a bit macabre, as agriculture was dying in these parts of France. Mr Fromion wanted to create something special, an occasion that would stand out and draw the crowds.

The plan worked marvellously. The Fêtes Franco-Ecossaises have become Aubigny’s main tourist attraction. During the Fêtes, the town population swells dramatically, every aubèrge and hotel is booked. The many visitors from near and far are rarely disappointed. They find in Aubigny a French town which has styled itself Scottish. Since 1990, Aubigny set up an Auld Alliance museum (Musée de la Auld Alliance), a bar by the name of Le Cutty Sark, and a kilted pipe & drum band, the Auld Alliance Pipe Band. The band has been formed deliberately to perform at the Fêtes, by direct order of the Mayor Yves Fromion who even sent some of his municipality staff over to Scotland to attend bagpipe classes. An Aubigny tartan was designed and registered with the Scottish Tartan Authority (No. 2159). However, no one seems to like its colours very much, and most locals wear the Stuart Hunting sett. At the town entrance, a wrought-iron bagpiper welcomes visitors, a monument depicting a sword in a stone reminds visitors of the town’s role in the Auld Alliance, and the local Office du Tourisme sells Aubigny Auld Alliance Malt Whisky, made by a Belgian distiller with water from Loch Katrine, Scotland. Mayor Fromion proudly explains that the town has acquired all the ‘distinctive signs of Scotland’. Scotland is a game, and everyone who knows the rules can participate.

The Fêtes of Aubigny recall the medieval Stuarts with a variety of attractions. Visitors come to see the historical re-enactment camps, the fireworks, the medieval market (‘marché medieval’) where local producers sell marmalade and wine. The main attraction, however, is the grand parade and its pipe bands. When the author visited in 2009, the parade was led by the local pipe band, the Auld Alliance Pipe Band, consisting of about 40 musicians of all generations who performed in full Highland attire. Bystanders lined Aubigny’s main street on both sides and cheered when the Scots walked by. Other kilted pipers and drummers in the parade belonged to the Pipe Band of Saint-Brieuc, the Normandy Highlanders Pipe Band, and the Somme Battlefield Pipe Band, a commemorative pipe band whose musicians wore army shirts above their kilts (see below). Between the bands there marched medieval re-enactors in shining armour, wild ‘Celts’ with huge Irish wolf hounds and flowing robes, Victorian fancy dress clubs, and the local theatre club. There were also several non-Scottish pipe bands, such as Bagad Men Glaaz, an ensemble of Breton pipers and drummers, two sombre gaita bands from Northern Spain and Portugal, and several fire brigade brass bands from the neighbouring villages. Finally, the Musique de Région Terre Nord-Ouest came down the high street, a renowned French Army band stationed in Rennes and equipped with Breton bagpipers sporting the black and white Breton flag. The Scottish commemorative festival had turned into a military and folk music event.

To everyone’s surprise, an elephant marched at the end of the parade. It trotted down High Street, following the heavily armoured re-enactors of Les Chevaliers de Paladin. Its wide forehead was decorated with red and gold, and on its blanket-covered back rode a female figure in several layers of pink dress. The elephant was led by a keeper who made sure the animal would not take a shortcut through the several thousands of spectators. Flyers were handed out by Asian people in festive dress. They asked the audience to support the Hmong people of Laos in the protection of their elephants. Mayor Yves Fromion had decided that the Fêtes Franco-Ecossaises were the perfect place to promote the Laotian elephant – especially now that a gentleman of Laotian descent had recently been elected to his municipality. When Mr Fromion addressed the audience via microphone, he made it clear that he would not be limited by history: ‘After the monster of Loch Ness, we have invented the Scottish elephant’, he exclaimed triumphantly. Everything is possible in the Scottish dreamscape.

7.2 Remembering the Scots

There is no shortage of historical contact between Scotland and Europe. The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in particular saw many thousands of Scottish migrants travel to North-Eastern Europe. Scottish pedlars and vagrants came to the continent in so substantial numbers that they were banned from several cities, often along with Jews and Armenians. In the Thirty Years War, large numbers of Scottish mercenaries fought in both the Protestant and Catholic armies of Europe. And in the Baltic region, Scottish merchants set up powerful business networks and trading organisations after the decline of the Hanse. Only with the rise of the British Empire did the stream of Scottish migration and trade turn West, towards the Atlantic world.\textsuperscript{11} Scottish soldiers continued to attract attention in Europe as members of the British Army, be it in the Napoleonic, the Crimean, or the two World Wars.

The memory boom of the past two decades (see Chapter 2) witnessed a growth of public interest in Europe’s many historical links with Scotland. In 2010, at least two dozen festivals and numerous private clubs in North-Western Europe were dedicated to the maintenance and revival of a Scottish memory. Most of the events and associations were established in the 1990s and the first decade of the twenty first century. They belong to the same Scottish boom that saw the spread of pipe bands and Highland Games (see Chapters 5 and 6). A list of commemorative festivals is included in the appendix.

Many commemorative events recall the two World Wars. One of the largest events held in Europe at the beginning of the twenty first century is \textit{Scotfest} in Tilburg, Netherlands, which was established in 2005 and attracted approximately 30 000 people in 2008.\textsuperscript{12} Scotfest celebrates the memory of the Scottish regiments who liberated the region from Nazi occupation as part of the allied forces in 1944. It does so with a stunning number of ‘Scottish’ attractions. Scotfest 2010 featured a live show by Scottish comedy rock band Red Hot Chilli Pipers, Highland Games, bagpipe bands, a wellie throwing contest, blow-up cushions for the kids, a bird of prey show – in short, ‘everything one can associate with Scotland’. The organisers advertise Scotfest as ‘a day out for the whole family’.\textsuperscript{13} Entrance to the event is free. As in Aubigny, the Scotfest organisers are keen to acquire all the ‘distinctive symbols’ of Scotland. In 2008, they registered a Tilburg Tartan with the Scottish Tartan Authority (No. 7464).

The two World Wars inspire Scottish commemorations in France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. As examined in Chapter 5, the Scottish soldiers’ pipe bands left a particularly strong impression on the continent. Their memory is being revived in ‘commemorative pipe bands’. The 48\textsuperscript{th} Highlanders of Holland, for instance, were founded in the Dutch town of Apeldoorn in 1991 to commemorate the 48\textsuperscript{th} Highland Regiment of the Canadian Army (est. 1891) which helped to liberate the Netherlands from Nazi occupation.\textsuperscript{14} The 48\textsuperscript{th} Highlanders of Holland are technically a pipe and drum band, but see themselves as a ‘living monument’. Their secretary (born 1965, a senior laboratory scientist) explains:

The band has been founded as a living monument to the liberators of our town Apeldoorn during WWII by some local enthusiasts. We are officially recognised by the regiment of the 48th Highlanders of Canada. Although we perform in Service Dress uniforms according to WWII pattern, we are also allowed to wear the modern Canadian uniforms with full regalia in and outside Canada.
\end{quote}

In their attempt to reproduce the uniforms and crests correctly, the Dutch Highlanders have contacted the original regiment, stationed in Toronto. A retired pipe major of the Canadian regimental band, Mr Ross Stewart (d. 2001), came several times to the Netherlands during the 1990s to drill his Dutch imitators. Canadian veterans have met with the band when visiting the Canadian War Cemetery in nearby Holten, and the Dutch band’s website is linked on the Canadian regimental pages. The copy found the original’s approval.

Other such ‘mobile monuments’ include the Passchendaele 1917 Pipes & Drums, Flanders (est. 2007), the Somme Battlefield Pipe Band, France (est. 1989), the Normandy Highlanders, France (est. 2001), and the The Seaforth Highlanders of Holland, Memorial Pipes and Drums, Netherlands (1999). Their musicians usually wear twentieth century Scottish military dress rather than normal Highland attire, and they perform at commemorative events and parades. In France, the D-Day Piper Bill Millin Association, raised money for a £75 000 bronze statue of Mr Bill Millin from Glasgow (d. 2010), to be erected on Sword Beach, Normandy, where Mr Millin came ashore, playing the pipes in a hail of bullets, on 6 June 1944.15

These commemorative events and organisations are no isolated phenomena but part of a broader Western effort to remember the two World Wars (see below). Often, Scottish commemorators will join larger acts of remembrance. In Caravaggio, Northern Italy, the Italian Claymore Pipes & Drums (est. 1998) marched in a commemorative parade to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.16 And the 2007 Scottish Weekend at Flanders (see below) was one of three theme weekends at Passchendaele, alongside an Anzac and a Canadian memorial event.17

But commemorators also target the more distant past. The annual Pillarguri Days in Norway’s Gudbrands Valley commemorate the 1612 battle of Kringen which saw local farmers ambush a party of Scottish mercenaries who had come to join the Swedish army.18 One of the expedition’s leading figures was George Sinclair from Stirkoke whose grave in the town of Kvam may still be visited today. In the late eighteenth and nineteenth century, Norwegian poets recalled the luckless Scottish mercenaries and interpreted the episode as proof of Norway’s national resilience. Their Sinclair ballads and fiddle tunes remain popular to this day.19 The Pillarguri Days take place since the 1990s and are organised by the Sinclair Club of Otta. They are named after the mythical Norwegian girl Guri who is said to have played her horn or lur when the Scots approached. The Pillarguri Days were attended at least once (in 1999) by the present Earl of Caithness, Chief of Clan Sinclair, who stresses 'the deep friendship that now exists between our related communities'. The festival involves a 'combination of pipes and drums and Hardanger fiddle, kilt and tartan bunad [a local costume said to contain tartan], akevitt and whisky', and is regularly joined by the Oslo Caledonian (est. 1997) and the Bergen Pipe Band (2005).

Scottish commemorations can make use of long-standing legends. In the Italian Alps, the inhabitants of the town of Gurro (population 250) claim to be descendants of the 'lost Clan', a battalion of Scottish soldiers that got lost on the retreat after the battle of Pavia in 1525. In September 1973, a museum was opened, a commemorative plaque unveiled, and Lieutenant-Colonel Robert Gayre of Gayre and Nigg, Chief of Clan Gayre and a professional anthropologist, made use of his right to adoption and declared all inhabitants of Gurro members of Clan Gayre. The occasion was broadcasted by BBC Scotland, and many Scots have heard of that Scottish village in the Piemontese mountains. In September 2003, a new Festival of Friendship was established in Gurro which now seems to take place biannually. The town's only bar is named 'Scotch'. The case of Gurro is one of the very few cases in which Europeans claim Scottish ancestry.

[7.5: Le Giornate dell' Amicizia, Gurro, Italy, 2003]

In other areas of Europe, Scottish links are being rediscovered that have long faded from public memory. In Austria, the Tyrolean Highland Games of Leutasch claim to honour (amongst other things) Eleanor of Scotland (1433-1480), the daughter of King James I of Scotland who married the Habsburg Archduke Sigismund of Austria and died in Innsbruck. Her grave may still be seen at Stams monastery, Tyrol, but neither she nor her Scottish link are widely remembered. The dedicated commemorator may select arcane moments of Scottish contact in order to justify a festival with a Scottish theme – or even bend history a little. Organisers of the Harz Highland Games in Germany stress that Louise of Stolberg-Gedern (1752-1824), the wife of Charles Edward Stuart, came from the Harz region. However, while Louise’s family has old links to the area, Louise was born in the Austrian Netherlands (now Belgium) and spent most of her life in Florence.

Some commemorators do not limit themselves to only one historical event. In France, the remarkable Alliance France-Ecosse was founded in 1995 to produce an inventory of all the Scottish sites of memory in France. It set out to map the nation’s Scottish moments and produced a range of memorial plaques which were mounted and unveiled in commemorative ceremonies, often involving kilted pipe and drum bands and other Scottish attractions. The Alliance’s president, Mr Julian Hutchings (born 1951, of Scottish ancestry), states:

Our wreath laying events, memorial inaugurations etc are all connected to Scots or Scottish events. We have ‘taken care’ of restoring Scots from events dating back to the Hundred Years War, right up to the Tartan Pimpernel – Donald Caskie – and the Second World War.25

Similarly, the Scots Heritage club in the Netherlands organises Highland Games and various cultural events to commemorate the seventeenth century Scottish mercenary presence in the Low Countries as well as all other phases of Scottish contact. The society also provides assistance in genealogical matters. Scots Heritage restores Scottish gravestones in the Netherlands, such as the one to Jacobite general Lord George Murray, (d. 1760). Their piper also provides ‘Scottish atmosphere’ at commemorative and commercial events.26

In some rare cases, the Scots are also commemorated as descendants. In Flanders, Mr Daniel Crombez (born 1949) who organises a Celtic-Scottish festival in French-speaking Wallonie and who plays in the Blue Stone Pipes & Drums argues that the Crombies of Scotland are descendants of his emigrant-ancestors.27 Similarly, Clan Hay’s continental Clan society was founded by Fleming Tom Hye in 2005. Hye insists that the Hays, his ancestors, had come to England with William the Conqueror in the eleventh century and subsequently helped to colonise and develop Scotland. Instead of dreaming up Scottish roots, he claims that the Scots were Flemish from the beginning.28 This does not prevent his Clan Hay Europe from organising a commemorative parade for the ‘Scottish’ Hays who fell in the Great War, from forming a pipe band and having a ‘Gathering’ at the Highland Games of Ooidonk.29 Even a Flemish Scotland is apparently best commemorated by summoning up the Scottish dreamscape.

Commemorative festivals provide entertainment. They compete for attention with other leisure attractions. History is one option in the market of weekend experiences. In the Hessian town of Schotten, Germany, a ‘Scottish midsummer festival’ aims to recall the Scottish (and Irish) monks who gave the village its name.30 The event is marketed via the local official tourist office and clearly designed to attract entertainment seekers from the region. The festival consists of Highland Games, pipe bands, sword fighting, jugglers, pottery and craftsmen, theatre, live music, open air cinema (‘Lord of the Dance’), and Whisky tasting. Scottish memory may be turned into an economically viable tourist attraction, an asset in place marketing. Several areas which have Scottish links begin to see these in a new light. Officials in the Polish town of Szkotowo, for instance, were seeking

There are several other place names in Germany and Switzerland which may have been inspired by Scottish missionaries, e.g. Schütz, Schottikon, etc. On the Irish-Scottish mission to Europe, see Paul Mai, ed., Scoti Peregrini in St. Jakob. 800 Jahre irisch-schottische Kultur in Regensburg (Regensburg: Schnell und Steiner, 2005). support in Scotland in 2010 to set up a large-scale Scottish festival and theme park to celebrate the Scottish knights who allegedly gave the place its name:

To encourage tourists, a leisure park inspired by ancient Scottish architecture is to be set by the lake side. Creating a tourist attraction in such an attractive area connected with Scottish culture, increasingly popular in Poland, will not only provide real development opportunities for the local community but will also be an outstanding project designed to increase historical and cultural awareness.

One of the great advantages of a Scottish link is that Scottish history comes with a full package of activities and symbols. Scottish iconography is rich and colourful. It is also well-known; there are hardly ever any doubts about Scotland’s ‘distinctive symbols’, about the ways in which a Scottish past could be commemorated and celebrated. The Scottish dreamscape has come to be internationally known, and it may be activated to commemorate Scottish links of every kind and period. Commemorators can rely on specialists who are ready to appear wherever Scottish history needs to be remembered and made visible; kilt wearers, bagpipers, Highland Games athletes, historical re-enactors. Unlike other strands of European history, the commemoration of Scottish history easily connects to an existing international playacting culture. When the Polish town of Szkotowo held a Scottish summer festival in 2010, the organisers had support from Polish Highland Games athletes and a pipe band from the city of Gdańsk (est. 2000).

The remembrance of Scottish history is not congruent with Scottish migration to Europe. Commemoration does not spring up automatically at all points of historical contact. There is, for example, only limited commemorative interest in the Scottish mercantile presence in the Netherlands, early modern Prussia, Scandinavia, and the Baltic. This may be because economic history is a past less usable for remembrance, and civilian links are less easily turned into a Scottish festival. Warfare is the dominant theme in all commemorations of Scottish history in Europe. True, some enthusiasts tried to set up events to remember the seventeenth century Scottish wool merchants in the Low Countries, or a Warsaw mayor with Scottish roots. But compared to the number and size of Scottish war remembrances and memorials, the commemorative effort for civilian history is marginal.

There are several explanations for this dominance of warlike themes. First, the Scottish mercenaries and soldiers who fought in Europe in the Thirty Years War, the Napoleonic wars, and the two World Wars reportedly made a lasting impression on the European public (see Chapter 4). Their kilts and bagpipers were recorded in woodcuts, paintings, and photographs. Much of Scottish-European contact happened in the context of warfare, and this is mirrored in legends such as those in Norway and Northern Italy. Secondly, the popular image of Scotland is inextricably linked to military images. Nineteenth and twentieth century popular culture disseminated an image of kilted Highland soldiers. To direct one’s commemorative impulse towards Scottish soldiers rather than merchants and civilians at the end of twentieth century was to follow the focus of the Scottish dreamscape.

Thirdly and most importantly, the commemoration of Scottish history is firmly embedded in the late twentieth-century memory boom (see Chapter 2). War and the graves which it produced are at its core. At a time when the last eyewitnesses and veterans pass away and first-hand memory fades, the two World Wars are increasingly recalled in commemoration.

To Mr Karel van Broekhoven (born 1971, a sales representative), the founder of Scofest in Tilburg, Netherlands, a commemoration of World War II is a commemoration of his own family history: ‘My grandfather fought in the Dutch resistance in World War II, and my father saw the Scottish soldiers marching in as a child.’ Mr van Broekhoven calls himself a ‘hobby historian’.

The memory boom as a whole is dominated by war. If we, with Sharon MacDonald, imagine the European past as a ‘Museum Europe’, then visitors spend most of their time ‘at battlefields, concentration camps, war-graves or interrogation centres’. This obsession with war and suffering does not necessarily express a militarist zeitgeist or a lust for real war. The anthropologist Regina Bendix argues that the playing of (or with) war may be a strategy to avoid real war, and Sharon Macdonald points out that the commemoration of warfare may become ‘a kind of talismanic act: if we publicly mark and commemorate atrocity we can protect our futures’.

Perhaps significantly, there is no lust for revenge in the continental commemorations of Scottish warfare. The Scots are without exception remembered as martyrs and ‘good guys’. In Europe, the Scots are commemorated as allies (France), as liberators (Netherlands, France, Flanders), as hardy soldiers and mercenaries (Netherlands, France), as noblemen remembered.

and local patrons (France, Tyrol), and, sympathetically, as the defeated (Norway). They are also remembered as embodiments of old fashioned military valour, a heroic antithesis to the cold technology of warfare. Without exception, the Scots are remembered as a likeable and befriended nation; there are no commemorative events in Europe marking ‘the evil deeds of the Scots’, or ‘the day the Scots robbed us’. Commemorations of Scottish history are expressions of affection.

7.3 A Scottish Cross for Flanders

In Flanders fields, a Celtic cross of Scottish granite (Corrennie Pink) was erected on 25 August 2007. It stands as a monument to the Scottish soldiers who fought and died at Passchendaele during the Third Battle of Ypres in 1917, and of ‘all Scots who were involved in the Great War’. This includes Highland regiments and Scottish soldiers from Canada, Australia, and South Africa, and also ‘the many Scots who served in English, Irish, Welsh, New Zealand, New Foundland [sic] and other battalions’. The cross was raised to represent them all – and to fill what the initiators perceived to be a gap in the landscape of remembrance:

Strangely enough, at the Western Front, nowhere a monument can be found commemorating the overall Scottish involvement. This is so much more striking as the very Scottish regiments took part in some very heavy fighting, often at crucial moments.

The Scottish cross was raised on the Frezenberg ridge near the village of Passendale (Passchendaele in English) in Zonnebeke, West Flanders. It stands on a plinth of original Great War bunker stones; the whole construction has a height of six metres (c. 20 feet). The cross was designed by a Flemish arts teacher and produced by Fyfe Memorials in Oldmeldrum, near Aberdeen, Scotland. The project’s initiator was a professional Flemish soldier, Mr Erwin Ureel (born 1959) of Roeselare, a long-time aficionado of Scotland and Ireland and a founding member of the kilted Passchendaele 1917 Pipes & Drums. Mr Ureel is not of Scottish ancestry but feels that both he and his wife have ‘a weak spot for the “Celtic” countries, especially Scotland’, where they regularly spend their holidays. He also suspects that his interest in the Scots of Passchendaele stems from his distinctly Flemish outlook on world history and politics: ‘I am from a Flemish-nationalist family which made me rather sensitive for the aspect of cultural diversity, not only in the Great War.’

[7.6: Flyer, Flanders Memorial Day, Belgium, 2009]
Mr Ureel first had the idea for a Scottish monument after witnessing the reburial of Private John Thomson (of Lochgelly, Fife), a Scottish soldier with the 2\textsuperscript{nd} Bn. Gordon Highlanders who fell in Flanders on 4 October 1917. Thomson’s remains were found by a gardener in Zonnebeke in 1998 and then officially reburied at Polygon Wood Cemetery, in October 2004.\footnote{Thomson’s remains were identified by his badge and the initials ‘J.R.T.’ on his pocketknife. DNA comparisons with family members confirmed his identity. The reburial took place on 21 October 2004. Personal Communication Erwin Ureel (21 Sept 2010), CWGC’s online archives [http://www.cwgc.org/] (10 Sept 2010)} Some 250 people attended the ceremony which was organised by the Commonwealth War Graves Commission and what was then the successor regiment to the Gordons, The Highlanders.\footnote{The Gordon Highlanders (created 1881) were combined with the Seaforth and Cameron Highlanders in 1994 to form The Highlanders. In 2004, The Highlanders were again amalgamated with other Scottish infantry regiments to form the Royal Regiment of Scotland. [http://www.army.mod.uk/infantry/regiments/SCOTS.aspx] (10 Sept 2010)} A regimental piper and several soldiers had come over from Scotland to attend, and so had members of Private Thomson’s family. Mr Ureel remembers the ceremony as one of the most moving he had ever witnessed in his career both as a professional soldier and as a war museum volunteer.

In the subsequent years, Mr Ureel’s ‘Scottish Memorial in Flanders campaign’ secured more than 40 000 € of funding from the Flemish Government, the Scottish Executive, the cities of Aberdeen and Glasgow, the Royal British Legion Scotland, the Vlaams Caledonian Society and other donors. Another 30 000 € were sponsored by the Zonnebeke community council.\footnote{Personal Communication Erwin Ureel (21 Sept 2010). Ureel & Sutherland, ‘A Scottish Monument in Flanders’, 23.}

In August 2007, the Scottish monument in Flanders was unveiled, and the occasion celebrated with a two-day Scottish Weekend. The festival was part of Remembrance, a series of commemorative events which marked the 90\textsuperscript{th} anniversary of the battles of Passchendaele and Messines, and which was coordinated by the Passchendaele 1917 Memorial Museum in Zonnebeke.

The Scottish Weekend combined ‘the aspects of remembrance with traditional Scottish culture’ by offering a range of attractions; a pipe band tattoo, battlefield tours, a theatrical performance of a play allegedly penned by a Scottish stretcher-bearer (‘The Prayer’), and a ‘dawn service’. According to the programme, the ‘unique battlefield walk’ ended with ‘a Scottish breakfast, prepared by an army cook from Scotland’. Perhaps surprisingly, the Scottish Weekend also included sheep dog demonstrations, a birds of prey show, Scottish dancing by the Vlaams Caledonian Society, a tasting of ‘haggis and blends of whisky’, and Highland Games. The latter provided, as the programme notes, ‘[a] taste of ancient folklore from Scotland … genuine Scottish bruisers show how it should be done. Local teams will play for the honour’.\footnote{Remembrance. Battle of Messines-Wytsgaete. Battle of Passchendaele. 1917-2007. Program 7 June – 11 November 2007. (Brochure published by Memorial Museum Passchendaele 1917, Zonnebeke, 2007).}

Evidently, the commemorative event at Passchendaele conformed to a European tradition of celebrating Scotland. By incorporating pseudo-medieval falconry shows and entertainment such as Scottish dancing and Highland Games, the organisers made an effort to attract some of the crowds which are normally drawn to established Scottish events in Flanders, like the Scottish Weekend at Alden Biesen or the Schotse Beurs in Ghent. The unveiling of the war... memorial fused with the established Scottish dreamscape to become recognisably Scottish, and it did so successfully; the 2007 celebration brought c. 10 000 visitors to Zonnebeke. This encouraged the organisers to repeat the Scottish Weekend, in September 2009, as 'Flanders Scottish Memorial Day'. In the future, they will try to hold the event biannually.

Organisers of commemorative events try to authenticate their events by having real Scotsmen attending, just as the Highland Games and pipe band competitions may try to attract Scottish judges, bands, and guests of honour. At the 2007 Scottish Weekend in Flanders, internationally renowned Scottish pipe and drum bands like the Scots Guards and the Isle of Cumbrae RBLS Pipe Band (affiliated with the Royal British Legion Scotland) played alongside the Somme Battlefield Pipe Band from Peronne, France, The 48th Highlanders of Holland from Appelscha, Netherlands, and the Flemish Passchendaele 1917 Pipes & Drums, a commemorative band sporting the Gaelic motto ‘Cuimhnichibh’ (Remember) and a self-designed ‘Passchendaele tartan’, the colours of which ‘reflect the mud and bloodshed of the Passchendaele 1917 battle’ (Scottish Tartan Authority No. 6982). In the massed band, Scottish and continental bands united to remember the dead Scots of World War I. They played ‘Highland Cathedral’, a well-known Scottish traditional – composed by two German Scotland fans in the 1980s (see Chapter 5).

While commemorations of Scotland will only very rarely lead people to think of themselves as Scottish, the celebration of Scottish heritage and warfare may provide identification for small nations and independence-minded groups. Scottish history may be commemorated and reframed politically. This became evident in the speeches that were held at the Scottish weekend at Passchendaele, in 2007. Mr Geert Bourgeois, Flemish Minister of Tourism, External Affairs, and Media and a member of the secessionist Nieuw Vlaamse Alliantie party, stressed that the Scottish monument furthered ‘bonding through commemoration’ and put the Flemish-Scottish co-operation in thoroughly contemporary political context: ‘The commemoration of what should never be repeated thus immediately becomes an active step towards increased and intensified cooperation between the federated states in Europe.’ In this reading, the joint commemoration of the dead Scottish soldiers became an act of solidarity between two aspiring European regions. Both Scotland and Flanders acquired greater political self-determination in the 1990s but still harbour strong separatist movements. At Zonnebeke, the soldiers’ sacrifice was re-appreciated as having forged a bond between the two countries that might be of further use.

At some points, the rhetoric seemed even to suggest that the Scots of 1917 had given their lives for Scottish nationhood. Ms Linda Fabiani, Scottish Minister for Europe, External Affairs, and Culture and a member of the Scottish National Party, insisted that the Scots had died for Scotland at Passchendaele: ‘It is with humility, compassion and quiet pride that we remember with gratitude those Scots who fought and died for our nation on the fields of Flanders during 1917.’

In a way, all war memorials and commemorations make instrumental use of the past. The historian Reinhart Koselleck noted that modern war memorials serve as sites of identity making to the survivors. Both the soldiers’ physical death and later the commemoration of their sacrifice are used to support narratives of the political future. Koselleck notes that it is always the survivors who make a soldier’s death meaningful in commemoration, and that such ascribed meaning may diverge from everything the soldier felt and thought about his death and duty.\textsuperscript{52} Such instrumental uses of history and the dead have not ceased. The discourse on graves as markers of ethno-historical territory was a key feature of the wars in the Yugoslavia of the 1990s.\textsuperscript{53}

The Flemish-Scottish co-operative effort to identify and commemorate an ‘overall Scottish involvement’ in the Great War is an unmistakably political action. The Scottish soldiers at Passchendaele will only very rarely have fought with Scottish or even Flemish nationhood on their minds. The monument in Flanders demonstrates how acts of remembrance may become stages for contemporary nationalism.

\section*{Conclusion Chapter 7}

At least two dozen recurring festivals and numerous clubs and associations in Northern and Western Europe commemorate moments of Scottish-European contact. While these festivals often make use of established local legends and public memory, they were all set up in the 1990s or in the first decade of the twenty first century. Commemorative spectacles are firmly embedded in the late twentieth-century memory boom, the growing public interest in the past and its celebration. The festivals represent a new approach to local history, an approach that employs the past in strategies of place marketing and tourism. They allow for a sensuous experience of local history.

The celebrated moments of Scottish-European contact range from the Middle Ages to the two World Wars and after. However, not every Scottish-European interaction is usable for commemoration. The strong Scottish mercantile presence in early modern Europe, for instance, seems to lack the drama that is sought by commemorators. Similarly, the many Scottish-European intellectual links during Reformation and the Enlightenment era hardly ever inspire commemorative spectacles. Today’s commemoration does not mirror the actual or total Scottish presence on the continent in past times.

Usable pasts appear to be found predominantly in martial history. Commemorators recall Scottish soldiers, from sixteenth-century mercenaries to the British Highland regiments of the two World Wars. Again, we see that Scottish commemorations are part of the wider memory boom which is focused on themes of warfare, heroism, and mourning. Scottish soldiers – so colourful, so familiar, so unique – have become an attractive focus in commemoration.

As examined earlier, bagpipers and Highland Games athletes develop vague and creative mythologies of kinship to justify their performances. In contrast, commemorators recall largely real historical encounters with Scotland. They live in locations which experienced Scottish moments, sometimes decisive ones, as in World War II. And yet, this reality is not enough. Almost without exception, Scottish moments are remembered and made visible with the help of the Scottish dreamscape, with pipe bands and Highland Games that will draw the crowds. Commemorators may have a link to Scotland the place, but it is Scotland the dream which makes these links visible. As Chapter 8 explores, this may lead to a dilemma for those who advocate recreating the past ‘authentically’, according to the facts.
Chapter 7 examined how continental history enthusiasts commemorate moments of Scottish-European contact. While these commemorators seek to uphold or revive a Scottish memory, re-enactors strive to reproduce it. Since the late 1960s, historical re-enactment has become a popular leisure activity for thousands of hobbyists around the world. Re-enactors bring the past back to life in the present. They employ reconstructed weaponry, tools, costumes, and even language to re-enact selected moments and characters of the past. They do so for pleasure and sensuous experience.

‘Scotland’ became a proper re-enactment genre in the past two decades. In Europe, North America, Australasia, and beyond, many dozens of hobbyist groups specialise in Scottish history. Chapter 8 investigates continental re-enactments of Scottish history. It first examines the cultural practice that is historical re-enactment and its development since the 1960s. It then explores the Scottish genre, the moments in Scottish history which re-enactors find usable for their performances. As in commemoration, Scottish soldiers are at the centre of attention. The chapter then addresses the issue of authenticity, the re-enactors’ efforts to separate myth from fact. Most re-enactors strive to reconstruct the past ‘as it really happened’ – a creed which leads them into trouble when targeting Scottish history.

8.1 To re-enact the past

In everyday usage, the expression ‘historical re-enactment’ stands for the theatrical recreation of past events and periods for the purpose of entertainment and/or education. This is how the term will be used in this study.

In academic discourse, ‘re-enactment’ may also denote a historical method. The British philosopher and historian RG Collingwood (1889–1943) popularised the term in the 1940s, recommending that every historian should temporarily ‘become’ the people he or she studies. To comprehend the lives of the past, Collingwood argued, ‘the historian must re-enact the past in his own mind’. Notably, such re-enactment remained a cognitive effort; Collingwood never suggested that the historian should get up and wield a broadsword.

Physical recreations of past events have, of course, been popular throughout history. The sociologist Paul Connerton argues that all communities are created in repetition, in commemorative rituals that ‘re-enact’ shared myth and history. Homer’s recital of the

Chapter 8 – Re-enactment

The restaging of the trials of Christ in popular German passion plays, even recurring outbreaks of anti-Semitic violence in late medieval Europe have all been interpreted as ‘re-enactments’ of mythical and biblical history. As examined in Chapter 2.3, medieval jousting and knightly play were popular from the beginning of the modern period, first in Europe, then in North America. More recent ‘re-enactments’ include the tableaux vivants in late eighteenth-century Europe, the reproduction of political events on the British theatre stage, historical pageants in nineteenth-century North America, and the re-staged storming of the Winter Palace in the young Soviet Union, which had an estimated 10,000 people recreating the event in 1920, only three years after its historical occurrence.

As a participative hobby for the masses, however, historical re-enactment originated in the late 1960s, when thousands of amateurs began to physically reproduce the past in social clubs. The battle shows at the U.S. Civil War centennials between 1961 and 1964, and the early role-playing events of the Society for Creative Anachronism, founded in Berkeley, California, in 1966, are alternatively seen as the beginning of hobbyist re-enactment.

The spread of historical re-enactment must be understood as a symptom of the memory boom. Spreading affluence among the baby boomer generation of the West inspired new forms and markets of mass leisure, while a growing sense of nostalgia and anti-modernism made the past increasingly attractive as an exciting counter-world on these markets. In the 1960s, historical re-enactment was recognised as an entrance into this counter-world, a way of experiencing history, both as an active performer and a passive spectator. Unsurprisingly, scholars of tourism and marketing have approached re-enactment and its economic potential with particular enthusiasm.\(^\text{12}\)

To those who perform it, re-enactment provides a sensuous experience. The weight of armour, the mud of the trenches, the tiring effect of a Jacobite night march – historical re-enactment is all about an experience of the past. Notably, many of these historical sensations are strenuous; not unlike extreme sports, historical re-enactment provides its proponents with raw, unfiltered, and sometimes painful moments of intensity. There is a strong narrative of self-hardening and stamina in re-enactment culture, and some genres like 'full-contact medieval jousting' verge on costumed martial arts.\(^\text{13}\)

The profound public interest in such sensuous history is indicative of both a widespread longing for physical experience in a largely sedentary modernity – and of a latently anti-intellectual sentiment among some history enthusiasts. Physical experience is open to anyone. The 'authenticity' sought is not one of fact but one of direct experience. Such affective interest in the past can take on an anti-intellectual air; distrust of bookish historians and scholarly theory are widespread among the agents of the memory boom. To quote the Society for Creative Anachronism, whose 32 000 members (2009) are interested in recreations of 'pre-17th-century Europe':

> What makes the SCA different from a Humanities 101 class is the active participation in the learning process. To learn about the clothing of the period, you research it, then sew and wear it yourself. To learn about combat, you put on armor (which you may have built yourself) and learn how to defeat your opponent. To learn brewing, you make (and sample!) your own wines, meads and beers.\(^\text{14}\)

The message is clear: To do it yourself is better than just reading about it. With the right instructions, anyone can understand the past via his or her senses.

Like so many agents in the memory boom, re-enactors are amateurs.\(^\text{15}\) Their performances are examples of what has come to be known as 'public history'.\(^\text{16}\) History is increasingly interpreted and written in the public domain – a development which some have welcomed as a democratisation of knowledge and others rejected as an age of dilettantes. Re-enactors are part of this development. They perform in their spare time, on weekends and at evenings, and return to their 'normal' lives when the battle is over. They rarely get paid for their performances, on the contrary, they invest significant sums in their hobby. Re-enactment requires a degree of affluence for full participation.

While they are mostly laymen and –women, hobbyist re-enactors are highly passionate about their history. They express strong opinions about the past and its meaning for the present. They do not perform for themselves alone, but address an audience, try to educate and spread their views. They formulate an interpretation of the past and join the public discourse. Their performances revive and popularise selected moments of history. There is a strong commemorative dimension to re-enactment. Stephen Gapps describes re-enactment events as ‘open-air stages of national remembrance’ – but of course national history is only one among many possible re-enactment themes.17

Like any other form of historical interpretation, re-enactment may cause controversy and dissent. If re-enactors select contested histories, their performances can become political. This may be fruitful; Randal Allred understood re-enactments of the U.S. Civil War as a form of revision and catharsis.18 In such reading, re-enactment becomes a method of reconciliation. It is perhaps revealing to note that the phrase ‘trauma re-enactment’ has been used by psychologists since the 1940s to denote the re-playing of traumatic experience.19

But re-enactments may also interpret the past in unforgiving and irredentist ways. In the Baltic countries, re-enactors of World War II often reduce the local collaborations with Nazi Germany to patriotic acts of anti-Soviet resistance. Every year in March, veterans and re-enactors of the Latvian Legion Waffen-SS take to the streets of Riga together to spread their view of the past – much to the dismay of anti-fascists and the Russian minority.20

[8.1: Re-enactors of the Latvian Legion Waffen SS in Riga, Latvia]

In some cases, it is not interpretation but the topic itself that is provocative. In October 2010, a Republican candidate for the United States Congress was criticised by the media for being a member of the 5th SS Panzer Division Wiking re-enactment group.21 While he insisted that his masquerade was harmless and non-political fun, the press (and the voters) did not believe him and accused him of supporting Nazi ideology.

[8.2: U.S. Republican Rich Iott re-enacting Nazi history]

Impersonators of Nazi and slave trade history have to face serious questions about their moral motivations.22 Are they really just dispassionate collectors of boots and buttons, or political activists, eager to resume the wars of the past? Also, the more recent the history, the more controversial becomes its portrayal in re-enactment. Veterans and their descendants may find re-enactments of ‘their’ wars tasteless and trivial. Not every history is acceptable for performance in the public domain. Some choices need to be justified.

By the end of the twentieth century, re-enactment – ‘the organized recreational imitation of a historical event by hobbyists’ – has evolved into a ubiquitous leisure activity.²³ Many thousands of re-enactment clubs worldwide research, rehearse, and express the past of their choice. While seldom noted by Anglophone scholars, re-enactment is popular far beyond the English-speaking world.²⁴ A whole industry of weavers, blacksmiths, and sandal-makers produces the material culture so important to the re-creators of the past. Several specialist magazines (Skirmish in Britain, Karfunkel in Germany) cater to the community’s interests.²⁵ The internet has much to do with this surge, as it connects even the most arcane interests into vital subcultures.

The world of amateur re-enactment feeds back into the scholarly domain. Staff at ‘living history’ museums increasingly try to bring history alive by wearing costume and re-playing the past. True, the Colonial Williamsburg museum in the United States opened as early as 1926, but still the number of such institutions expanded greatly since the 1960s.²⁶ As in hobbyist re-enactment, the curators’ idea is that history will be better understood when recreated in the flesh. This idea is also found among academics. Since the 1970s, many historians of science and experimental archaeologists argue that, in order to really understand researchers and craftsmen of the past, one has to ‘re-enact’ their experiments and workshops by employing period equipment and techniques.²⁷ In a way, they take Collingwood’s instructions literally and ‘become’ the people they research.

8.2 The Scottish Genre

In the 1960s and 1970s, most hobbyist re-enactors performed the schoolboy favourites of heroic history: Roman legions, medieval knights, Vikings, pirates, the Wild West, the Napoleonic era, and, in the United States, the American Civil War. But as re-enactment gained renewed popularity in the 1980s and 1990s, battlefields became crowded and enthusiasts began to diversify. A 2010 observer at a large multi-period event in Europe may come across Norman invaders at Hastings in 1066 (from Germany), early American fur traders (from Britain), the Prussian King’s eighteen-century guard of giant soldiers, or ‘Lange Kerls’ (from Germany), Confederate soldiers (from Slovakia), Republican volunteers in the Spanish Civil War (from Britain), Swiss anti-aircraft troops during World War II (from Britain), SS-Gebirgsjäger during the Winter War (from Finland), and U.S. soldiers in Vietnam (from Undoubtedly, it is only a question of time before the first Gulf War re-enactors will enter the arena.

Our observer is also likely to come across the Scots, wearing tartan and flying Scottish flags. While no mainstream department, Scottish history became a proper re-enactment genre in the 1990s. When the leading German re-enactment magazine Karfunkel published a series of special editions on the most important re-enactment periods, it focused on Vikings, Celts, the Staufer (Hohenstaufen) dynasty, Romans, Germanic tribes, the Gothic period, Templers – and on Scotland.29

[8.3: Scots on the cover of Skirmish magazine, 2005]

In 2010, at least 35 re-enactment clubs on the European continent specialised in Scottish history. They were active in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, and the Czech Republic. A list of continental re-enactment clubs is included in the appendix. Like Highland Games and pipe bands, Scottish re-enactment remained largely confined to North-Western Europe; no such recreations took place in South-Eastern Europe and in Scandinavia. Scottish history strikes a special chord in Germany, Flanders, and the Netherlands.

To some, the re-enactment of Scottish history is a discovery of local history. The Dutch Gordons Living History portray the 92nd Regiment of Foote because these Scottish soldiers participated in the doomed Walcheren campaign of 1809, when 30 000 British soldiers landed in Zeeland to attack Napoleon. The Gordon re-enactors are based in North Holland, where the fortress of Kijkduin in Den Helder is a reminder of Napoleon’s presence. Similarly, the Mackays of Germany portray Scots who fought on German soil in the Thirty Years’ War and who recruited among Germans: ‘We try to perform at original locations, in Stralsund and at Lützen, and we are in touch with local archivists who supply us with source materials that we can use in our demonstrations’, explains their Captain.30 For these hobbyists, to re-enact the Scots means to re-enact a piece of their own history.

Much more often, however, re-enactors do not need a connection to the past they portray. There is nothing odd about Viking re-enactments in Brazil or Vietnam War re-enactments in France or Poland.31 Similarly, Scottish history may be re-enacted anywhere in the world, and re-enactors often will not bother to explain their choice but ask back: ‘why not?’ The majority of ‘Scottish’ re-enactors do not claim historical links to Scotland.

Re-enactors will not be coy about their appropriation of Scottish history. In a way, they are Collingwoodians in the true sense. To them, the imitation of the past is an issue of technique and open to anyone who has the skills. An ‘ethnic’ or historical link can make no one a better re-enactor, or Scotsman of the past. A contemporary Glaswegian is no competition for a dedicated Flemish Jacobite, according to Wee Jock MacMelville of Clan MacBran:

In our group there’s probably a few people who know more about Scottish history than some Scots themselves. We were near Fort William, where they stuck that little tower, in Glenfinnan. And in that visitor centre there was that Scottish family and we heard them commenting: Oh and they had a battle there, and a battle there, and then they went all the way down there to London and had a battle there! And we thought: I’m sorry, but you’re talking shite. But then I’m too polite to say: I’m sorry that’s not correct. I mean, correcting a Scotsman about their history while you’re not a Scotsman, I don’t know how they would take it. So okay, I know more about your history than you do yourself, but they might know more about Belgian history than I do myself [laughs].

To the re-enactor, authority comes with knowledge, not with blood or place. The Belgian re-enactor is prepared to defend his Scottish performance against Scottish amateurism, but he is also ready to give away ‘his’ Belgian history to anyone who knows more about it than he does. It is performance that makes the Scot and the Belgian of the past.

Together, the continental re-enactors cover roughly two millennia of Scottish history. They portray ‘Scottish’ Celts and Picts, throwing rocks at the Romans at Hadrian’s wall. They perform as medieval warriors, fighting the English alongside Wallace and Bruce in Scotland’s War of Independence (c. 1296-1328). They are Highland mercenaries in the Thirty Years War (1618-1648), Jacobite rebels on their way to defeat at Culloden (1745-1746), British Highland regiments fighting the French in America (1760s) and at Waterloo (c. 1790-1815). In Germany, one group performs as a Scottish Confederate militia, combining kilts and battle flags and echoing the long-standing mythology of the ‘Scottish’ South. Finally, there are Scottish soldiers of both World Wars, enduring hardship in Flanders and France but ultimately beating the Hun, liberating Europe, parading victoriously.

These many Scottish groups differ greatly in equipment, historical accuracy, and visual effect. However, they all share two essential qualities; they portray Highlanders and they are at war. No Europeans re-enacted Scotland’s urban or civilian past in 2010 – Clydeside shipyard workers, for instance, philosophers of the Scottish enlightenment, or Scottish wool merchants in the early modern Low Countries. Just like their commemorator colleagues, the European re-enactors focused on martial Scottish history (see Chapter 7). A closer examination of five re-enactment groups may substantiate this point.

Terra Crom are a troupe of historical re-enactors from Paris. They specialise in late medieval Scotland, the time between the twelfth and the fifteenth century – the ‘Braveheart period’, as they happily concede. Clearly, much of the history they re-enact has never happened. They set up their tents at

Mackay’s Regiment of Foote (Germany)

Mackay’s Regiment of Foote portray the Scottish Highland mercenaries who fought on German soil during the Thirty Years’ War. Their inspiration is a historical regiment raised by Sir Donald MacKay of Far (1591–1649), in 1626. His 3600 men fought for the anti-Habsburg forces, first for Danish King Christian IV and later, from 1630 to 1635, for Gustavus Adolphus and his successors.\footnote{On Mackay’s regiment, see Alexa Grosjean, ‘Mackay, Donald, first Lord Reay (1591–1649)’, Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (Oxford: Oxford UP, 2004). Their mission is to educate their audiences about the 30 Years War and the Scots:

We have ... a large military camp with the necessary equipment, we do historical weapon demonstrations and mock battles, present the armoury of the 30 Years War. And we not only pass on knowledge about the time of the 30 Years War but also about the role the Scots played in this period, their life, dress habits, and weapons.\footnote{Wir betreiben ... ein umfangreiches Lager mit entsprechender Lagerausrüstung, zeigen historische Waffenübungen und Schaukämpfe, führen Kriegsgerät des Dreißigjährigen Krieges vor und vermitteln Wissen nicht nur über die Zeit des Dreißigjährigen Krieges, sondern auch über die Rolle der Schotten in dieser Zeit, ihr Leben, ihre Bekleidung und Bewaffnung. Clan MacBran (Netherlands/Belgium)

Clan MacBran, a band of Jacobite rebels from Flanders and the Netherlands, are equally concerned with getting the facts right. They depict Highland civilians who were pressed into military service in the turbulent years of 1745/46. The Clan’s 25 members spend much time and money on the acquisition and production of authentic costumes and weaponry. ‘Sometimes we make concessions. But only if it’s really necessary. We try to keep it close to the real thing’, says their leader William MacBran (born 1975), a chemistry teacher in real life. All Clan members have designed their own fictional identities; they are tacksmen, innkeepers, housewives etc, and they carry names like Wee Jock MacMelville or Maíri MacBran. Montgomerie’s Highlanders (Czech Republic)

In the Czech Republic, the Montgomerie’s Highlanders have accepted the Jacobite defeat at Culloden and enlisted in the British colonial Army. The Czech re-enactors portray the 77th Highland Regiment of Foot which was raised in 1757 by the 11th Earl of Eglinton, Archibald Montgomerie (1726–1796), and which took part in most campaigns of the French and Indian War between 1757 and 1763.\textsuperscript{39} The Montgomeries hold their own annual Woodland Battle at Stará Libavá in rural Moravia, and they regularly join the Czech Republic’s only Highland Games (established in 2000) at Sychrov Castle, in northern Bohemia. Sometimes, as if in nostalgia, the Highlanders strip their British red coat uniforms and put on the Jacobite rebel costume. As Jacobites, they have participated several times in the Battle of Prestonpans re-enactment near Edinburgh, Scotland, in the last decade.\textsuperscript{40}

Gordons Living History (Netherlands)

Gordons Living History [sic] are staunchly British. The Dutch re-enactors portray the 92nd Highland Regiment of Foot during the Napoleonic Wars, 1799-1815. The original British infantry regiment was raised in 1794 and rose to fame in 1815, at the battle of Waterloo. The Dutch re-enactors started in 1999, after their founder and commanding officer (born 1963, a civil engineer) abandoned World War II re-enactment to raise a Napoleonic regiment. He chose the 92nd Highlanders because they had fought in the Netherlands, and because ‘the 92nd was not yet re-enacted elsewhere in the world, which is a shame for such a fine regiment.’ In 2010, a Dutch expatriate in Germany established a regimental spin-off in North Rhine-Westphalia.\textsuperscript{41}

[8.8: Gordons Living History, Netherlands]

As outlined above, some martial histories may be controversial to re-enact. Scottish warfare is not among them. Without exception, the Scots are re-enacted as the ‘good guys’, fighting on the right side. To re-enact a Scottish soldier seems a morally safe enterprise. As medieval and Jacobite rebels, the Scots are defenders of local identity, underdogs, opposing a (mythical) English oppression, even colonialism. In the twentieth century, as British and even Canadian soldiers, they are liberators of Western Europe, fighting the Germans in two World Wars – ‘good guys’ again. Even the Czech Montgomeries who portray a British colonial regiment in the French and Indian War consider their Highlanders noble people, not conquerors. Like the Native Americans, they argue, Highlanders are victims of imperial politics, tribal people, forced to fight each other. Such a victim mythology ignores the very active roles the Scots played in the British Empire – just as the Jacobite underdog mythology ignores the significant Scottish contributions to the making of the British Union.\textsuperscript{42}

There are two reasons for the dominance of warfare in Scottish re-enactment. Firstly, hobbyist re-enactment culture in general is preoccupied with martial themes, and secondly, Scotland’s international image is inextricably linked with the Highland soldier.

Heroic warfare is the key topic in all genres of historical re-enactment. The hobby originates in battle commemorations and mock tournaments, and it still revolves around guns, swords, and uniforms. Re-enactment is about ‘the glitter of the buttons and the wave of the flags’, the glamour of warfare. It is true that there has been a shift towards more civilian re-enactments in the past decade, a shift which many re-enactors believe results from the growing number of women who join the hobby (see Chapter 8.3). William MacBran of the Dutch-Flemish Clan MacBran remarks: ‘the more female members you have, the more civilian your re-enactment group becomes’. Nevertheless, recreations of civilian history usually still serve as a mere backdrop to military action – or remain confined to living history museums.

Re-enacted battles are (usually) bloodless. While most re-enactors will be very concerned about the historical accuracy of their boots and bonnets, they will make sure that their guns are loaded with blanks and their bayonets will not cut anyone. Re-enactors play soldiers. This does not necessarily mean that they dream of becoming the real thing. The soft-spoken, bespectacled Wee Jock MacMelville of Dutch Clan MacBran (born 1974, a gardener in real life) explains: ‘When you do a charge for the public, that is fun. You can feel the adrenaline going around. But actually fighting somebody? I don’t know if I would be in for that.’ War re-enactors invoke heroic history, a time when splendidly dressed soldiers, not technocrats and cold computers, decided the outcome of a battle. Like the young pipers in Western Germany who imitated the military pipe bands of the British occupation in the 1970s, re-enactors search for the glamour of warfare, not for its horrors.

Scotland has been associated with military glamour for more than 200 years. As explored in Chapter 3, the making of the Scottish dreamscape in the late eighteenth and nineteenth century was inextricably linked to the rising international prominence of the Highland regiments. The Highland soldier became ‘a proud symbol of Scotland’s ancient nationhood’, as TM Devine points out. The kilted soldier is at the heart of the Scottish dreamscape. This image was exported via the global channels of popular culture and the British military (see Chapter 4).

It is the global dreamscape which inspires re-enactment. Many dedicated hobbyists begin with a Hollywood film or a fantasy novel. A spokesman for the Czech Montgormeries who portray Scottish soldiers in the French and Indian War explains:

None of us have provable Scottish ancestry and different people have different reasons for joining our ranks. Some may have got inspired by the Rob Roy, Braveheart or Highlander movie, some have read the Northwest Passage and the Last of the Mohicans too many times, others joined in as they liked history, culture or music of Gaidhealtachd.
The Czech re-enactors searched for a past that would allow them to combine their favourite films and novels. By selecting the French and Indian War, they found a way of playing both Indians and Highlanders – without violating re-enactment culture’s golden rule of authenticity. They were not allowed to make up their own Scottish-Indian history, for that would be fantasy. They needed a historical moment to portray.

8.3 The Quest for Authentic Scotland

Historical re-enactors seek to recreate the past as it really was. A German re-enactment group portraying the Grenadier Company of the 42nd Royal Highland Regiment in the years from 1808 to 1815 states: ‘We reconstruct the appearance of the unit, its uniform and equipment as detailed and historically correct as possible.’\textsuperscript{48} And the Dutch-Flemish Jacobites of Clan MacBran stress that their goal is to be ‘a hundred percent’ true to the past. Sometimes they have to make concessions, but only to avoid major damage. Their leader, William MacBran, explains:

\begin{quote}
We try to get everything as accurate as possible. But you won’t reach 100 percent. You would have to starve yourself in certain periods [in order to be authentic]. But when you have children you can’t say: we don’t eat today.\textsuperscript{49}
\end{quote}

The acquisition and maintenance of an authentic re-enactment identity is time-consuming and expensive. Rank and file in Gordons Living History (Netherlands) require a Brown Bess flintlock musket, a Scottish dirk, a red British coatee, an overcoat, a kilt of Gordon pattern of 3½ yards (2.5m), an ‘ostrich feather-covered bonnet and hose’, a long-sleeved white shirt of unbleached linen, a pair of black shoes with brass buckles, two white leather cross belts (‘one for the cartridge box and another for the bayonet’), a bread bag, a round wooden canteen, and a black backpack.\textsuperscript{50} A fully dressed Napoleonic re-enactor may carry gear for up to £3000. Re-enactors produce their own costumes and accessories, even turn craftsmanship into a part of the re-enactment experience. Some may shop at commercial re-enactment suppliers such as ‘The Historical Costume Company’ in Nottingham (UK), where a British redcoat with ‘woollen turn back cuffs, hook back skirts, linen lined cast pewter buttons – trimmed according to regiment’ will cost £250. Specialist mail-order boutiques like ‘The Highland Brigade’ in Colleyville, Texas, offer ‘the finest selection of museum quality, reproduction, Victorian Scottish Officer’s militaria from the Napoleonic era to WWI’.\textsuperscript{51}

Historical re-enactment has its own economy and entrepreneurs, and the majority of activists hail from the affluent middle class.

The quest for authenticity does not end with material culture. The German Grenadier Company of the 42\textsuperscript{nd} Highland Regiment states: ‘We are not content with wearing the right uniform but also aim to have our performance and equipment set up for a 200 years jump back in time.\textsuperscript{52} And in Clan MacBran, every member has to research his or her own role. ‘They need to know about clothing, food, how people lived, provisions, how they grew things, what they used’, says Wee Jock MacMelville who has spent weeks poring over books to find out how Jacobite soldiers shaved in the field and whose glasses are held together by a piece of string.\textsuperscript{53}

Some re-enactors may become obsessed with accuracy and even call themselves ‘authenticity fascists’.\textsuperscript{54} They seek to become the past, to resemble the chosen period so much that full mimicry is possible. They insist that there are moments when the present fades and the re-enacted period becomes the main reality. This state is known as the ‘period rush’, the ‘authenticity high’.\textsuperscript{55} If you do it wrong, on the other hand, you will be called a fake or a farb.\textsuperscript{56} The Jacobites of Clan MacBran suggest that every researcher studying Scottish re-enactors should dismiss inauthentic performers as ‘tablecloth Scots’, named after their granny’s tablecloth which they allegedly wear as kilts.

‘Authenticity fascists’ have little sympathy for those who are still at the early stages of the learning process that is re-enactment or who – worse – are not interested in getting the facts right. The German Mackays who portray mercenaries of the Thirty Years War have made a list of all the fake Scots they reject:

What we cannot offer are painted ‘Braveheart-Scots’. We do not try to imitate the Hollywood-clichés of the allegedly wild Highlander or to stage a fantasy demonstration à la ‘Highlander’ with strikingly heroic characters. We cannot satisfy the Gothic/ Live Action Role Play community’s desires for kilt wearers with army boots and sword strapped to their backs.\textsuperscript{57}

The Mackays make it clear that their Scottish performance is one of higher quality, more authentic than mere fantasy role-play and Hollywood kitsch. To them, re-enactment is competitive. Evidently, the public historians in re-enactment are their own worst critics, and the scene works almost on a peer-reviewed basis.

But every re-enactment has to begin somewhere. Most dedicated hobbyists confess to having been initially attracted to Scottish history by a Hollywood film or a fantasy novel. William MacBran of Clan MacBran states that he watched \textit{Braveheart} ‘50 or 60 times, I stopped counting’. Clan McConn of Drumfinnan, Jacobites from Germany, recall that their passion for Scotland began in 1978 with a German television series based on RL Stevenson’s \textit{Kidnapped}.\textsuperscript{58} The Scottish dreamscape is the entrance to Scottish history.

The Scottish dreamscape is a problematic topic for re-enactment. It conflicts with the hobbyist culture's authenticity creed. Hollywood films and fantasy novels may inspire to re-enact the past but they only rarely provide useful historical facts. If it did not happen, it cannot be re-enacted. Admittedly, the issue of myth does not so much arise for those re-enactors who specialise in nineteenth and twentieth century Scottish military history. They can wear kilts and tartan without worrying about 'invented traditions', for they target the invented tradition itself, copying the British uniforms which were inspired by Highland dress. They replay a 'naturalised' invented tradition.\(^59\)

All other 'Scottish' re-enactors, however, have to deconstruct the Scottish myths in their heads. Some will give up fairly quickly when they realise that the Scottish history of their favourite movies, novels, comics etc is not congruent with what they find in scholarly books or on the more authoritative websites – that, e.g., William Wallace never wore a modern kilt or blue face paint. They will experience what Daria Radtchenko calls the 'trauma of knowing', deconstructing their beloved myths until nothing is left to play with.

Some may ignore what they find out and remain faithful to 'the Braveheart period', as Clan Crom from France disarmingly put it. But they risk to be shunned by more serious re-enactors, to fail their colleagues' critical review. Dedicated re-enactors try to move beyond the Highlander stereotypes and to discover the grain of historical truth in the fantastical myth. They will, in the words of anthropologist Paul Basu, try to 'refine' their Highlandism and carefully assemble real facts without ruining the beauty of the original image that attracted them.\(^60\) Historical re-enactment may become a journey into the dreamscape's historical foundations, a test of the Scottish myth's historical core.

The Mackay mercenaries of Germany have found what Hugh Trevor-Roper always denied existed; the invented tradition's historical core, the bits and pieces out of which it was made. The re-enactors came across a German translation of an eyewitness report on the original Mackay mercenaries' exploits on the European continent.\(^61\) They are also aware of the woodcuts which depict their regiment at Szczecin in c. 1631, wearing tartan chequered overcoats and belted plaids. From these sources they are able to distil enough Scottishness to satisfy both their critical re-enactors' pledge, their audiences, and their own love for Scotland. The achievement of this compromise was hard work:

> At first it was difficult to let go of the Romantic images which had fascinated me for so long. And to convince the fellow combatants to dress in these grey, cheap woollens of the mercenaries, that was exceptionally difficult. They had all looked forward to [wearing] the kilt. But in the end, we did not have to give up Scottishness altogether. We still wear tartan overcoats and belted plaids, and our piper has the full regalia.\(^62\)

\(^{60}\) Basu examines 'roots tourists' from North America and Australasia and argues that they do not have to abandon their Highlandist stereotypes altogether, only 'refine' them. Aber letztlich mussten wir das Schottische
Discussions of ‘authentic’ Scots also raise the issue of Scotswomen. Where are the female re-enactors in this world of swinging kilts and martial display? Historical re-enactment is a world of profoundly conservative gender roles; the men fight and the women cook. This is true for all re-enactment genres. This division of labour is usually made in the name of historical accuracy. Most commanding officers stress that women are welcome to join the group – if they are willing to portray ‘authentic’ female lives of the re-enacted period. The German 92nd Gordon Highlanders state:

Yes, we have women with us, and they are very welcome, because we are not only interested in the military aspects of our period [the Napoleonic Wars], but in the whole way of life; how people lived back then, what did they eat and drink, what were the worries, fears, and joys, the sentiments of the different social classes.

Apparently, women are expected to portray all civilian aspects of life. If we can believe the Captain of the German Mackays, the women are quite content with this arrangement:

We do not have fighting women in our regiment. We did not want this, it would be against historical evidence. However, we have several families following our regiment, and two of our drummers are female. I guess if women would approach us and ask whether they could participate at the front, we would find a way to make this possible. But so far, no one has asked.

And indeed, there seems to be no shortage of women who are willing to recreate the civilian backdrop for their warrior husbands and sons at Scottish re-enactment events.

When interviewed, female re-enactors explained that their Scottish performances provided, above all, the satisfaction of recreating the past correctly, according to the facts. The idea of going to war with their men or of wearing a colourful kilt instead of an ordinary skirt seemed ‘absurd’ to most, ‘a-historical’ and ‘wrong’. There appeared to be a certain interest in clear-cut gender roles, a nostalgia for a time when men were men and women were women. One recurring statement was that the sight of ‘men in skirts’ was enjoyable. Female re-enactors stated again and again that ‘if you see a man in a kilt, that’s manly, and strong, and warlike’. Women also explained that they liked to dress up their men as ‘real men’, like dolls. And many men on the other hand explained that their interest in Scotland was first aroused by their wives or girlfriends who bought them a kilt. The erotics of the kilted Scotsman – which already fascinated Queen Victoria and Anaïs Nin (see Chapter 4.5) – seem to be of some importance at re-enactment venues.

There are, of course, exceptions, women who will not be content with cooking for warriors. The medieval Scottish Marauders of France are commanded by a Comtesse (and her two large Irish dogs), the vaguely ‘Celtic-Scottish’ Sassenachs Warpipes & Drums from the Netherlands employ a female re-enactor in a belted barbarian plaid. And some women join the ranks of modern Scottish regiments, arguing that there was nothing ahistorical about it. In Scotland, a German-born female linguist serves as the leading ‘regimental agitant’ in the Earl of Loudoun’s Regiment of Foote. As a soldier, she wears uniform and fires muskets, acts as regimental gunner and powder officer, fights alongside her male colleagues, and draws sword if need be. ‘I thought that this was more interesting than sewing in a tent’, she says. She cannot see anything inauthentic about her performance and stresses that there is ‘a load of documents which prove that women fought at the battle frontline in the English Civil War and the 30 Years War’. The female re-enactor rebels by doing her own research.

If the search for a usable past is unsuccessful, one may always switch to re-enacting what never happened. This means to alienate fellow re-enactors and to enter the realms of fantasy, live action role play, where one can create alternative histories and bring them to life. Everything is possible if the performance is not limited by fact. The warriors of Clan MacMahoon, for instance, are German live action role play hobbyists who have chosen to be a Scottish unit. They have written their own Clan lore after which they hail from a town at the foot of Ben Tee in Scotland but were brutally evicted in the 17th century – not by the evil landlords or the English, but by Orks, mixing in here Tolkien’s Lord of the Rings. At large role play festivals like Drachenfest they fight Orks and other monsters, seeking revenge for their forefathers. A good number of the MacMahoons are splendidly dressed Scottish amazons.

Conclusion Chapter 8

In 2010, at least 30 re-enactment clubs on the European continent specialised in Scottish history. They portrayed Iron Age Celts, medieval Highland warriors, Scottish soldiers on the European continent (Thirty Years’ War, Napoleonic Wars, both World Wars), Scottish Jacobites opposing the British Government (at Culloden), and, occasionally, kilted soldiers in colonial and postcolonial regiments (French and Indian War, U.S. Civil War, Canadian World War II regiments). Without exception, the Scots were re-enacted as morally sound liberators and freedom fighters.

Like commemorators, re-enactors find that not every moment in Scottish history is usable for their performances. The drama of warfare is at the core of Scottish re-enactment. Re-enactors focus on military and heroic history, but hardly ever on urban, civilian, mercantile, or intellectual aspects of the Scottish past. If civilian life is portrayed, it is usually to provide a backdrop for Scottish soldiers – or to allow female re-enactors to participate in the Scottish game. In the name of historical ‘authenticity’, women only rarely join the men in the portrayal of Scottish soldiers.

Scottish re-enactors are not alone with their focus on martial history; all re-enactment genres at the beginning of the twenty first century had a disproportionate interest in soldiers, uniforms, and warfare. Historical re-enactment is a symptom of the late-twentieth century memory boom which is so profoundly interested in heroic history. The Scottish soldier – so theatrical, so familiar, so distinctive – has become a perfect role in re-enactment.

Most re-enactors first became interested in Scottish history via Hollywood films, fantasy novels, and other manifestations of the Scottish dreamscape. This proved a difficult start for many. As re-enactment culture demands that history is recreated according to the facts, ‘as it really happened’, the re-enactment of Scottish history involved painful deconstructions. To many re-enactors, their hobby became a search for the Scottish dreamscape’s historical core.

Historical re-enactors consciously play someone else. While the commemorators, athletes, and musicians examined in earlier chapters present mythologies of kinship or historical links to make their Scottish performances meaningful, re-enactors are much less interested in such explanations. More than all other Scottish playactors, re-enactors confidently claim that it is skill and knowledge rather than blood or residency which make a successful Scotsman of the past. To the re-enactor, a contemporary Glaswegian will make no better Jacobite than a dedicated Dutch re-enactor. As is examined in Chapter 9, this insight is increasingly adopted by Scottish Clan chiefs as well.

HOMECOMINGS: FINDING NEVERLAND

The previous chapters examined the four main forms of Scottish masquerade in Europe. The Scots of Europe are musicians in military-inspired pipe and drum bands, athletes at Highland Games strength competitions, commemorators at festivals of remembrance, and historical re-enactors who reproduce their favourite historical periods and characters.

In all this activity, the playactors cherish a Scotland of the past. They participate in what they claim to be ancient musical, athletic, and sartorial traditions, commemorate historical links between Scotland and Europe, and re-stage moments from the Scottish past (or myths thereof). Their favourite history is heroic history; re-enactors replay battles, commemorators recall them, athletes invoke a warrior mythology, and pipe bands imitate the military glamour of the Highland Regiments.

The Scots of Europe cherish a Scotland which looks remarkably different than everyday life in modern Scotland. Their romantic fantasy of swinging kilts, warlike Celts, droning pipes, and military splendour is hardly congruent with the reality of Scotland, the place on the map.

This said, it is one of the Scottish dreamscape’s greatest assets in the global market of heroic counter-worlds that it is not entirely fictional. The dreamscape is not ‘The Shire’ from Tolkien’s Lord of the Rings, but a real location in the world. The Scots of Europe are aware that there exists a place to which their Highland Games, bagpipe tunes, and Clan tartans belong. Scottish myths and images are firmly rooted in Scotland. Even though Braveheart (1995) was written by an American, directed by an Australian, and largely filmed in Ireland (for tax reasons), the film’s European premier was held in Stirling, Scotland, where the real William Wallace (1270-1305) fought and won. Scotland exists, and this adds to the Scottish dreamscape’s credibility and success.

The world of Scottish playacting does not necessarily connect with Scotland. Many of the most dedicated Scots of Europe (and, for that matter, of North America and Australasia) have never visited Scotland. Some cannot afford the journey, others sense that modern Scotland would be of little relevance to their performances as Highland warriors. Indeed, when playactors do travel to Scotland, they often fail to find the place they love and know.

Chapter 9 investigates how Scotland deals with the Scots of Europe. It first examines the Scottish approach towards international fans of Scotland, and in particular the Scottish Government’s recent efforts to connect with the Scottish ‘diaspora’. It explores the 2009 Homecoming Scotland campaign and the new rhetoric of ‘Affinity Scots’. The chapter then turns to Clanship as a zone of contact and interaction. It emerges that there are zones of ‘real’ Highlandism in Scotland, places where playactors may authenticate their Scottish fantasies in Scotland. Finally, Chapter 9 focuses on The Gathering, the Homecoming campaign’s centrepiece festival which took place in Edinburgh in 2009. It follows a Dutch pipe band on their journey to Scotland, the place on the map.

9.1 Homecoming Scotland: Looking for ‘Affinity Scots’

‘Playing Scotsmen’ is a global phenomenon, and Scotland has started to notice this. During the first decade of the twenty first century, the Scottish Government sought to connect actively with what is increasingly called the Scottish ‘diaspora’, the many millions around the world who consider themselves Scottish or of Scottish descent and who actively celebrate Scotland’s history and culture. This effort was partly inspired by the Irish experience – foreign direct investment from Irish expatriates and their descendants had helped to launch the Celtic Tiger boom years in the 1990s. While today it emerges that this period may have been short-lived, many Scottish politicians at the turn to the twenty first century deplored Scotland’s failure to attract comparable economic support. Scottish state efforts to unlock the diaspora’s economic potential included the creation of business and social networks (‘Global Scots’), the establishment of genealogical web portals (‘Ancestral Scotland’), and the Homecoming Scotland campaign of 2009 (see below). A ‘Diaspora Engagement Plan’ was presented in 2010 in which the Scottish Government confirmed its intent to reach out to ‘Scotland’s international family’, and in 2011, the Government decided to support academic research on Scotland’s diaspora through the University of Edinburgh’s Scottish Centre for Diaspora Studies (est. 2008).

To be sure, the Scots of Europe were not the reason for this Scottish effort. In 2010, most people in Scotland (including officials at the national tourist board VisitScotland) were not yet aware of the widespread European interest in Scottish history and performance. The Scottish diaspora campaigns mainly target North America and try to make use and profit from what has been called ‘America’s growing obsession with its Scottish connections’. The growth of this obsession is substantial; in the past four decades, North American celebrations of Scotland have multiplied and increased greatly in size. Events like Tartan Week in New York (established 2002), the Grandfather Mountain Games in North Carolina (1956), or the Glengarry Games in Ontario, Canada (1942) draw crowds of more than twenty thousand people. Celebrations of Scotland have become a hobby for the masses, and to some extent the same is true for New Zealand and Australia. With the ‘diaspora strategy’, Scotland tries to tap into this growing field of international enthusiasm.

Unlike in Europe, most Scotland enthusiasts in North America and Australasia claim to express their ‘ethnic’ identities by wearing kilts and playing bagpipes (see Chapter 2). Their enthusiasm is part of a larger roots phenomenon, an affluent interest in ancestors and ancestral homelands. Scotland is one of several places that attempts to engage with this interest and to bring home the dispersed tribes as tourists and investors. Ghana has a permanent Homecoming office, and South Africa’s Homecoming Revolution encourages temporary and permanent returns. In Switzerland, the year 2007 was declared a year of Mennonites (‘Täuferjahr’) to further tourism from North America’s large Anabaptist communities, often of Swiss descent. Diaspora campaigns make use of a wealthy (and mostly North American) interest in roots. Evidently, these campaigns are no act of solidarity, no call for refugees to return and find shelter, but an invitation to tourists, investors, and sometimes skilled labour.

Issues of congruency

Scotland faces two problems when addressing her ‘diaspora’. The first one is the issue of congruency. Scotland the place and the Scotland the dream do not look alike. The Scotland of global imagination is a neverland of Celts and Clans, kilts and swords, empty landscapes and pre-modern heroism. It is ‘Walter Scott-land’, the Scottish dreamscape. Such images are difficult to authenticate in situ. Modern Scotland’s inhabitants live largely urban lives, are mainly employed in post-industrial services and the public sector, and rather more concerned about the future of the British Welfare State than the second coming of the Clans. Residents of Scotland often have a troubled relationship with Highland kitsch, will shudder at the ‘tartan monster’, and often consider the global world of Scottish celebration ‘embarrassing’ and regressive. Place and dream have been difficult to unite for many decades. When Hollywood producer Arthur Freed famously scouted for locations in Scotland to shoot his musical Brigadoon (1954, see Chapter 4.4), he eventually returned to America, declaring that ‘[Scotland] just doesn’t look Scotch enough.’ He had to re-build the place in a U.S. studio. Scottish playactors and fans of the Scottish dreamscape risk similar frustration when travelling to Scotland. The German re-enactor Helmut ‘MacHuck’ Huck, a specialist in eighteenth century Jacobite rebellions, thought he had come to the wrong place when he first arrived: ‘I landed in Edinburgh and wondered: why am I the only one here wearing a kilt? Have I come to the wrong country?' He did not recognise Scotland. Many enthusiasts also think that Scotland does not take good care of her heritage. René van Iterson of the Scots Heritage Association in the Netherlands explains: 'It is quite astonishing to notice that, in Scotland, Scottish traditions are being replaced with American line-dancing etc, while we [the Dutch] are more Scottish than the Scots themselves!'

A rift separates Scotland the dream from Scotland the place. In a recent study, Richard Zumkhawala-Cook suggests that this rift is unbridgeable. The ‘real’ Scotland, he argues, is an altogether different country than the place cherished by the ‘Scottish heritage movement’. And as there is no actual homeland that looks like Walter Scott-land, he argues, there can be no ‘diaspora’ of such a place. There is no ‘homeland’ to return to. Scottish playactors have no place to go home.

In 2009, Scotland built a home for all dreamers. Homecoming Scotland was a year-long marketing campaign that aimed at furthering tourism. It was funded by the Scottish Government and invited expatriates, their descendants, and everyone who felt a Scot at heart to visit.

The Homecoming Scotland campaign

The idea for Homecoming Scotland originated from discussions about an official Scottish participation in the worldwide celebration of Robert Burns’ 250th birthday. The Scottish poet (1759-1796) enjoys the status of a national hero both at home and internationally, and Burns Suppers are an established way of celebrating Scotland abroad since practically the poet’s death. At the beginning of the twenty first century, many thousands of Scottish societies and associations around the world hosted Burns nights and suppers. It was rightly estimated that the anniversary year 2009 would see an unprecedented number of events. Homecoming Scotland meant to tap into these celebrations of Scotland. In January 2008, the campaign’s PR people contacted some 2400 ‘diaspora organisations’ about joining Homecoming. A special website was set up to provide a platform for more than 3600 Burns Suppers around the world.

In the course of things, however, the Burns theme was found to be too narrow and therefore broadened with four additional reasons for celebration, namely Whisky, Golf, ‘Great Minds and Innovations’, and ‘Scottish Clans and Ancestry’.\textsuperscript{21} The theme was widened in order to attract as many ‘Homecomers’ as possible. Consequently, \textit{Homecoming} became an umbrella campaign for a great variety of attractions. In Scotland, more than 400 events were associated with \textit{Homecoming} and carried the logo in 2009. Organisers could apply for promotional and financial support from the Homecoming budget. Centrepiece event was \textit{The Gathering} – a two day Clan festival inspired by North America’s Clan Gatherings (see below).

Plans for \textit{Homecoming} were first formulated in 2002 or 2003 by members of the Labour/Liberal Democrats coalition which formed the Scottish Executive, as the Scottish Government was then called. After the 2007 elections, the Scottish National Party took over. In November 2007, the national events agency \textit{EventScotland} was tasked with delivering the campaign. Marketing went through the channels of the national tourist board, \textit{VisitScotland}. The campaign’s core budget was £5.5m, the target for additional revenue set at £44m; a return of 8 to 1.

The \textit{Homecoming} campaign was designed to establish a lasting bond between Scotland and her diaspora as well as to heighten Scotland’s international profile. \textit{EventScotland}, the state-funded events agency tasked with delivering \textit{Homecoming}, formulated the following goals:

1. To deliver additional tourism visits and revenue for Scotland
2. To engage and mobilise the Scottish Diaspora
3. To promote pride in Scots at home and abroad
4. To celebrate Scotland’s outstanding contributions to the world\textsuperscript{22}

Straightforwardly, the economic mission came at the top. Tourism is a vital branch of the Scottish economy, generating 4.1 billion GBP in 2009 and contributing 11 percent of the Scottish service sector economy (compared to 8 to 9 percent for the UK as a whole).\textsuperscript{23} Roots tourism was considered a growing niche by the Scottish Government already in 1999.\textsuperscript{24} Point number two stresses the need to bring together all international enthusiasm for Scotland, to connect the scattered Scots of the ‘diaspora’. Scotland offers her services as a motherland and common base. The other two campaign objectives concern Scotland’s worldwide visibility. \textit{Homecoming Scotland} was as much an image campaign as a promotion of tourism. It aimed at telling the world about the Scots, their travels and exploits. Unsurprisingly, it focused on the sunny side of the story. \textit{Homecoming} was no place for critical discussions of Scottish ‘contributions’ to colonialism and the slave trade, but a celebration of Scottish triumphs, from philosophy to golf and whisky.\textsuperscript{25} Scottish intellectuals were met with harsh reactions from the Scottish National Party’s Government when they criticised the \textit{Homecoming} campaign for ignoring the Scottish colonial past and its legacy in the Caribbean and South-East Asia. Historian Geoff Palmer asked a journalist: ‘This event [\textit{Homecoming Scotland}] is being marketed in Canada, New Zealand, Australia. Why are they not inviting people from Jamaica with Scottish names? Without commenting upon it, the organisers then adjusted the campaign’s main advertisement by digitally inserting a young man with a dark complexion into what was until then a blindingly white crowd of homecomers...

[9.1: Homecoming Scotland advertisements – before and after, 2009]

Homecoming Scotland was a state-venture into the diaspora’s economic potential: ‘In today’s global village, Scotland is not just a country of 5 million people. It is a community of 40 million people. Sell me a plan which brings them together for their mutual benefit’, demanded a speaker at the Scottish Diaspora Forum, a brainstorming conference held at the Scottish Parliament in July 2009.

According to the organisers, Homecoming 2009 was a success. The evaluation report commissioned by VisitScotland states that the campaign’s economic goals were reached and even surpassed, that £53.7m of additional revenue were generated and ‘more than 95 000 visitors to Scotland were influenced to travel in 2009 as a result of the marketing campaigns in support of Homecoming’. Even if the £53.7m figure is contested, it appears that the campaign has helped to bite back the 2009 recession. So happy was the Scottish Government with the outcome that First Minister Alex Salmond announced to repeat Homecoming Scotland in 2014, the year that Scotland will host the Commonwealth Games and the Ryder Golf Cup. 2014 also is the 700th anniversary of the battle of Bannockburn.

Issues of entitlement

The second problem in Scottish diaspora marketing is the issue of entitlement. Every invitation to ‘come home’ raises the issue of entitlement, as was (and still is) the case with the state of Israel. Who is invited, who can call him- or herself a member of the diaspora? In the case of Homecoming Scotland, the answer was simple: anyone. While ‘real’ return migrants seeking a work permit (and possibly social benefits) would be treated unsentimentally and according to their passports by British (not Scottish) authorities, tourists and investors could declare themselves ‘Scottish’ on whatever grounds they liked. No DNA samples or family tree drawings were required to participate in Homecoming Scotland 2009.

The campaign organisers recognised at an early stage that there might be something impractical and even unpleasant about an ‘ethnically’ exclusive Homecoming. ‘For Scots only’ is not a good label in marketing – unless, of course, you can make everyone a Scot. To make it clear that everyone was invited to the Homecoming, the PR people introduced a label for 29 In 2010, the Scottish Government’s Economy, Energy and Tourism Committee decided to hire an independent consultant, Dr Geoff Riddington of Grid Economics, to re-evaluate VisitScotland’s legacy report and the research which was conducted by the independent UK consultancy Ekos. His verdict: Ekos’s economic modelling was ‘out-of-date and incorrect and substantially overestimates the actual impact’. ‘Scots’ without ancestral affiliation – Affinity Scots. Leon Thompson, a corporate affairs manager with EventScotland, explains why rootless homecomers needed a name:

What about the other people out there who are really interested in Scotland, maybe very passionate, but don’t happen to be Scots and don’t have any Scottish ancestry at all? The idea of these Affinity Scots then came into play. These being people who are interested in Scotland and all Scottish things. We didn’t want them, this important group, to feel that they were being excluded from Homecoming because it was just for people who were Scots or had an ancestral tie to the country. It was very much about making sure that everybody was invited to the party.

Homecoming was a party, and everyone (who had the necessary funds) was invited. ‘Come and celebrate with us’, was one of the main campaign slogans. The Homecoming organisers opened up the diaspora in order to get as many visitors as possible during 2009. Thomson: ‘It’s – from a marketing point of view – very powerful to actually be able to say: Look, this is for everybody.’

Again, most of the Homecoming organisers seemed unaware of the large-scale European interest in Scottish performances. Their creation of the ‘Affinity Scots’ label was in no way a reaction to the phenomenon described in this study. The ‘Affinity Scots’ they had in mind were based in North America and Australasia, the ‘key diaspora countries’ in which Homecoming Scotland was almost exclusively promoted. By creating ‘Affinity Scots’, the marketing people acknowledged that many overseas ‘Scots’ have no ancestral ties to Scotland – and perhaps even that it does not matter much whether they do or do not.

9.2 Take me to your Chief: The Clans as real Highlandism

Homecoming Scotland’s centrepiece event was The Gathering, a two-day celebration of Clanship in the middle of Edinburgh. The two-day-festival attempted to increase congruency between Scotland and her global dreamscape. The Clans of Scotland are dear to most Scotland enthusiasts in North America, Australasia, and mainland Europe. In the Scottish dreamscape, Scotland is a land of Clans, and many playactors (whether they have roots in Scotland or not) hope to associate themselves with the remnants of the Clan system.

The Gaelic word ‘clann’ means children. The word has been imported into the English language in the fifteenth century and subsequently into a great number of other languages, most notably Italian, in which it now refers to the families of the Camorra and other mafia groups. In the Scottish Highlands, the Clans were ‘tribal’ communities and the dominant form of social organisation before the seventeenth century. Clans carried the names of (real and mythical) progenitors; Clan Donald was named after Domhnall/Donald, Clan Mackenzie after 35 According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the Gaelic ‘clann’ is not Celtic in origin but a derivation from the Latin planta, for sprout, shoot.

Coinneach/Kenneth and so on. In the seventeenth and eighteenth century, new trading structures, emigration, industrialisation and the political integration of the Highlands into Scotland and Great Britain weakened and finally destroyed the Clan system (see Chapter 3). But with its physical decline came romantic enchantment. Following the Jacobite rebellions and the decisive Hanoverian victory at Culloden in 1746, the Highland Clans became a much discussed topic from Edinburgh to London. For poets and ethnographers of the eighteenth and nineteenth century, the vanishing Clans stood for an old order, a pre-modern society of Celtic warriors which had had to be left behind by the modernising British nation but which still deserved a farewell song. The Highland Clans also came to stand for the Scottish past as a whole, a key ingredient of Highlandism.

To commemorate and celebrate the ancient Clans, 'Clan societies' were set up in the nineteenth century – both in Scotland and abroad. These societies had mostly charitable and cultural aims and consisted of genealogists and associated dilettantes. To this day, Clan societies are hobbyist communities in which members pay an annual fee, receive a Clan certificate, share genealogical activity, go on excursions, and discuss history and heraldic matters. In Scotland, Clan societies were and are the domain of the landed gentry. Not so in the 'diaspora', where Clan societies were set up as open expatriate clubs and joined by Scottish-Americans of all backgrounds – even by those whose roots lead to the Lowlands, where the Clans historically never played a significant role. In the last decades of the twentieth century, the number of North American Clan societies grew rapidly. Today, there are more Clansmen and –women active in North America than in all Scotland.

Gathering the Clans

_The Gathering_ took place in Edinburgh, the Scottish capital city, on 24 and 25 July 2009. The festival was held in the fenced-off Holyrood Park, next to the Royal Palace and the Scottish Parliament. It featured Highland Games competitions and pipe & drum band parades, Highland Dancing, a 'Celtic' folk music stage (where the Red Hot Chilli Pipers performed), a Scottish market and produce fair, whisky tasting opportunities, a re-enactment group which portrayed life in a 'medieval Clan', a book signing tent where the U.S. fantasy author Diane Gabaldon caused excitement, an exhibition on 'genetic genealogy' hosted by the Texas-based commercial company Family Tree DNA, and, most importantly, the Clan Village, a camp of more than 100 white tents in which the Clans of Scotland presented themselves to current and future members. On the evening of July 24, several thousand Clansmen and –women marched in a 'Clan Parade' up the Royal Mile.

The Clan societies had rented tents of different sizes, depending on their budgets.\(^{40}\) In these tents, the Clans could be visited. Volunteers presented Clan history, the family’s international spread, its tartans and crests. Interested members of the public could sign up and become Clan members, fortunate spectators got to see their Clan chief, wearing three feathers in his (or her) cap. The Gathering claimed to be the largest assembly of Scottish Clan chiefs in recorded history. More than 100 more or less officially recognised chiefs came together in Edinburgh to meet their international followers, to discuss the future of Clanship at a ‘Clan Convention’ held at the Scottish Parliament\(^{41}\), and to shake hands with His Royal Highness The Prince Charles, Duke of Rothesay, who acted as Patron to The Gathering and who was hailed ‘chief of chiefs’ by the event’s organiser, the Lord Jamie Sempill.\(^{42}\) The Gathering 2009 was no neo-Jacobite call to arms against Queen and Government, but a celebration of the British aristocracy.

The Gathering was designed to attract and satisfy the roots enthusiasts of North America, Australia, and New Zealand. It aimed to increase congruency, to make sure that for once, Scotland the place would look ‘Scotch enough’ to the eyes of those coming home from the diaspora. ‘That’s maybe not how we are living our lives here, but this is actually what sells Scotland abroad. You have to give the people what they want’, explains Leon Thompson of EventScotland.\(^{43}\) To increase the chance for recognition, The Gathering was modelled after the great Clan Gatherings of North America, not Scotland. It imitated an American festive tradition. The Gathering’s co-director, the Lord Sempill, explains how he conceived the idea:

> When I heard of the Homecoming and when I heard that the Homecoming [organisers] were looking to have an ancestral pillar, I knew enough then to say, well, what they need to fill that gap is a Clan Gathering. ... I was aware of the scale of some of the Clan Gatherings in the United States. And I was also very well aware of the lack of scale of such events in Scotland. So I thought to myself: what we want to do is to take something of the scale of Grandfather Mountain Games in North Carolina and put it in the middle of the Royal Park.\(^{44}\)

Lord Sempill, who was born in London and has a background in marketing alcohol and tobacco brands, points out that Scottish Clan Gatherings and Highland Games (the two usually fuse\(^{45}\)) in North America are bigger and more attractive than Games and Gatherings in Scotland. The diaspora, he argues, has the better product than the homeland:

> Nearly all of their Games [in America] will draw audiences from very large distances. It’s not uncommon to attend Games in America and hear people talking about driving five, six hours. In Scotland, nearly all of the Games – bar, again, less than ten – are totally reliant on the local community. And if your community has 2000 people, that’s the maximum you’ll get at the games. I may be exaggerating a bit but you certainly will be pushed to get double that. So most Scottish Games are very small in scale, because nearly all of them tend to be in the Highlands, in very small communities.\(^{46}\)

\(^{40}\) Some of the smaller Clan societies complained that the cost for renting a tent ranged from £235 to £587.50.

The PR expert modelled The Gathering after the expatriate version of a Clan Gathering. He sensed that the ‘real’ thing, the surviving bits of the Victorian Highland Games culture in Scotland (inconveniently located in the Highlands), would disappoint both homecomers and Homecoming entrepreneurs.

The privately managed The Gathering was no economic success. Even though the event attracted some 47 000 visitors over the weekend and is said to have contributed several million pounds to the Edinburgh economy\(^\text{47}\), Lord Sempill’s company folded with losses of £516,000 and debts of more than £675,000 – much to the dismay of the Scottish taxpayer who was asked to pick up the bills.\(^\text{48}\) A legal enquiry was launched to establish how an event that received considerable sums of public funding was able to fail so spectacularly.\(^\text{49}\) After all, each adult visitor had paid £15 per day to enter the festival grounds, and several thousands of Clansmen and –women had bought passports for up to £110 each to be allowed to march in the Clan Parade on the Royal Mile (notably a public street).\(^\text{50}\)

The 2009 Clan Gathering was not the first event of its kind in Scotland. In 1977, the Scottish Tourist Board (now VisitScotland) held an ‘International Clan Gathering’ from 30 April to 14 May. The event series began with a ceremony at Meadowbank Stadium and ended with a Highland Ball at the Assembly Rooms; Highland Games and pipe band competitions were among the main attractions.\(^\text{51}\) The 1977 Gathering did well in attracting the diaspora – even if Clan chief Struan Robertson from Jamaica had failed to show up, ‘possibly to avoid the risk of meeting the Duke of Montrose, a Rhodesian ultra – and, it turned out, a prohibited immigrant – who might have started a new clan feud confronted with a chieftain more Roots than hoots’.\(^\text{52}\) The Scottish public, however, reportedly found it difficult to embrace the event. A journalist with The Spectator called the Gathering a ‘highly contentious charade’, especially the haggis-tossing competition which ‘patronised the Scots, wasted food, and removed all remaining connection between the gathering and reality.’\(^\text{53}\)

A much larger celebration than the 1977 Gathering was held in 1951, when Edinburgh’s main contribution to the year-long patriotic Festival of Britain consisted of a three-day-event called ‘The Gathering of the Clans’ (16 to 19 August). The event seems to have drawn close to 50 000 attendants, and activities included a ‘grand Ceilidh’ at Usher Hall, a Highland Ball, and a march of massed pipe and drum bands down Princes Street towards Murrayfield Stadium. The 1951 Gathering also featured several Clan tents, and it has been argued that the ‘tented field’ so popular at Clan Gatherings in North America has its origins in Edinburgh, not the U.S.\(^\text{54}\) The 1951 event had a clear international focus and aimed at bringing together ‘clansmen from all parts of the world’.\(^\text{55}\) Referring to the Edinburgh Tattoo and the 1951 Gathering, the Highland newspaper Clarion of Skye reported: ‘There have been great

The Clan Gatherings of 1951, 1977, and 2009 turned Edinburgh into a Highland place. The Scottish dreamscape – complete with bagpipes, kilts, Clans, and Highland Games – came alive in designated, fenced-off areas of the Scottish capital. Expectations were met with a ‘staging’ of Highland fantasies\textsuperscript{57}, a simulation of Scotland the dream in Scotland the place. The organisers of the 2009 Gathering ‘played Highlander’ for an international audience and set up a ‘hyperreal’ Scotland, a Potemkin Scotland.\textsuperscript{58} Such simulations have been undertaken in Scotland at least since Sir Walter Scott hosted the Edinburgh reception of King George IV in 1822 (see Chapter 3).\textsuperscript{59} There is a tradition of self-enchantment in Scotland.

The reality of Clanship

Scotland is in no way unique in catering to touristic expectations. Playing yourself for the tourists is an established economic strategy. In Bali, performing for tourists is a major economic sector.\textsuperscript{60} In Russia, impersonators of Lenin and Stalin earn their living by looking like Russia’s cliché on Moscow’s Red Square, while vendors (usually from Central Asia) sell felt hats with larger than life red communist stars more than 20 years after the fall of the Soviet Union. In Switzerland, the Zurich airport train which takes passengers from the gates to the high tech arrival lounges goes past a digital alpine landscape while the sound of cowbells and yodelling comes through hidden speakers. Such adaptation to the international stereotype has been called ‘self-orientalism’ (after Edward Said’s Orientalism).\textsuperscript{61}

This said, the 2009 Gathering in Edinburgh was more than a mere simulation of the Highland myth. Amongst other things, the event was an assembly of ‘real’ Scottish Clan chiefs. It was officially supported by the Standing Council of Scottish Clan Chiefs, which is no fantastical re-enactment club but an Edinburgh-based association of hereditary title holders (of which the

If authenticity is ‘staged’, tourists are made to believe that they experience ‘authentic’ life in the back region – while actually the locals perform for them. Dean MacCannell, ‘Staged Authenticity. Lord Sempill is a member.\footnote{The Standing Council of Scottish Clan Chiefs was established on 25 March 1952, only months after the 1951 Edinburgh Clan Gathering. See \url{http://www.clanchiefs.org/} (27 Dec 2010).} The Clans exist. Whoever came to Edinburgh in July 2009 to witness the ‘real’ Clans of Scotland could not have been disappointed.

The original Highland Clans have ceased to be vital social systems in the eighteenth century. Their rightful chiefs, however, are still around. The Lord Lyon, King of Arms of Scotland and appointed by her Majesty the Queen, holds the Lyon Court in Edinburgh to decide over claims for chiefdom and all heraldic matters. The title of a Clan chief is bestowed to descendants of the last known Clan chief, and decisions are made on the basis of genealogical documentation. In the past decades, the Lord Lyon has been very busy. The international interest in Scottish Clans and Clan chiefs has made more claimants seek his recognition. The Lord Lyon writes: ‘The revival of interest in Scottish ancestry over the last 50 years has encouraged many clans and families, who had not previously done so, to look for a leader.’\footnote{Interview L.G.I. Maclaine, Clan Maclaine of Lochbuie, Scotland (25 July 2009).} By 2010, the hereditary title of a Clan chief has been granted to about 160 men (and a handful of women), not all of them resident in Scotland.

[9.5: Lord Lyon and officers, Lyon Court, Edinburgh, 2009]

Many chiefs now ponder what their responsibilities might be in the twenty first century. Lorne Gillean Iain Maclaine, chief of Clan Maclaine of Lochbuie and a PR-entrepreneur in Natal, South Africa, says:

I ask myself as a Clan chief: what is my function? ... It’s a willingness, I think, to foster kinship amongst individuals of multiple nationalities who love knowing who their great-great-granddad was and what their history was. I wish somebody had published a book of behaviour for Clan chiefs because it would make life an awful lot easier. But they haven’t. So you freewheel and you do your best possible thing for a group of people who are on holiday, who get to see their Clan, and go home and say to their friends, brothers, cousins and uncles: we had a great time.\footnote{Clan Conversations – Comhraidhean Chlann Domhnaill, workshop hosted by Clan Donald of Sleat, Armadale Castle, Skye, Scotland (October 2009).}

The MacDonalds of Sleat held a symposium on the Isle of Skye in 2009 to discuss the relevance of Clanship today with selected members of the public.\footnote{The Earl of Erroll to Scotland.tv (July 2009), accessed via \url{http://scotland.stv.tv/the-gathering/} (27 Dec 2010).} But no matter what the results of such discussions, few Clan chiefs doubt that their main following is located outwith Scotland. ‘Like many of the Clan societies we find our real strength is America, Australia, New Zealand’, said the Earl of Erroll, chief of the Clan Hay at \textit{The Gathering} in 2009.\footnote{On the Highland Clearances, see Basu, \textit{Highland Homecomings}, 188-200. Eric Richards, \textit{The Highland Clearances. Peoples, Landlords, and Rural Turmoil}}

In Scotland, many people see the chiefs not as authoritative father figures but as an irritating survival from a feudal age, posh landowners with educated accents who still own half the country due to the lack of land reform. They are also still scorned for the Highland Clearances, the eviction of crofters and kinsmen from the Clan lands in the nineteenth century by which their ancestors made room for more lucrative sheep.\footnote{On the Highland Clearances, see Basu, \textit{Highland Homecomings}, 188-200. In the ‘diaspora’, however, the Clan chiefs are venerated as tribal leaders. Self-professed Scots on both sides of the Atlantic embrace Clanship as a zone of living Highlandism. In the Clans, their vision of heroic Scottish history becomes alive. Among the Scots of Europe, many playactors try to connect with the Scottish Clan societies. They make their choice by creating intricate mythologies of kinship. Mr Albrecht Kurbjuhn, a hotel manager from Mecklenburg in North-Eastern Germany, contacted Clan MacLeod in Scotland because he felt there were heraldic and tribal links between the Western Isles and Eastern Germany:

We went to Scotland and travelled the country ... [And then we] found out that there exists one specific Clan whose symbols are very similar to those of Mecklenburg, with the bull's head and the colours as found in the tartan of the MacLeods of Harris. That is how we decided to get in touch with Clan MacLeod in order to be able to move deeper into Scottish society [Gesellschaft]. ... That’s what made us pack a Mecklenburg flag and travel to the seat of the MacLeods at Dunvegan castle, to tell them about us and to present them with a perhaps daring theory, namely that the same Nordic tribes which had settled in North-Western Scotland had also travelled onwards into the South-East and settled in Mecklenburg and brought their symbols to both areas. And as the MacLeods saw the Mecklenburg flag at Dunvegan, they somehow felt instantly related [verbunden] to us, and that feeling was mutual. Even if at that point no one of our little group had any, let us say, known familial relationship to Clan MacLeod.68

In the past years, the ‘Clan MacLeod Gesellschaft Deutschland’ has become a strong German Clan society whose members joined Homecoming Scotland in July 2009, attended the official Clan dinner in Edinburgh, and marched in the Clan Parade.

The MacLeods of Germany are one of at least 20 Scottish Clan societies on the European continent. There are organisations in France representing Clan Maclean, Clan Mackenzie, and Clan MacLeod.69 There are ‘officially recognised’ branches of Clan Donald, Clan Mackenzie, Clan Gregor, Clan Maclaren, Clan Mackay, and Clan MacLeod in Germany.70 In Sweden, one 68 ‘Wir sind nach Schottland gefahren und haben dieses Land bereist. ... [Und dann haben wir] herausgefunden, dass es einen spezifischen Clan gibt, dessen Symbolik der Mecklenburgs sehr ähnlich ist, mit dem Ochsenkopf und den Farben, die im Tartan der MacLeods of Harris wiederzufinden sind. So war die Idee geboren, um tiefer in die schottische Gesellschaft einsteigen zu können, den Kontakt mit diesem Clan MacLeod aufzunehmen. ... [Das] hat uns dazu bewogen, eine Mecklenburger Flagge einzupacken und an den Sitz der MacLeods zu reisen nach Schloss Dunvegan, um ihnen von uns zu erzählen und eine vielleicht verwegene Vermutung ihnen gegenüber auszusprechen, nämlich dass die gleichen nordischen Stämme einerseits Nordwest-Schottland besiedelt haben und anderseits Richtung Südosten nach Mecklenburg gefahren sind und ihre Symbolik in beide Bereiche mitgenommen haben. Und als die MacLeods unsere Mecklenburger Flagge auf Dunvegan sahen, fühlten sie sich sofort irgendwie mit uns verbunden, und das beruhte auf Gegenseitigkeit. Obwohl in dem Moment keiner von dieser kleinen Gruppe bewusst eine, ich sag mal, familiäre Beziehung zu Clan MacLeod hatte.’ Interview Clan MacLeod Gesellschaft Deutschland (24 July 2009).

may find Clan Murray and Clan Stuart, while in Finland, there is an official Clan Ramsay. These continental ‘Scottish’ Clan societies do attract hobby genealogists who do have an actual family relation to Scotland – however, the majority of their members appear to be self-declared Scots, friends of Scotland, ‘Affinity Scots’. Unsurprisingly, the lack of roots does not diminish their enthusiasm: ‘These people are sometimes more Clan-minded than the real family’, explains Tom Hye, the Flemish president of Clan Hay Europe. Among the MacLeods of Germany, only 4 out of their 100 members claim ancestral links to Scotland.

The European interest in the Scottish Clans feeds back into Scotland. Scottish Clan chiefs are confronted with requests for recognition, even with visiting delegations who demand to see their chief. At the Gathering of Clan Mackenzie in Strathpeffer, Scotland, for instance, Europeans were present in substantial numbers in 2010. Delegations hailed from the U.S. and Canada, from Australia and New Zealand, from England – but also from France, Norway, Germany, and Austria. Only a handful of the c. 120 attendants were Scots who lived in Scotland. Many were no Scots at all, at least not by birth, descent, or residence. The French delegation, for example, was led by a kilted Parisian antiques dealer who entertained the vague idea that his ancestors were genealogically linked to Scottish nobility. Among the Australians there were several female tourists from Tasmania who were not of Scottish ancestry but avid readers of the American fantasy writer Diane Gabaldon’s ‘Scottish’ novels. The Austrian Clan society was fronted by Mr Rudolf Hundsbichler, a solidly Tyrolean restaurant owner and expert in Malt Whisky who organises his own Highland Games in Leutasch. Even the long-time president of the Clan Mackenzie Society in the Americas, Mr Donald McKenzie from Pinehurst, North Carolina, conceded that among his people might be some who were Mackenzie by heart rather than root: ‘For 25$ a year, we’ll make anyone a Mackenzie’, he said, referring to the U.S. Clan society’s annual membership fee.

[9.7: Clan March, Strathpeffer Highland Games, August 2010]

At the Clan Gathering, hearts were just as good as roots. To be a Mackenzie was no issue of blood, but of commitment. Ancestral and self-declared Mackenzies became indistinguishable in their joint performance of Scottish Clanship. Both had chosen to celebrate Scotland instead of other possible ancestral lines or mythical nations. Both cherished a deeply Romantic image of Scotland; the Highland myth of pre-modern tribalism and warrior ethos. And both were keen to express this interest by donning a costume, singing songs, by performing heritage. Passion and Performance unified their Scottish playacting. John Ruaridh Grant Mackenzie, the Earl of Cromartie and chief or ‘Caberfeidh’ of Clan Mackenzie (a geologist in real life), was fully aware of this. The Europeans found his support:

I think it’s great that there are societies in Europe. I really do. And the more the merrier. ... The Europeans have been very strong. And what’s so interesting is they’re not just retired people. They’re actually active working people, and often they’re quite young, in their 40s and 50s – and sometimes a lot younger, which is great.

73 Interview Tom Hye, Clan Hay, Belgium (25 July 2009).
The chief had no trouble whatsoever about the fact that dozens among his Clansmen and women were not blood-related relatives:

Do remember that, in the past, people could take the name of the Clan if they lived in the area. It is a totally flexible thing. A Clan is very much a social organisation. ... It was normal for people living in our neighbourhood to take on our name. It is not something set by blood. The nineteenth century was a very false period for the Scottish Highlands. 74

Many Scottish Clan chiefs put some distance between them and the idea that it is bloodlines which hold a Clan together. Clan, they argue, is a matter of passion and commitment, and this has not been different in the Middle Ages. Lorne Gillean Iain Maclaine, chief of Clan Maclaine of Lochbuie and a PR-entrepreneur in Natal, South Africa, says:

Depending on where you lived, you associated yourself with the Clan that’s up the glen. And you either liked the chief or liked the family – or you denied the family. 75

The Clan chiefs deconstruct themselves. They stress that the original Clans were less kin-centred than the race-obsessed Victorian poets and ethnographers thought they were. They point out that it was nineteenth century thinking which reduced Clanship to biology. And indeed, recent scholarship has shown that kinship was but one dimension, and non-biological alliances were common. 76 To have a Clan bound by common interests rather than blood is no breach with tradition. The Clans may be a home for roleplayers and genealogists. All Clansmen and —women must show affinity in order to become active members.

Aspects of the Scottish dreamscape do exist in Scotland. They have entered Scottish national culture and everyday life. Scotland today has zones of living Highlandism, ranging from the Edinburgh Military Tattoo (established 1947) to the Scottish Tartan Authority (1996), and from the kilt-wearing men at Scottish weddings to the Highland Games at Braemar (1832). Leon Thompson of EventScotland insists that Highlandism does exist in Scotland, that tourists may actually find their neverland: ‘[the tourists] can come to Scotland and they can experience that [kilts, tartan, bagpipes], because it does exist to some extent ....’ 77 The anthropologist Paul Basu suggests that Highlandism does not need to be abandoned by tourists, only ‘refined’, so that it can become a more ‘authentic’ Highlandism which is more congruent with reality. 78 If these traditions were ‘invented’ at some point, they have since been ‘naturalised’. 79

These zones hold authority over international imitations. A bagpipe competition in Flanders will gain in respectability if it is judged by a Scottish referee from the Royal Scottish Pipe Band Society. People register their home-made tartans not anywhere in the world, but with the Scottish Tartan's Authority in Crieff or one of its Scottish competitors. The organisers of the Grandfather Mountain Games applied for a crest of arms with the Lord Lyon, heraldic officer to her majesty in Scotland. And Clan MacBubba from North Carolina and Clan MacDuibhne from Bavaria, two kilted fantasy Clans which never existed historically, decided to travel to Edinburgh for the year of Homecoming, in 2009. The fact that Scotland exists gives the Scottish dreamscape much of its weight. It means to opt into a heritage and tradition that is rooted in real time and place.

In their happiest moments then, imitators of Scotland are mistaken for ‘real’ Scots by the Scots themselves, for representatives of Scotland’s living Highlandism. After his initial disappointment, re-enactor Helmut Huck of Germany was a happy man when a ‘real’ Scotsman at the tourist information desk mistook him for a true Highlander:

> Then I asked the steward at the Tourist Information. He had given me strange looks for some time. And I thought, what’s the matter, is it because I wear the kilt? And so I just went and asked him. And he said, well, they wear the kilt as well, but only for special occasions. He asked where I was from, and I told him: Kempen, Germany. And he said: Before you started to speak I thought that you were a tourist from the north, because there they really do walk around [dressed] like that."^(81)

9.3 The Gathering of the Clans

When the Red Rose of Lochbuie Pipes & Drums marched into the Clan Village, they caused excitement. The musicians’ bright red and green tartans made many clansmen and –women look down at their own kilts or sashes and consider a change of Clan. The band members also wore khaki military jackets instead of standard black kilt jackets, which gave them an even more explicit martial air. The 13 players, 2 of them female, marched with great precision and drill to the small tent of Clan Maclaine of Lochbuie. There, chief Lorne Gillean Iain Maclaine and his son, Angus, the Tanist or ‘the younger Maclaine’, welcomed their band.

The Red Rose of Lochbuie Pipes & Drums were founded in September 1990 in the Dutch town of Rijswijk. None of the members have any Scottish roots whatsoever. The group’s founder was a Dutchman named Marc Huiberts who had played with the Hoogse Highlanders, the Highlanders of The Hague, in the 1980s and then wanted his own band. The Hoogse Highlanders were one of the first ‘Scottish’ pipe bands in Holland, that they started as a youth orchestra in the 1950s, very much under the impression of World War II and the Scottish soldiers which had liberated many Dutch towns from the Nazis.\textsuperscript{82}

A Dutch band was never discussed – simply because there was no Dutch culture to play with. Consider the statement of Onno Huiberts, the Red Rose’s current pipe major:

Question: Were you ever interested in Dutch folklore, in having a Dutch band?

Reply: You know, this country [the Netherlands] was formed by water and mud which came together over the centuries and swept people from everywhere together. There is no such thing as a Dutch national culture.\textsuperscript{83}

Because there is no such thing as Dutch national culture, he had to adopt Scottish culture. When Marc and Onno Huiberts, two men in their late 20s, founded The Red Rose of Lochbuie, they needed kilts. They came across some second hand, Dutch-made items which, according to Onno Huiberts, were more like tartan skirts. The tartan pattern was that of the Maclaines of Lochbuie. The musicians found that out by consulting books, this being years before the internet. When they replaced the skirts with proper kilts ordered from Scotland some two years into their career, they had become ‘attached’ to the tartan. They decided to ask the Clan chief for permission to continue using it. Here is what Onno Huiberts, a funeral director in real life, recalls about his search for the Clan chief:

We felt that we should get permission by the Clan chief, so I began to track the man down. I didn’t know too much about Clans and the chief then, but I thought of him as an authority, someone far away, someone high up. I still think of him as an authority. In 1992 I received information that the chief was based in South Africa. I then found him with an advertisement placed in a newspaper. We wrote a letter stating that we are a pipe band from the Netherlands. We asked quite simply whether he would mind us wearing his tartan. We waited for several weeks, then the reply came. The chief wrote that although technically only members of the Clan were entitled to wear the colours, he realised that history is changing and that we can be part of that history by wearing this tartan. So we wore his tartan ever since.\textsuperscript{84}

Notably, the Scottish Clan chief is a figure of authority for these Dutch kilt wearers and bagpipers. The musicians care about the chief’s opinion and blessing. Since 1997, the Red Rose can call themselves ‘the officially recognised Pipe Band of Clan Maclaine of Lochbuie’. Because Scotland the place has zones of living Highlandism it retains some authority over the Scottish dreamscape. In this case, however, the man of authority does not reside in a Scottish castle overlooking the sound of Mull, but in Natal, South Africa – interestingly a place which has its very own historical connections to the Netherlands, the home of the bagpipers. The authoritative ‘real’ Scotland may be as global an affair as the performative enthusiasm that seeks its blessing.

The Clan chief demonstrates a progressive understanding of Clan and kinship with his insight that ‘history is changing’ and that Clan tradition may be shared. Here is what the chief himself remembers of the early transcontinental communication with his Dutch pipers:

\textsuperscript{84} Interview Red Rose of Lochbuie Pipes & Drums (4 March 2010).
Then back some 30 odd years I got a letter, saying: May we use your tartan? To which I asked: Who are you, what are you about. And they came back, and... maybe I was a soft touch but I said fine, that’s a great idea. And they then have built themselves up into a proficient band.\(^{85}\)

In the Clan chief’s memory, the moment of first contact lies further back than is actually the case; the band was founded in 1990. The chief stresses that it was the right decision to give a Dutch band his Clan colours as the Red Rose have now become a proficient band. Their appearance at The Gathering certainly confirms that the Red Rose are by no means amateurs. The chief seems to see passion and commitment (rather than bloodlines and genealogies) as the criteria for being good Clansmen and –women.

For the Dutch musicians, their identification with the Scottish dreamscape made a Homecoming possible. The Red Rose of Lochbuie’s trip to Edinburgh was a great success. They had gone abroad for the first time in their career. 18 years after the first letters were exchanged, the Dutch pipers met their South African chief. Passionate performers of Scotland both, the pipe major and his chief shook hands in Edinburgh’s Holyrood Park. The meeting was emotional. Mr Huiberts reports:

> The Clan Parade is probably the strongest memory. We played walking up the Royal Mile, leading our Clan chief up to Edinburgh Castle. I guess we all had a feeling of pride. Maybe that’s silly.

But it was not silly at all. The pride of his pipe band humbled the chief, as he walked tall and happy up the Royal Mile. He explains:

> They are not playing for an audience, they’re playing for a Clan. And I think that’s what they’re doing. I am humbled. That’s the only word that suits for the guys. I am deeply, deeply humbled by what they do.\(^{86}\)

The patriotic Homecoming motto – ‘to create pride in the Scots’ – seems to have been significantly improved: ‘let Scotland make you proud’ – whoever you may be.

Scotland exists. Unlike other pseudo-historical counter-worlds, the Scottish dreamscape claims to be a real nation’s culture and identity. To play Scotsmen is not just an exercise in carnival. This heightens Scotland’s attraction.

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, Scotland the place takes an active interest in the many thousands of men and women who engage in Scottish activity throughout the world. The Scottish Government attempts to profit from the Scottish ‘diaspora’. The Homecoming Scotland campaign of 2009 was one of several efforts which invite the ‘diaspora’ to return home, temporarily, as tourists and investors. However, Scottish diaspora marketers face issues of entitlement and congruency when addressing the worldwide wannabe Scots. To solve the first problem, Scottish marketing experts introduced a new concept for enthusiasts without documented roots in Scotland; ‘Affinity Scots’. The creation of this concept indicates that the official Scotland has begun to realise that much of the international Scottish activity is not a result of Scottish emigration but one of enthusiasm for kilts, Clans, and bagpipes. This is the second problem; modern Scotland does not resemble the Highland mythology which the diaspora (roots or not) cherishes. To increase congruency, Scotland simulates the Scottish dreamscape. There is a tradition of catering to Highland expectations in Scotland, of building Potemkin Scotlands, which may be traced back to the early nineteenth century. Often, such simulations take the form of Clan gatherings. The Gathering (2009), the Homecoming Scotland campaign’s centrepiece event in Edinburgh, had several precursors.

This said, Clanship is not a mere invention. The Clans – although extinct as a form of political and social organisation – have been revived in Scotland throughout the past 200 years. The world of Clanship exists. The invented tradition has been naturalised. Clan chiefs do hold titles and represent their Clans. With their Scottish performances, they become figures of authority and cardinal interest to the international scene of Scottish playactors. Many Clan chiefs are approached by the Scots of Europe, and some of these encounters change the ways they see Clanship and Scottishness.

WHO’S LIKE US? SCOTLAND AS A SITE OF MEMORY

The previous chapters examined the many ways in which adult Europeans celebrate and impersonate the Scots. It emerged that many of them hope that via Scotland, they can reconnect with their own lost history. Chapter 10 examines the reasons for the Scottish dreamscape’s resonance in Northern and Western Europe. Why do the continental history enthusiasts direct their playful energy towards the Scottish dreamscape, and not to any other pseudo-historical fantasy? Why Scotland?

One reason, to be sure, is the Scottish dreamscape’s remarkable global spread which was examined in Chapter 4. Few European images are as globally rehearsed and familiar as that of the kilted Scotsman. Continental memory enthusiasts found a readily available European mythology in the Scottish dreamscape. And yet, there is more to Scotland’s success in the European memory boom. This chapter argues that the Scotland of popular imagination is ‘charged’ with four recurring themes. These themes have a particular resonance in Northern and Western Europe at the beginning of the twenty first century. They are themes of tradition, resistance, victimhood, and masculinity.

10.1 Northern Soul: Ersatz Ancestors

As examined in Chapter 2, European proponents of the memory boom face several problems when attempting to root their identities in local history. It may emerge that their past and its traditions are either lost, unknown, not taught at school, or that they are boring, lacking the songs, legends, and costumes which would make their celebration exciting. Many Scots of Europe have tried to embrace their more obvious roots but were disappointed:

The problem with Dutch old music is that it is a little boring. It is dull, it does not have the spirit and the melody of the Scottish folk songs. (Mirjam, Sassenachs Warpipes & Drums, Netherlands)

Either we are blind or it is gone. There are old buildings, but...The Dutch have a snack bar in every old castle (Jan & Marïye, Leersum, Netherlands)

You know, this country [the Netherlands] was formed by water and mud which came together over the centuries and swept people from everywhere together. There is no such thing as a Dutch national culture. (Onno, Red Rose of Lochbuie Pipes and Drums, Netherlands)

People want a bit of action – nothing that the Germans could offer them. We don’t have anything comparable. (Klaus, Rhine Area Pipe Band, Germany)\(^1\)

[10.1: Jan & Marïye, Netherlands]

The Scots, on the other hand, offer an exciting past. There seems to be some agreement among the Scots of Europe as to how an old European people with a distinctive ‘national culture’ should look like, how their tunes should sound, and how their historical sites should be preserved and presented. Apparently, the Scots do it right.

Thankfully, this is no reason for envy, but for adoption. The Scots are appropriated as ersatz ancestors. The Scots of Europe create elaborate mythologies of kinship by which they turn the Scots into relatives. They are convinced that some of their ancestors’ Celtic, Nordic, and even mountain traditions have survived in Scotland, beyond Hadrian’s Wall. They believe they recognise something of their own lost heritage in the musical, athletic, and sartorial traditions of Scotland – a world that used to be theirs, too. They regard the Scots as guardians of a European past, a past that became lost, cleaned up, or complicated elsewhere. By imitating the Scots they hope to be able to tap into their own lost history:

We have this feeling, this connection with the music. We feel that the same blood runs in our veins. We know that the Dutch music which did survive somehow was almost the same kind of music as Irish and Scottish music, the same rhythms, the same kind of melodies, and the same feeling to it. But it died out somehow, you have to dig it up again. (Maceál, founding member kilted folk band Rapalje (Rascals), established 1995, Netherlands)

To me it is a Celtic feeling I carried all my life. The first foot I placed in Scotland gave me the answer for what I was feeling all the time. (François, Spirit of Scotland, mobile exhibition and information centre, est. 2005, Flanders, Belgium)

Many people don’t know this, but our traditional carnival marches brim with Celtic melodies. (Gerard, founding member Pipes & Drums of Basel, est. 1978, Switzerland)

Scotland preserved what was lost elsewhere. The Europeans hear the bagpipes of their own ancestral shepherds and mercenaries in the drone of the Great Highland Bagpipe, and they detect their forebears’ raw feats of strength in the caber toss and stone throw at Scottish Highland Games. The Scots of Europe use Scotland to revive a half-remembered and half-imagined past. Albrecht Kurbjuhn, president of the Clan MacLeod Society Germany, explains during the 2009 Gathering in Edinburgh that through his Scottish activity he hopes to recover a tribal past:

The Germanic peoples had tribes (Stämme) as well ... And it [the Clan system] is still very much alive here in Scotland. Whereas in Germany, and perhaps there are specific reasons for that, the Clan system has been lost. So perhaps one searches for a substitute (Ersatz) now, pleased that the Scottish Clans welcome us as German friends.

The German MacLeods have set up a Scottish clan because the Germans apparently lost their own tribes – perhaps for ‘specific reasons’, as the informant notes. Another problem faced by some Europeans when searching for roots is that their national or regional memory is claimed by the wrong people. They may live in an area of Europe where the celebration of local heritage is a political statement. Their history and legends may have been tarnished in the past by political misuse. Germanic mythology and symbolism are still widely associated with Nazi terror in Germany and therefore unacceptable for play in most contexts. Germanic runes are linked to the Waffen-SS, and their display will cause comment and sometimes legal action. This complicates the search for memory. Donnie Munro, former lead-singer of the Scottish folk rock band Runrig which was hugely successful in Western Germany in the 1980s, thinks that the German response to his Gaelic songs could have something to do with the unavailability of German history and folklore:

People in Germany appreciated to hear something modern that built upon something authentic and old. I had this confirmed by many members of the audience, who told me that they could identify with our music, and our authentic pride in our own culture. There was a time, and I hope this time is now over, when young Germans could not take pride in their own identity. This because of recent political history, of the way the Nazis had claimed the German past. It was difficult for young Germans to celebrate who they were themselves. They sensed that we played original music, they had deep passion for our sense of culture. The Scottish ‘pride’ in their culture (however ‘authentic’) is attractive to those who would be eager to celebrate their past but cannot retrieve it. In Munro’s reading, the blocked audience recognises the sentiment, the pride, and it also recognises Scottish culture as a related genre, one that reminds of the native culture but is not laden with the same historical guilt.

To have a ‘Germanic tribe’ would be inappropriate, says Albrecht Kurbjuhn of Clan MacLeod Germany, but to have a Scottish Clan is harmless, innocent:

Question: A Germanic ‘Clan’ would not have interested you?

Reply: No, the idea did not even occur to me. Because there are some unpleasant associations in our history. That was before my time, but in Nazi-Germany they started all that with Wotan and Walhalla, to rediscover the archaic roots. Here in Scotland that’s no problem. But with us there is a disruption (Bruch) in our history which makes it very difficult for us to look for a re-connection.

The Scots offer meaningful ersatz, an alternative heritage, unblemished, innocent, not cut-off by political ‘disruptions’. The Scots serve as a power cell, a site of memory from which continental ‘pride’ may be reconstructed without guilt.

The interest in Scottish ersatz ancestors is particularly urgent in North-Western Europe. As has emerged in the previous chapters, the Scots of Europe are at home north of the Alps and west of the German-Polish border. No Scots are found in Southern and South-Eastern Europe, namely in Spain, Portugal, most of Italy, the Balkans, Greece, and Turkey. It appears that the German-speaking countries may encounter the most difficulties when setting out to rediscover heroic local history. But what about the Netherlands, Belgium, France, and Switzerland?

10.2 Rebel Code: Difference and resistance

According to the well-rehearsed narratives of the Scottish dreamscape, the Scots have retained what most Europeans have lost in the civilising process, during Reformation, urbanisation, and the establishment of consumer capitalism. The Scots are wild folk. Many continental playactors embrace the Scots as guardians of a savage freedom.

In terms of the dreamscape, the Scots are tribal people. They never walk alone, are linked to each other by Clan name and lore. They guard ancestral knowledge, their forebears’ names and deeds. And they are loyal to their kin, still following their leaders in the old way, even if they serve in the British Army. Furthermore, the Scots understand the land. They are at home under the open sky, have a name for every crag and loch, know the animals which cross their path. They live with the seasons, listen to the rain. They have magic and gods, their world was not disenchanted by science and secularism. And the Scots are untamed. Norbert Elias never made them wear trousers. They retained that ‘peculiar hardihood which is supposed to dispense with the most essential part of modern clothing’. They resisted the modernist cleanse, held on to their old Gaelic tongue. They will not listen to health and safety advisers but drink too much and laugh too loud and lift their kilts whenever they feel like it. The Scots have fun. They are not politically correct. To many continental playactors, the Scots are handsome rednecks, indigenous primitives who may remind the world what life was like before Weight Watchers and Anti-Social Behaviour Orders. The Scot may serve as an example to all those who had their edges polished by the forces of modernity. In South Africa, the Fort Nottingham Highland Games in the KwaZulu-Natal Midlands encouraged participants in 2010 to ‘discover your inner Scotsman.’

Thankfully, the Scots themselves invite everyone to join them. At every continental festival the author attended, he asked the Scots of Europe to characterise the Scots in a few words. ‘Hospitable’ was among the top three adjectives, next to ‘strong’ and ‘traditional’:

Warm-hearted and friendly. You will come as a stranger – you will go as a friend! (Markus, Clan Mackenzie Society, Germany)

The people there are open, not closed like here. (Erik, Coevorden, Netherlands)

To have a Scottish friend is unique. We in Switzerland have forgotten what hospitality means. We send our guests to the next hotel. But in Scotland they will really empty their house for you. It’s impressive. (Gerard, ex-Pipes & Drums of Basel, Switzerland)

A friendly people, very hospitable. This is something we want to present [in our re-enactment camp], we are an open camp, everyone is welcome. I guess that this acted display of the gruff Highlander may be some kind of protective shield to protect the soft core of the Scot. (McCandy, Clans of Caledonia, Germany)

8 Questionnaire Clan Mackenzie Society Germany. Fieldwork Keltfest, Netherlands (May 2009). ‘Wenn man wirklich mal eine schottische Freundschaft pflegt, das ist einmalig. Wir in der Schweiz haben vergessen, was Gastfreundschaft ist, schicken die Leute ins Hotel. In Schottland räumen sie einem wirklich das Haus aus. Beeindruckend.’ Interview Gerard Götti, ex-PDBS (18 July 2009). ‘Ein herzliches Volk, sehr gastfreundlich. Was wir auch unbedingt darstellen wollen, wir sind ein gastfreundliches Lager, da ist jeder willkommen. Ich denk mal,
The Scots are amiable, friendly, soft and warm underneath the warrior skin. They agree to be a home and example to anyone who has lost his own traditions. ‘Homecoming Scotland’ needed no Government invention, it was already an established mythology.

Thanks to their resistance to the forces of modernisation, the Scots allegedly retained their distinctiveness, their original identity. A Scots-authored guidebook to Scotland and its people notes that the Scots are ‘different. Not better than anyone else, certainly not worse, but definitely not to be confused with any other nation.’ This view is shared by the Scots of Europe. The continental playactors often argue that it is the high degree of Scottish difference and nonconformity which inspires them to imitate the Scots. Paradoxically, some Europeans even claim to dress up as Scots to underscore their own uniqueness and difference. At the 2009 Keltfest in Dordrecht, Netherlands, the author asked some 50 playactors to explain why it was Scotland and not someplace else that inspired them. More than half replied that the Scots were close to their heart because they were non-mainstream, a bit crazy, different – just like themselves:

I use the kilt to express myself. It shows that I don’t care what other people say about me. It stands for my freedom. (John, Osterhout)

Being a little different is okay. (Margreth, near Rotterdam)

I put the Scottish dress on when I am in a crazy mood. (Jules, near Amsterdam)

My friends think I am mad to walk around in a kilt. I like it because it is tough looking, and not every guy can get away with wearing a kilt. (Rob, near Dordrecht)

It suits me. I am a Dutch lunatic. (Cor, Rotterdam)

[10.2: Cor de Jong & family, Netherlands]

Apparently, being a Scot is not something one acquires by birth or legal documents, but a state of mind. The Scottish masquerade underscores an inner difference, and it conveys a license to follow its call, to forget the restraints of modern society and to let the inner Highlander loose:

It is the only environment where it is completely accepted to wear a ‘skirt’ as a man and nobody complains about the 110dB+ of your beloved musical instrument. (John, The 48th Highlanders of Holland Pipes & Drums, Netherlands)

Unmistakably, Scottish masquerade offers a way of relaxation, a safety valve, a place to escape from social pressure and critical observation and to let off steam and noise. As examined in Chapter 2, this is one of the prime functions of carnival and celebration. Quite clearly, the masquerade is a temporary outburst and essentially harmless; the piper quoted above insinuates that it would trouble him should his behaviour be judged unacceptable.

Scottish playacting – as sociable as it is, as much governed by bands, clans, teams, and regiments – is an activity for individualists. Never would the Scots of Europe consider their hobby a mainstream activity. The more dedicated playacting veterans observe the Scottish boom of the past two decades with the scepticism of all true aficionados. No one wants the bloody stamp collectors to turn up in kilts as well.

It has been observed that we live in highly individualist times in which the presentation of the self constitutes a life-long task and responsibility. In curriculum vitae, fashion choices, and social network profiles, we create an image of ourselves and strive for its originality and recognition value. Being different is an essential asset in this competitive individuality. It appears that the Scotsman with his instantly recognisable cultural symbols and his alleged tradition of armed distinctiveness can become a marker of individuality. Playing Scotsmen is not just a flight from the dullness and social constraint of everyday life, but also a strategy of originality. With his untamed distinctiveness, the Scotsman (like the Native American before him) also appeals to the pioneers of individualism, the representatives of a once rebellious but now mainstream-absorbed counterculture; the motor bikers and heavy metal rockers. Following their decade-old tradition of adopting primitive aesthetics in opposition to the establishment, rockers in the past decades increasingly combined their leather gear with kilts and saltires. As self-styled barbarians, they understand the iconography of the Highlander instantly. Chris Boltendahl, lead-singer of the German heavy metal band Grave Digger, has recorded two albums with a Scottish theme and played the world’s biggest heavy metal festival in Wacken with a full-fledged kilted pipe band (Baul Muluy from Hamburg). He sees Scotland and Heavy Metal as related:

The [Scottish] urge for freedom and independence is similarly important in heavy metal. Heavy metal is a marginal group, in the underground, a subculture. So that fits very well. (Chris, lead-singer Grave Digger, Germany)

[10.3: Heavy Metal Scots: Grave Digger]

The idea of Scottish victimhood and marginality will be examined in the next section. But it is clear that Scottish distinctiveness had to defend itself, again and again; that the Scots retained their original identity despite attempts to break them. There is a narrative of resistance and survival in the Scottish dreamscape which strikes a special chord with many contemporary Europeans:

[The Scots were] able to survive even 1000 years neighbourhood to England and Ireland. There is some truth in it, we Luxemburgers are sensitive about that. (Georges, Beltaine Festival Neihaisgen, Luxembourg)

They fight for independence. We have such people too in Holland, in Friesland, they want independence, too. I like this kind of people who fight for something. (Charles, Alblasserdam, Netherlands)

Scotland and Flanders have many things in common. The struggle for freedom, independence. We feel the same in Flanders. (Frank, Team Madness, Flanders, Belgium)

South Tyrol is a logical location for Highland Games. South Tyrol in Italy, that’s very much like Scotland and England. There is a distinctive pride in both places. The Scots are a free mountain people [Bergvolk], but they are not free. (South Tyrol, Italy)

These playactors don folk costumes and revive rituals to formulate political dissent. They oppose a nation state or society which they feel does not acknowledge and represent their historical difference. Their Scottish performances appear to be a form of stealth patriotism. They appear to be playing, but in fact they make political statements. In Flanders, Highland Games teams call themselves ‘Clan Flemingheart’, in South Tyrol, they will be ‘Red-White Wings’, after the eagle and the colours of the Tyrolean flag. The innocently named Tyrolean ‘Wiesenwichtel’ (field gnomes) from Innsbruck in Austria consider themselves on a patriotic mission when attending the South Tyrolean Highland Games across the Italian border:

I think we chose Scotland because they fought their wars for freedom (Freiheitskämpfe). These were battles like we, the Tyroleans, once fought. ... Patriotism is strong in both places. We are proud of our homeland, but we are no right-wingers. Patriotism should not automatically mean something political. You do not have to be politically right if you love your country.

When asked whether their patriotism is more Tyrolean or Austrian, the answer comes right away: ‘Tyrol is where we are from. We don’t feel strongly about Austria.’ Then why did they not form a Tyrolean club, with all the rich Tyrolean culture, music, and dress around them? ‘There are so many already. And we did not want to limit ourselves. We don’t have to be just one thing. We can take the best from both worlds and do our own thing.’ Patriotism and an interest in the defence of local culture must not mean that its proponents cannot embrace an international, multi-optional consumer lifestyle. Why choose one thing when you can have it all? It must be possible to feel deeply about a homeland, a place where one is rooted, while at the same time feeling attached to other things.

Many continental Highland Games teams and self-professed Clans also state that their own cultures and homelands are ‘a bit Scottish’ in their age-old difference. Athletes and musicians use Scottish symbols to infuse and boost their own living local musical and athletic customs. They enhance their heritage with the Scottish dreamscape. In the Alps, Scottish and indigenous symbols are often combined; Tyrolean hats, Bavarian Lederhosen, Austrian wrestling, and Swiss stone throwing contests fuse with Scottish kilts, bagpipes, and Highland Games. The amalgamation imbues the existing tradition with the rebellious, heroic energy of the Scottish dreamscape. The Bavarian re-enactors of Clan McDohl reply, when asked to describe the Scots:

[The Scots are ] Like the Bavarians here in Germany: when they speak nobody else understands, when they drink nobody else can keep it up, and when they start a fight, no one will survive!14

Who’s like us? Damn few and they’re all dead. Except the Scots who are masters of uniqueness and who have told the world again and again that they are different and will remain so. Distinctiveness is a market value among the identity archaeologists of the memory boom. They dig and dig to find that no one is like them, that they have always been different. According to the president of Schottenclique carnival club, founded 1947 in Basel, Switzerland: ‘To be a Scot, with Schottenclique, is something different than being with just any carnival band. To be with Schottenclique is something special.’

In Brittany, several associations and festivals have sprung up at in the past years which seek to strengthen Breton difference via the import of Scottish symbols. As examined in Chapter 5, this practice has a long pedigree. Today, the France Celtic Tartan Day is held annually on the Breton coast since 2002, the kilted Brittany National Pipe Band was set up in 2004. The ‘Tartan National Breton’ and a number of auxiliary versions were registered in the same years, and the association Breizhlanders (Breton Highlanders) was founded in 2002 to foster Celtic friendship, cultural exchange, and the wearing of the kilt in Brittany.

As Richard Duclos, tartan creator and Breizhlander, explains:

You can wear the kilt for all the reasons you want, but the essential reason is the will to express the cultural difference of Brittany and to bring her still closer to the other Celtic nations, to protect the Celtic people of a certain kind of globalisation, and to support the inter-Celtic pole.

The statement suggests that globalisation may be prevented by the import of Scottish tartans and kilts to Brittany. The narrative inscribed into the Scottish dreamscape – local (Celtic) defence and difference – has a global resonance. Its appropriation is not seen as an act of globalisation, but as a protective measure against it.

Twenty years ago, Stuart Hall wrote that globalisation – contrary to popular belief – does not try to obliterate local differences and cultures. Rather, he argued, global capitalism has recognised that difference will sell. Globalisation sucks up images of local difference and sells them back to consumers in a commodified form. However, the differences are endowed with Hollywood narratives, and their original local meanings rendered meaningless. This is what happens with the symbols of Scotland. They are taken up by global forces, imbued with a Hollywood story of heroic resistance and rebellious individuality, and then sold throughout the world and appropriated as standardised markers of uniqueness. The Scots of Europe (and their cousins in North America, too) gather to express their individuality and distinctiveness in times of the memory boom. The fact that they all wear the same kilts does not concern them. That their ‘Scotland’ is a global fantasy of a local identity – a ‘glocal’ dreamscape, perhaps\(^\text{19}\) – does not present a problem. That many playactors will buy their outfits online and with mainstream credit cards from international manufacturers does not make them feel less dedicated to the defence of local identities against the global forces of modernity. This is no longer Jihad against McWorld, it is McJihad, and it sells. In their defence of local identities, the Scots of Europe use a global Scottish rebel code.

17 ‘… on peut porter le kilt pour toutes les raisons que l’on veut, mais la raison essentielle, c’est la volonté d’inscrire la Bretagne dans sa différence culturelle, et de la rapprocher encore plus des autres nations celtes. Détacher le peuple Breton d’une certaine forme de mondialisation, et soutenir le pôle interceltique.’ Questionnaire Pierre Kerloch, Breizhlanders, The Scots of Europe Survey (2009/2010).

10.3 Wounds: The marginal Scot

To many Scotland enthusiasts, the defence of Scottish difference is more than fun and games. They see their performances as an act of solidarity with Scottish culture which they believe was pushed to the margins and threatened by assimilation in past and present – a fate, they argue, that is shared by many other European peoples.

The Scots have had some lousy times. According to the dreamscape’s mythology, the Scots lost their political independence with the British Union of 1707 and their final battle against the English and the industrial age in 1746 at Culloden, the place ‘where the Clans died’.\(^\text{20}\)
Scotland was then occupied, the defeated rebels hunted down and almost exterminated.
Traditional music and dress were banned, many fled into exile. In the nineteenth century, tens of thousands followed them in the times of the Highland Clearances, when capitalist entrepreneurs pushed smallhold farmers from the land to make room for more profitable sheep. Those who stayed behind had to face and resist bad weather and the steady cultural assimilation by the English. They gave away their sons to the British military and lost them in the colonies and two World Wars. After the end of Empire, the Scots were tricked out of their North Sea Oil and economically crippled by deindustrialisation and Thatcherism.

This is Scotland’s history according to the dreamscape. Notions of defeat and victimhood are deply inscribed, not least thanks to the work of John Prebble (1915-2001), a Canadian writer whose bestselling emotional interpretations of Culloden and the Clearances continue to fascinate American and Australian audiences.\(^\text{21}\) But for once, the idea that the Scots have suffered in the past is not held exclusively in the ‘diaspora’, but in Scotland, too. The Highland historian James Hunter dedicated a book on emigration and encounters with Native Americans bitterly to ‘all those peoples, right across the world, who are grappling with the consequences of having got in the way of what history’s winners invariably call progress’.\(^\text{22}\)
Even the new braggadocio rhetoric in Scottish history, a celebratory stance focused on the Enlightenment, requires that the Scots have ‘created our world and everything in it’ after having been ‘Western Europe’s poorest nation’.\(^\text{23}\)

Much of this victim mythology goes against the grain of historical scholarship. The battle of Culloden was no conflict between ‘the English’ and ‘the Scots’, but one between the Hanoverian government and supporters of the Royal House of Stuart. Several Scottish regiments fought the Jacobite rebels on the government side. Public memory of the Highland Clearances tends to ignore that many emigrants left freely and with a hope for economic gain. In certain places, Clearances are remembered where none took place. Furthermore, the active role of Scottish elites in the making of the British Union in 1707 and in overall British politics is well established. The view of Scotland as an English colony is erroneous, as it ignores the deep reaching participation of Scottish politicians, bankers, merchants, soldiers, and slave-traders ‘at the cutting edge of British global expansion’.

Nevertheless, the notion of Scottish victimhood persists. The Scottish Highlanders (and all Scots are Highlanders in the dreamscape) are victims of history; victims of modernisation, occupation, eviction, imperial politics, and cultural assimilation. By becoming Scots, some of the European playactors make a statement that they themselves were wronged as well, by politics, modernity, and what ‘history’s winners invariably call progress’. They have had their traditions eradicated by the forces of Reformation and Puritanism. They have lost their warm communities in an age of urbanisation and anonymity. And they often claim to have suffered at the hands of powerful neighbours or rulers. The Scottish dreamscape’s narrative of resistance is embraced enthusiastically by those who feel that they themselves were pushed to the margins in past or present.

Strikingly, the European playactors share their interest for Scottish victim history with their American and Australasian cousins. As the anthropologist Paul Basu notes in his remarkable study on American and Australasian roots tourists in Scotland, many amateur genealogists and diaspora dreamers are convinced that their Scottish ancestors have suffered in the past. The dubious rhetoric of genocide, eviction, forced migration, even of a ‘Highland Holocaust’ is strong in the ‘diaspora’ – itself a marker of exile and tragedy. Until the late 1970s, the term has been used almost exclusively in the Jewish context. Postcolonial writers then applied it to descendants of African slaves around the world, later to other emigrant communities such as the Irish, Armenians, Roma, Basque, and Chinese. In the past decade, the term has been used for so many groups that it is questionable whether it will survive as a meaningful analytical concept. While academic writers tried to re-define diaspora and to create new categories such as 'imperial' and 'entrepreneurial' diaspora, the term retains a subtext of exile and victimhood, especially in popular discourse. To claim membership in a diaspora is not the same thing as to belong to an expatriate community; diaspora – with its century-long usage in the Jewish context – implies suffering and a need for recognition. It may be used to increase a community's 'ethnic' status.

As examined in Chapter 2, the memory boom is particularly interested in painful pasts, and ancestors are often summoned as martyrs. Stuart Hall has argued: 'Paradoxically in our world, marginality has become a powerful space.' The post-1960s empowerment of long-disenfranchised groups has led to a complication of plain white identity in North America and arguably Europe, too. To many, whiteness came to be associated with colonial sins and racism. In a strategy of dissociation with the former monolithically white elites, white North Americans began to look for 'ethnic' identities which would provide them with a narrative of their own marginality. Mary Waters found in her study on ethnic options that many white Americans like their ancestries downtrodden; the more 'ethnic' and 'persecuted' the better.

Some scholars have interpreted this strong and global interest in painful history with sympathy. Paul Basu recognises the popular interest in white underdog history as 'the desire to maintain a positive or moral self-image' in the post-colonial discourse, as a way to signal that one has suffered, too, and not made others suffer in the colonial enterprise. He also thinks it expresses a genuine suffering of the white middle classes, a sense of uprootedness, displacement, unhappiness, loneliness, a 'complication of belonging' in the modern age. Less sympathetically, the interest in wounds may also be seen as a defence strategy, as the former white elites' rearguard action. Richard Zumkhawala-Cook for instance suspects that white Americans who attend Highland Games and invoke the hardships of Scottish history are 'white settler nations' trying to preserve their old elite-status against new immigrants and claims of indigenous autochthony. In such a reading, the search for roots is not an expression of a pitiable collective identity crisis, but a campaign of defence.

In Europe, the memory boom may take on a similarly defensive tone. Soaring right-wing parties prophesy the marginalisation of the European people through non-European immigration and EU-bureaucracy. On the left side, anti-globalisation movements engage in a rhetoric of defence and resistance. The invocation of threatened but valiantly distinctive little cultures is an everyday reality in Europe. The Scottish dreamscape – with its narrative of heroic defence in the advent of powerful adversaries – has been instrumentalised in this context. When Umberto Bossi campaigned with his Lega Nord for an independent Padania in the 1990s, he did so by repeatedly comparing Northern Italy to the Scotland of William Wallace.\(^{38}\) To be a Scot may mean to become a defender of old Europe. A Flemish Clansman who visited Edinburgh for The Gathering in 2009 gave the following statement after he made the author turn off the tape recorder:

Identity and culture. You know, we had it. But we lost it. And I think no wonder with all the Muslims and Arabs coming to us. I have absolutely nothing against immigration – if people come to work, if they have a job. But please, not just to receive money from our government. And I don’t see why we should have to pray like the Muslims. We had our own culture. It is time we rediscover it, and show our children where they come from. We are protecting European culture.

His words are echoed by another Belgian Scot, this time a senior bagpiper from the French speaking part of the country (Wallonie) interviewed at Schotse Weekend in Alden Biesen, Flanders. He muses about the growing numbers of pipe bands in Belgium and states:

The people like it. It has something original. And then I think... you see Celtic culture feels perhaps more serious now, with all the African culture here (laughs). I do not have anything against these people, but still we are closer to Scotland than to the Arabs. We look for something old. And you know, the Wallon, he was a Celt.\(^{39}\)

The informant creates a link between his Walloon ancestors and the Scots. By celebrating the Scots he wishes to strengthen his indigenous culture. Interestingly, the same works for his Flemish counterparts. The Vlaams Caledonische Society’s website opens with an image of Flemish patriot Jacob van Artevelde (c.1290-1345) – dressed in a kilt.

In their defence of European culture, these Europeans choose a Scottish costume. It has the antiquity and tradition they require, and the martial varnish to defend it. To be sure, such exclusivist and martial tones do not represent the scene as a whole. For most Scottish playactors, the journey into Scottish history and the discovery of their own antiquity in the mists of the Scottish dreamscape is about hospitality, respect for other people’s distinctiveness, and unrestricted international travel. But for some, the discovery of their inner Scot means to invoke a European Leitkultur.

10.4 Men: Real Men wear Kilts

It has been argued (both by men and women) that if anyone has had a rough time in the four decades since 1970 it was the white male. In the rich countries of the West, men have lost their patriarchal power positions in both professional and domestic life. The labour market no longer requires their ‘traditional’ strength and aggressiveness but calls for allegedly female communication and administrative skills. Schools ban boyish behaviour and encourage discussion and empathy. If adult men attempt to flirt like Sean Connery in the 1960s James Bond movies, they risk a lawsuit for sexual harassment, and when it comes to a divorce, they have little or no rights to their children. Brushing over the fact that men still have higher salaries than women in the same professions, there exists a solid discourse of male disempowerment. This discourse is not the domain of the paranoid few but firmly embedded in the mainstream, debated on prime time television and in bestselling nonfiction books. If we believe this discourse, the late twentieth century not only saw a crisis of rootedness but also a crisis of masculinity.

How easy then to recognise the Scots of Europe as defenders of traditional manhood in the costumes of the heroic Scottish soldier and the feral Highland barbarian. In this reading, the tossing of the caber becomes a phallic imitation of primal masculinity, and the military step and ardour of the marching bands an invocation of chivalrous ideals. The commemorative festivals could be seen as memorial services for a lost manliness, and re-enactments as its reproduction. The kilted Scotsman serves as a model for masculinity, a site of memory – as he did before, in nineteenth-century Britain, when the increasingly sedentary middle class feared effeminacy and went deer stalking in the Highlands. At Scottish festivals, primal manhood is recreated – temporarily, in the fenced-off carnival-zone of inversion.

And yet, the Scots of Europe do not meet our expectations. At the Highland Games and Scottish spectacles of Europe, women are always present. They perform as men, Highland amazons, or Scottish damsels, and they have men perform in kilts for their pleasure and entertainment. Both men and women share an ironic awareness of the outdated nature of their ‘traditional’ Scottish gender roles. And while ironic distance has been identified as the unnerving signum of a soulless postmodernity (nothing is for real, everything a game), the author still would like to argue that it gives the manly games of Europe a refreshing twist. Scottish playacting on the continent is not motivated by macho revisionism and misogyny, but by a playful curiosity about gender roles and the men’s interest to please their women.

As examined in Chapter 4.5, the Scottish dreamscape leaves little room for women. In Scottish playacting, all the traditional roles and costumes are masculine, and at Scottish festivals, the kilted male occupies the central stage. It is he who is remembered as a heroic soldier and re-enacted in the same capacity. Pipe bands were inspired by all-male military marching bands, and Highland Games have long been an exclusively male domain. The Scottish dreamscape is gendered, and it is male.

This said, many women do participate in Scottish playacting. Some will impersonate men, dress up as male Scots with kilt and sporran. They toss cabers and throw hammers, lead pipe and drum bands (Sct Alban Pipe Band, Odense, Denmark), preside Clan societies (Clan Macgregor, Germany), organise Highland Games (Mainland Games Rüsselsheim, Germany), and serve in re-enactment regiments (Earl of Loudoun’s Regiment of Foote) and live action role-playing ranks (Clan MacMahoon). These female Scotsmen remain a minority; for most, playing Scots is a male activity. Still, the author found them at every event he visited.

[10.6: Women dressing up as men: Keltfest, Dordrecht, Netherlands, May 2009]
[10.7: Women dressing up as men: The Gathering, Edinburgh, July 2009]

When the Scottish skirt is ‘reclaimed’ by females, the ultra-male attire of the Scotsman becomes unisex. In these moments, women dress up as men in skirts. Who is cross-dressing in this masquerade? The kilt can certainly become a complicated garment, as some men do not instantly recognise its male identity. ‘Normally we don’t wear skirts’, apologised one young Highlander at the Highland Games of South Tyrol, and another one recounted how difficult it had been for him when he first wore the kilt: ‘Last year [2008], the grand parade was at nine in the morning, and we walked in, completely sober, in our kilts. And it felt so embarrassing, gay somehow, and I told my colleague, come on, let’s just keep walking, back to the car, fuck the registration fee, let’s get out of here.’ Perhaps we must see the high levels of alcohol consumption at the European Highland Games in a completely new light, as a form of Dutch courage for men who lose their trousers! Interestingly, one scholar recently interpreted the mooning scene in Braveheart, when the men in Wallace’s army lift their kilts and present their bare behinds to the English, as a strategy of masculine reassurance, a way of demonstrating that there were really men under those skirts. The author suggested that this may have been important to director and starring actor Mel Gibson, a macho man who has more than once voiced his deep fear of being mistaken for a homosexual.42

While men flirt with Scottish skirts, women watch. Most women at the festivals will remain in the background while the men perform. True, some will invent their own roles and costumes and become Scottish princesses and amazons in extravagant tartan dresses and Celtic veils. Most, however, seem content to leave the stage to men and watch their boyfriends and husbands compete and parade. They may have been sewing kilts before, designing tartans, organising the finances for festivals, driving children to bagpipe lessons. But now they step back. Celeste Ray observes the same phenomenon at Scottish festivals in the U.S., where women are ‘sitting around with other women commenting on how men looked in their kilts, or laughing at those who wear them too short’.43 The situation in Europe is not different. Women generally form the audience. Scottish warrior masculinity is put on display – for ‘both the male and the female gaze’.44

The female gaze, as explored in Chapter 4.5, may take some pleasure in the kilted male. The erotics of the Highlander are an enduring topic in the Scottish dreamscape and a vital theme at the continental festivals. Many women seem to actively dress up their men in Highland attire for their entertainment. At the 2009 Keltfest in Dordrecht, Netherlands, the author questioned some 50 male Scottish playactors about their first interests in Scotland. A third of them stated that it was their partner’s idea, and sometimes, the partner spoke for them:

My wife has made this costume. She is a hobby Victorian dressmaker. She started with dolls and then decided to do real costumes. (Erik, Coevorden)

My girlfriend introduced me to this world. (Charles, Alblasserdam)

I like him wearing a kilt. It makes him look military, tough. (Iris, Utrecht)

If there is nostalgia for traditional masculinity, it is shared by men and women on the Scottish festival grounds of Europe. Most men become Scots not to protest against female dominance, but to please their ladies, to get their excited reaction. A German Clansman explains happily:

Ladies find gentlemen in kilts very interesting. When I once walked in my kilt through the old town of Stralsund [Germany], young women whistled after me, for the first time in my life (laughs). That felt quite alright.

For the first time in their lives, many male Scottish playactors will also worry about fashion and accessories. They invest much time and money in the improvement of their costume and weaponry, and they will not only parade but discuss their gear with like-minded men. The Scots of Europe compliment each other, compare things they bought, turn around in their new outfits in front of other men, and help each other adjusting sporrans and bonnets. Some of the more dedicated carry cases with different costumes for different occasions and spend hours in front of mirrors adjusting the details. They develop deep passions for costume - usually without any worry about compromising their heterosexual appearance. Interestingly, the gay community has taken some interest in Scottish playacting as well. Talking to a male couple in their sixties at the 2009 Schotse Weekend in Flanders, one man dressed in an elaborate Scottish uniform and armed with a crooked Harry Lauder walking stick pointed out: 'It is so amazing, all these really big guys with their thick necks and arms discussing fashion, kilt lengths, and colours.'

[10.8: Scottish peacocks: Aubigny-sur-Nère, France, July 2009]

[10.9: Scottish peacocks: Keltfest, Netherlands, May 2009]
The question of what is under the kilt is of profound interest at the Scottish festivals and asked at every Clan tent and in every row of spectators as the pipers and drummers march by. The correct answer is, of course: nothing. Real men wear no underwear under their kilts. This practice is known as ‘going regimental’. Highland dancers and Highland Games athletes are exempt from this rule for reasons of practicality. The issue is slightly less clear with pipe and drum bands, especially with its female members.

To eliminate the last doubt, men’s kilts are often lifted, both by women and by men, and again this seems perfectly acceptable at Scottish festivals. The revealing of underwear will cause the greater scandal than the revealing of bare skin. This is the license which only celebration and masquerade can create; things are dared which would cause rupture in everyday context. The Scot is granted the freedom of non-restrictive clothing and a bit of exhibitionism. Moonings even take place on stage. At the Schotse Weekend in Flanders, the representative of Guinness had a bet going with the festival organisers. He said he would go on stage and lift his kilt if the crowds drank more than 120 kegs of Guinness. On the second day of the three-day festival, somewhere during the show of folk band Coila, the moment had come, and the band read out a message from a beer mat which announced that drinking had amounted to 135 kegs. The representative walked up, turned his back to thousands of cheering spectators and lifted his kilt.

There is widespread awareness that Scottish festivals create a zone of special license and behaviour. The awareness that their performance is a game, a masquerade with perhaps clownish dimensions, prevailed at all the festivals the author attended. The kilted men shout and beat their breast – and then search for the eye of their partner and wink. Ironic distance is a dominant mood among the Scots of Europe, and this not only in regard to gender roles. In the United States, Celeste Ray reports that women refer to their warrior husbands as ‘cute’, ‘sweet’, ‘attention-hungry’, and ‘pompous’, while the men themselves use words like ‘warrior’, ‘honor’, ‘loyalty’, ‘soldier’, and ‘clansman’ to describe their doings. The author has found no such dichotomy in Europe. Both sides seemed to be playing. This may either indicate a difference between the European and the American approach to the Scottish dreamscape or suggest that a male researcher will receive different answers than a female one. Either way, I would like to argue that in Europe both men and women usually see the act in their performance and play their ‘traditional’ gender roles tongue in cheek.

[10.11: Timelkamer Highlanders, Austria]

Scottish festivals then are not revivalist parties of chauvinism and misogyny, but ironic plays with gender roles. The camp fire atmosphere at many continental gatherings may be about male bonding, but the author never witnessed anything that would remind of the aggressive masculinity cult which proved so decisive for fascist ideology. True Scotsmen, the author was assured, live for their ladies and were born to slay dragons for them. Yes, ‘traditional’ masculinity is performed at Scottish festivals, but women are the main audience, the addressees, and sometimes the inspiration.

Conclusion Chapter 10

The Scots of Europe approach Scotland as a site of memory. They interpret the Scots as survivors from a European pre-modernity and use their musical, athletic, and sartorial traditions to re-imagine their own lost past. Via Scotland, they hope to reclaim a sense of what life must have been like in a tribal community, as an untamed strongman in a village strength contest, or as a piper or drummer marching into battle. They make their own performances meaningful with mythologies of kinship and turn the imaginary Scots into ersatz ancestors. They hear their own ‘Celtic’ melodies in Scottish tunes and detect their own mountain sports in Highland Games. The need for Scottish ersatz ancestors seems to be particularly pressing in the German-speaking nations, where local heroic history has been rendered difficult by political misuse in the past – but also in the Protestant areas of Western Europe, where much folklore and communal ritual has disappeared with the Reformation. Scottish ersatz ancestors provide both an innocent and a colourful replacement.

As a witness of the heroic past, the imaginary Scot helps to remember how life could have been before the restricting effect of modernisation. Scots serve as model rebels, a fantasy of untamed nonconformity. To most playactors, the rediscovery of an ‘inner Scot’ will lead to uninhibited dancing, happy self-intoxication, the lifting of kilts, cross-dressing, and generally a good time. The Scots with their noisy pipes and flamboyant costumes are remedies against civilisational boredom.

Some, however, will stress that the Scots had to defend their freedom, that their customs and identity have been under threat by colonial regimes, evil capitalists, and the forces of progress. With its time-honoured narratives of marginality and resistance, the Scots can become brothers in arms to many angry white males and females, fellow rebels against globalisation, central governments, and even non-European immigration. As self-professed Scottish freedom fighters, the playactors set out to defend and re-invent their own distinctiveness in the clothes of the Scots. This is not without irony, as the Scotland they cherish is the product of profoundly global and commercial processes. It is a global fantasy of a local identity, a Hollywood-version of European difference.

The Scottish dreamscape also helps to recall ‘traditional’ notions of masculinity. At the Scottish festivals of Europe, male and female playactors are interested in recreating and re-enacting ‘real men’. Interestingly, women have a lot of agency in this and often actively dress up their husbands and boyfriends as Scots for their own pleasure. Both men and women retain an ironical distance to the ultra-male Scottish performances. They see through the masquerade and maintain a clownish element. In the carnival zone that is the world of Scottish playacting, the kilted warriors do not rehearse for a real rebellion. They play with what they know are outdated images. They are prepared to return to the office and to normality on Monday. Scottish playacting is game, and the Scots of Europe know it.
CONCLUSION: WARRIOR DREAMS

At the beginning of the new millennium, thousands of Europeans are searching for their past. In response to the social, economic, and technological changes which characterise the second half of the twentieth century, they attempt to protect and remember a history which they feel vanishes too quickly. They are concerned about traditions and ‘heritage’ – the past that defines them. They revive long-forgotten songs and customs, research their family trees and local histories, commemorate graves and battles, set up memorials and museums, even re-enact the past theatrically, wearing costume and wielding swords, exploring what life in the past could have felt like. They have a strong suspicion that it felt better than their present – more exciting, less constrained, less lonely. As Johan Huizinga wrote in his classic The Waning of the Middle Ages (1919):

> Always and everywhere, daily life [in the late Middle Ages] offered unlimited space for glowing passion and childlike fantasy. ... Life had in many ways still the colour of a fairytale.\(^1\)

This study documents the search for ‘glowing passions’ and ‘childlike fantasies’ in North-Western Europe after 1945. It looks at a public effort for history and its preservation.

As the previous chapters demonstrate, a substantial number of the European history enthusiasts find their past in Scotland – or rather, in a bundle of myths and images which we have called the Scottish dreamscape. The Scots of Europe toss cabers at Highland Games strength competitions, play soldiers in marching pipe and drum bands, commemorate Scottish heroes, and simulate kilted combat in historical re-enactment clubs. They justify their Scottish performances with often elaborate mythologies of kinship: By impersonating Scots they hope to recover something of their own lost past. They understand Scotland as a site of European memory, a reservoir of shared history. They employ the Scottish dreamscape to remember and re-imagine who they were themselves.

Why Scotland? Why does Scotland, of all places, satisfy a popular desire for history in Northern and Western Europe? What is it that makes Scotland meaningful to non-Scots – more meaningful than other continental mythologies?

This study presents three hypotheses for Scotland’s remarkable success in what may be called the international market of historical counter-worlds. First, the Scottish dreamscape is familiar. European thinkers have imagined Scotland as a land of living history from the very beginnings of European Romanticism. The notion of Scotland as Europe’s last wilderness was spread via the channels of the British Empire and American popular culture and established internationally. Secondly, the dreamscape promises pleasure. Its sartorial, musical, and athletic assets allow for satisfying performances. The popular search for history after 1945 has a strong focus on physical sensation, and Scottish history – with its bagpipes, kilts, and swords – makes the better weekend history than other histories. Finally, the Scottish dreamscape is charged with ideas of heroism and martial valour. To play Scotsmen means to play soldiers. Scottish dreams are warrior dreams. This martial charge appears to resonate with many of today’s history enthusiasts in North-Western Europe (see below).

There may be another reason for Scotland’s popularity. The European heritage enthusiasts portrayed here are eager to protect and rediscover traditions and identities which have their origins in an earlier phase of Scottish enthusiasm. There appears to be a Scottish constant in the making and the maintenance of modern European national histories.

Most scholars of European Romanticism agree that the work of James Macpherson (1736-1796) and Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) shaped the way modern Europeans think about history and the nation state. Sir Walter’s novels, according to Robert Crawford, ‘have shaped the European mind’, as ‘his fiction fuelled the formation of modern European nations and national literatures’. Cairns Craig writes that ‘Scott’s works, like the poems of Ossian whose fame they followed across Europe, were directly instrumental in stimulating very effective real nationalisms’. While Scott did not (and never intended to) trigger a vital political nationalism in nineteenth-century Scotland, his literary vision of Scotland and Scottish history helped a range of European thinkers to formulate their own histories, their own nations. Leopold Ranke (1795-1886), for example, declared that it was Walter Scott who made him a historian.

As is examined in Chapter 2, the present memory boom may be understood as a reaction to the crumbling of established nineteenth-century national identities and their comforting certainties. Jay Winter writes that the term ‘memory’ has become ‘a metaphor for ways of casting about in the ruins of earlier identities’. It emerges that both the nineteenth-century creation of national histories and their twenty-first-century defence or re-invention feature a degree of Scottish mimesis. Ossian and Scott served poets and historians as literary templates, and their legacy – the Scottish dreamscape – now helps to re-imagine European roots today. Walter Scott ‘enabled readers to imagine in detail a pre-modern way of life – the life of their ancestors’. Today, the Scottish dreamscape continues to assist such historical imagination.

To be sure, Romanticism was no Scottish invention; Sir Walter began his career by translating and imitating German writers. Also, Scotland was but one of many influences which inspired the Romantic period; when Oblomov dreamt of places more wild and animated than his bedroom, he dreamt of Scott’s Scotland and of Schiller’s Switzerland. Still, we may safely say that dreams of Scotland have accompanied and shaped the writing of and the yearning for European history during the past 250 years.

A central focus of this study then is the Scottish dreamscape’s longevity. While the original texts of James Macpherson and Walter Scott are no longer read outside the close confines of literary scholarship, the aesthetic world they celebrate continues to inspire. When Mel Gibson’s Braveheart came to movie theatres worldwide in 1995, the film resonated with more than two centuries of tartan-chequered literature, opera, theatre, comedy, film, whisky marketing, and tourism. It did not create a Scottish fashion, it revitalised it. Back in 1823, Goethe explained that Scott’s novels worked so well in Germany because German history was dull compared to Scott’s material:

Scott’s magic ... rests also on the beauty of the three British kingdoms and the inexhaustible diversity of their history, while in Germany the novelist may find no fertile field between the forest of Thuringia and the sand deserts of Mecklenburg.

Who would have thought that, in 2010, thousands of Europeans would still prefer a magic Scott-land to their own forests and deserts, usually without ever having read a single line of Scott? Scotland – as a pre-modern counter-world – occupies a central position in European modernity.

Having noted the Scottish dreamscape’s historical depth, it must be stressed that the playacting phenomenon examined in this study is a thoroughly recent one. The ‘Scots of Europe’ do not predate World War II. Their impersonations of kilted Scotsmen were inspired by the kilted regiments which fought on the continent or were stationed there after 1945. The first playactors imitated British (and Canadian) soldiers and their military pipe bands. Their numbers grew substantially during the European folk music revival of the late 1960s and 1970s, and they further expanded with successful Hollywood films such as Highlander (1986) and Braveheart (1995) and with fantasy novels such as Outlander (1991). Most of the larger Scottish clubs and festivals on the Europeans continent were established in the 1990s and the first decade of the twenty first century.

The bands, clubs, and festivals examined in this study may be short-lived. People become bored, run out of money, get married, find new hobbies, switch to other exciting histories and mythologies, or simply find accommodation with the dull present. The author would be not at all surprised if by the year 2025, Highland Games and kilted pipe bands would have ceased to be a popular pastime on the European mainland. And yet, the Scottish 8 ‘They would never have succeeded in seeing an evening in the Swiss or Scottish style, when the whole of nature -- the woods, the river, the cottage walls, and the sandy hills -- is suffused by the red glow of the sunset, against which is set off a cavalcade of gentlemen, riding on a twisting, sandy road after having escorted a lady on a trip to some gloomy ruin and now returning at a smart pace to a strong castle, where an ancient native would tell them a story about the Wars of the Roses [sic!] and where, after a supper of wild goat’s meat, a young girl would sing them a ballad to the accompaniment of a lute – scenes with which the pen of Walter Scott has so richly filled our imagination. No, there is nothing like that in our part of the country.’ Ivan Goncharov, Oblomov, transl. D. Magarshack (London: Penguin, 1954, orig. 1859), 106. dreamscape’s longevity suggests that the images and ideas which inspire today’s playacting are unlikely to just disappear in the near future. The Scottish dreamscape has proved an extraordinarily enduring fantasy, and the history of its international impact has hardly reached its end.

In the course of research, it emerged that at least some of the contemporary continental interest in Scottish history and tradition is outspokenly conservative. In the interviews conducted for this study, many self-professed Scots explained how deeply they cared for tradition and old values, that they preferred established gender roles and family structures to post-modern insecurities, and that they were keen to promote patriotism and to defend their culture against the effects of globalisation and sometimes non-European immigration. How political then are the Scottish warrior dreams? Does this study offer insights into a right-wing subculture, a European dimension of the Scottish ‘Neo-Confederates’ and white supremacists described by Euan Hague and others in the U.S. South? Is the ‘Scottish heritage movement’, as Richard Zumkhawala-Cook argues, a white rearguard action, a covert defence of white racial privilege with ‘dark fantasies’ of Scottish pride and heroism?

For two reasons, this study finds that there is no need for alarm. Firstly, the Scots of Europe are introverted. They do not engage with the outside world and never march in political demonstrations. They often distance themselves explicitly from all ideological and political opinion and confine their performances to designated play zones. Their swords are made of papier mâché. The Scots of Europe do not rehearse for a real-life rebellion but let off steam as weekend warriors. They escape a reality and return to it refreshed. True, a charismatic leader-figure might be able to energise or instrumentalise the European Highlanders and drive their Clans into more worldly battles. As it stands, however, the Scots of Europe are a bustling, self-organising, and introspective crowd.

Secondly, Scottish playacting is inclusive. Anyone can wear the kilt and play the pipes. In the Scottish world, belonging comes with skills and knowledge, not with blood and origin. Interestingly, not all playactors reflect and acknowledge this; in the Netherlands, for example, the author came across a piper who formulated xenophobe statements (‘we play Scots because we are not Arabs’) even though his band featured ‘Scots’ of Asian background. Ralf Dahrendorf warned that in times of insecurity and anomy, there impends a ‘tribal relapse’: Room for difference and tolerance shrinks, communities are homogenised. Here, the Scottish masquerade provides a counter-moment: anyone can wear the Scotsman’s mask.

Scottish playacting is, above all, a social activity. The kilts may be invented, the swords may be props, but the Clans are real. Musicians and athletes regularly meet to practice in their free time, ambitious bands and re-enactors spend every second weekend together, travelling endless miles in crammed buses and sharing tents on festival grounds. Volunteers invest thousands of unpaid hours in bagpipe lessons and the making of costumes. At the Scottish festivals, Europeans of all ages and social background come together in play. There is a need for sociability and shared ritual in modern Europe, and Scottish playacting appears to sate some of it. The historian may scorn the sometimes ahistorical costumes, and the anthropologist may frown upon the artificial nature of the rituals. Still, the trick seems to work. The Scots of Europe create social experience – usually without financial support and governmental guidance. John Ruaridh Grant Mackenzie, the Earl of Cromartie and chief of Clan Mackenzie in Scotland, has come to the insight that it is his task as a Clan chief to foster sociability among his followers, be they Scottish or not:

Clans are places to be social, to meet other people in an increasingly amorphous and isolated world. ... I think Clanship is a unifying force, and that cannot be but good in a world of shifting values.

If they could, would the Scots of Europe swap with the wild Scots of the past? Would they exchange their present for the (imaginary) past? Some would. One may spot them right away when attending a Highland Games or re-enactment event. They are too large, too loud, too weird – they just do not fit in with the modern world, and one seriously wonders where they will go to when the music is over and the Scots go home. Most kilted warriors, however, state, in the interviews conducted for this study, that they have no desire to serve in a real army, to starve themselves or their children, to wash only once a week, and to face the general insecurities and discomforts of the past. The Scottish remedy is a temporary injection. The warrior dreams are dreams. Like all masquerades, they must have an end.

THE SCOTS OF EUROPE: LISTS

The Scots of Europe are no stable phenomenon. Their numbers fluctuate, their activities change. Festivals disappear due to mismanagement, dwindling crowds, or the re-location of a key organiser. Other events grow and move to larger venues. New festivals are set up every summer, new pipe bands set up or split from existing ones. The Scots of Europe are a highly unregulated crowd. Some enthusiasts have set up governing bodies and national associations, but their success varies, their authority is questioned. It is very difficult to count the Scots of Europe.

The following list of groups and events serve as an illustration of the Scottish playacting phenomenon’s size and spread. The lists are bound to be incomplete. They were compiled by the author with the help of the activists themselves. Only groups and festivals active in the years 2009 and 2010 were considered.

“The Scots of Europe” is a research project directed by David Hesse, doctoral candidate at the University of Edinburgh’s School of History, Classics, and Archaeology. The project examines Scottish festivals and competitions on the European continent, 1945-2010. Scottish festivals include Highland Games, pipe band competitions, music festivals, historical commemorations and parades, Scottish markets, historical re-enactments, public Clan gatherings, Burns Suppers, and St. Andrews Balls. On this website, we would like to ask the organisers of such events to fill out our online-questionnaire. We are keen to learn more about your interest in Scotland. We invite all European Scotland-enthusiasts to participate, whether they have Scottish ancestry or not. Your answers will be used in scholarly publications only, your name may be anonymised (see below). Many thanks for participating!
